III. His repeated commendation of the beauty of his spouse (v. 7): Thou art all fair, my love. The particulars, as of those of the creation, he pronounces all very good. There is nothing amiss in thee, and thou hast all beauties in thee; thou art sanctified wholly in every part; all things have become new (2 Cor. v. 17); there is not only a new face and a new name, but a new man, a new nature.

Verses 8–14

These are still the words of Christ to his church, expressing his affection to her.

I. The endearing names and titles by which he calls her, to express his love to her, to assure her of it, and to engage and excite her love to him. Twice here he calls her My spouse (v. 8, 11) and three times My sister, my spouse, v. 9, 10, 12. Mention was made (ch. iii. 11) of the day of his espousals, and, after that, she is called his spouse, not before. There is a marriage-covenant between Christ and his church, between Christ and every true believer. Christ calls his church his spouse. Because no one relation among men is sufficient to set forth Christ's love to his church, and to show that all this must be understood spiritually, he owns her in two relations, My sister, my spouse. His calling her sister is grounded upon his taking our nature upon him in his incarnation.

II. The gracious call he gives her to come along with him as a faithful bride. 1. All that have by faith come to Christ must come with Christ, in holy obedience to him and compliance with him. Being joined to him, we must walk with him. This is his command to us daily: "Come with me, my spouse; come with me to God as a Father; come with me onward, heavenward; come with me from Lebanon, from the top of Amana, from the lions' dens." These mountains are to be considered, (1) As seemingly delightful places. Lebanon is called that goodly mountain, Deut. iii. 25. We read of the pleasant dew of Hermon (Ps. cxxxiii. 3) and the joy of Hermon (Ps. lxxxix. 12). This is Christ's call to his spouse to come off from the world, to sit loose to all the delights of sense. They must come away and live above the tops of the highest hills on earth, that they may have their conversation in heaven. From the tops of Shenir and Hermon, which were on the other side Jordan, as from Pisgah, they could see the land of Canaan; from this world we must look forward to the better country. (2) These hills indeed are pleasant enough, but there are in them lions' dens; they are mountains of the leopards, mountains of prey, though they seem glorious and excellent, Ps. lxvi. 4. On the tops of these mountains there are many dangerous temptations. Come with me from the temples of idolaters, and the societies of wicked people; come out from among them, and be you separate. Come from under the dominion of your own lusts, which are as lions and leopards.

2. It may be taken as a promise: Thou shalt come with me from Lebanon, from the lions' dens; that is, "Many shall be brought home to me, as living members of the church, from every point, from Lebanon in the north, Amana in the west, Hermon in the east, Shenir in the south, from all parts, to sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, Matt. viii. 11. See Isa. xlix. 11, 12.

III. The great delight Christ takes in his church.

1. No expressions of love can be more passionate than these here, in which Christ manifests his affection to his church; and yet that great proof of his love, his dying for it, goes far beyond them all. A spouse so dearly bought and paid for could not but be dearly loved. Thou hast ravished my heart; the word is used only here. Thou hast hearted me, or Thou hast unhearted me. New words are coined to express the inexpressibleness of Christ's surprising love to his church. Thou hast ravished my heart with one of thy eyes, those doves' eyes, clear and chaste (which were commended, v. 1). The ornaments she has from him, that is, the obedience she yields to him, for that is the chain of her neck, the graces that enrich her soul. Having shaken off the bands of our neck, by which we were tied to this world (Isa. lii. 2), we are bound with the cords of love, as chains of gold, to Jesus Christ, and our necks are brought under his sweet and easy yoke. How fair is thy love! how beautiful is it! How well does it become a believer thus to love Christ. Nothing recommends us to Christ as this does. The ointments, the odours wherewith she is perfumed, that is to say, the gifts and graces of the Spirit, her good works, are an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God, Phil. iv. 18. Love and obedience to God are more pleasing to Christ than sacrifice or incense. The smell of her garments too, the visible profession she makes of religion, and relation to Christ, is as the smell of Lebanon. Likewise, her words are sweet (v. 11): Thy lips O my spouse! drop as the honeycomb. If what God speaks to us be sweeter to us than the honey and the honeycomb (Ps. xix. 10), what we say to him in prayer and praise shall also be pleasing to him. In the word of God there is sweet and wholesome nourishment, milk for babies, honey for those that are grown up.

2. The church is fitly compared to a garden, to a garden which, as was usual, had a fountain in it (v. 12–14). This garden is a garden enclosed, a paradise separated from the common earth. It is appropriated to God; he has set it apart for himself; Israel is God's portion. It is enclosed for secrecy; the saints are God's hidden ones. Christ walks in his garden unseen. It is enclosed for safety; a hedge of protection is made about it, which all the powers of darkness cannot find. It has a spring in it, and a fountain, but it is a spring shut up and a fountain sealed, that it may not by any injurious hand be muddied or polluted. The souls of believers are as gardens enclosed; grace in them is as a spring shut up there in the hidden man of the heart, where the water that Christ gives is a well of living water, John iv. 14; vii. 38. The Old Testament church was a garden enclosed by the partition wall of the ceremonial law. The Bible was then a spring shut up and a fountain sealed; it was confined to one nation; but now the wall of separation is removed, the gospel preached to every nation, and in Jesus Christ there is neither Greek nor Jew. Thy plants, or plantations, are an orchard of pomegranates with pleasant fruits, v. 13. Here are fruits, pleasant fruits, all trees of frankincense, and all the chief spices, v. 14. Here is great plenty of fruits, the best of the kind. Their chief spices were much more valuable than the choicest of our flowers. Saints in the church, and graces in the saints, are very fitly compared to these fruits and spices; for the trees of righteousness are the planting of the Lord (Isa. lxi. 3). Saints are the blessings of this earth. They are permanent, and will be preserved to good purpose, when flowers are withered and good for nothing. Grace, ripened into glory, will last for ever.

Verses 15–16

These seem to be the words of the spouse, the church, in answer to the commendations which Christ, the bridegroom, had given of her as a pleasant fruitful garden.

I. She owns her dependence upon Christ himself to make this garden fruitful. To him she has an eye (v. 15) as the fountain of gardens. To him she gives all the glory of her fruitfulness, as being nothing without him. The church transmits the praise to Christ, and says to him, All my springs are in thee; thou art the well of living waters (Jer. ii. 13). Those that are gardens to Christ must acknowledge him a fountain to them, from whose fulness they receive and to whom it is owing that their souls are as a watered garden, Jer. xxxi. 12.

II. She implores the influences of the blessed Spirit to make this garden fragrant (v. 16): Awake, O north wind! and come, thou south. This is a prayer for the church in general, that there may be a plentiful effusion of the Spirit. This prayer was answered in the pouring out of the Spirit on the day of pentecost (Acts ii. 1), ushered in by a mighty wind; then the apostles, who were bound up before, flowed forth, and were a sweet savour to God, 2 Cor. ii. 15. Sanctified souls are as gardens, gardens of the Lord, enclosed for him. Graces in the soul are as spices in these gardens. The blessed Spirit, in his operations upon the soul, is as the north and the south wind. There is the north wind of convictions, and the south wind of comforts. The flowing forth of the spices of grace depends upon the gales of the Spirit.

III. She invites Christ to the best entertainment the garden affords: Let my beloved then come into his garden and eat his pleasant fruits; let him have the honour of all the products of the garden, and let me have the comfort of his acceptance of them. The believer can take little pleasure in his garden, unless Christ, the beloved of his soul, come to him, nor have any jot of the fruits of it, unless they redound some way or other to the glory of Christ.

CHAP. V

In this chapter we have, I. Christ's gracious acceptance of the invitation which his church had given him, ver. 1. II. The account which the spouse gives of her own folly, in putting a slight upon her beloved, and the distress she was in by reason of his withdrawings, ver. 2–8. III. The enquiry of the daughters of Jerusalem concerning the perfections of her beloved (ver. 9), and her particular answer to that enquiry, ver. 10–16. "Unto you that believe he is thus precious."

Verse 1

These words are Christ's answer to the church's prayer in the close of the foregoing chapter, Let my beloved come into his garden; here he has come. She called him her beloved because she loved him; in return he called her his sister and spouse. Those that make Christ their best beloved shall be owned by him in the nearest and dearest relations. She invited him to come into his garden, and he says, I have come. Those that throw open the door of their souls to Jesus Christ shall find him ready to come into them; and in every place where he records his name he will meet his people, and bless them, Exod. xx. 24. She only desired him to eat the fruits of the garden, but he brought along with him something more, honey, and wine, and milk, which yield substantial nourishment, and which were the products of Canaan, Immanuel's land. The great work of man's redemption, and the riches of the covenant of grace, are a feast to the Lord Jesus and they ought to be so to us.

Verses 2–8

In this song of loves and joys we have here a melancholy scene; the spouse here speaks, not to her beloved, but of him, and it is a sad story she tells of her own folly and ill conduct.

I. Listlessness that had seized her. She slept, that is, pious affections cooled, she neglected her duty and grew remiss in it. True Christians are not always alike lively and vigorous in religion. But Grace was remaining, notwithstanding: "My heart wakes; my own conscience reproaches me for it, and ceases not to rouse me out of my sluggishness. I sleep, but it is not a dead sleep; I strive against it; I cannot be easy under this indisposition." We ought to take notice of our own spiritual slumbers and distempers, and to reflect upon it with sorrow and shame that we have fallen asleep when Christ has been nigh us in his garden.

II. The call that Christ gave to her, when she was under this indisposition: It is the voice of my beloved; she knew it to be so, which was a sign that her heart was awake. Like the child Samuel, she heard at the first call, but did not, like him, mistake the person; she knew it to be the voice of Christ. He knocks, to awaken us to come and let him in, knocks by his word and Spirit, knocks by afflictions and by our own consciences. Those whom he loves he will not let alone in their carelessness, but will find some way or other to awaken them, to rebuke and chasten them. Observe how moving the call is: Open to me, my sister, my love. He sues for entrance who may demand it; he knocks who could easily knock the door down. He gives her all the most endearing titles imaginable: My sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled; he gives her no hard names. His loving-kindness he will not utterly take away. Open to me. Can we deny entrance to such a friend, to such a guest? He begs to be admitted under the character of a poor traveller that wants a lodging: "My head is wet with the dew, consider what hardships I have undergone, to merit thee, which surely may merit from thee so small a kindness as this." When Christ was crowned with thorns, then was his head wet with the dew. Do we thus requite him for his love?

III. The excuse she made to put off her compliance with this call (v. 3): I have put off my coat; How shall I put it on again? She is half asleep; she knows the voice of her beloved, but cannot find in her heart to open to him. She was undressed, she had washed her feet, and would not have occasion to wash them again. Frivolous excuses are the language of prevailing slothfulness in religion; Christ calls to us to open to him, but we pretend we have no mind, or we have no strength, or we have no time. Those put a great contempt upon Christ that cannot find in their hearts to bear a cold blast for him, or get out of a warm bed.

IV. The powerful influences of divine grace, by which she was made willing to rise and open to her beloved. When he could not prevail with her by persuasion he put in his hand by the hole of the door, to unbolt it, as one weary of waiting, v. 4. This intimates a work of the Spirit upon her soul. The conversion of Lydia is represented by the opening of her heart (Acts xvi. 14).

V. Her compliance with these methods of divine grace at last: My bowels were moved for him. She was moved with compassion to her beloved, because his head was wet with the dew. Did Christ redeem us in his pity? Let us in pity receive him, and for his sake, those that are his, when at any time they are in distress. He made her ashamed of her dullness and slothfulness (v. 5, I rose up, to open to my beloved). It was her own act, and yet he wrought it in her. And now her hands dropped with myrrh upon the handles of the lock. Either, 1. She found it there when she applied her hand to the lock, to shoot it back; he that put in his hand by the hole of the door left it there as an evidence that he had been there. When Christ has wrought powerfully upon a soul he leaves a blessed sweetness in it. 2. She brought it thither. When she came to open to him she prepared to anoint his head, and so to refresh and comfort him; she was in such haste to meet him that she would not stay to make the usual preparation, but dipped her hand in her box of ointment, that she might readily anoint his head. Those that open the doors of their hearts to Christ, those everlasting doors, must meet him with the lively exercises of faith and other graces, and with these must anoint him.

VI. Her sad disappointment when she did open to her beloved. I opened to my beloved, as I intended, but, alas! my beloved had withdrawn himself, and was gone. My beloved was gone, was gone, so the word is.

1. She did not open to him at his first knock, and now she came too late. Christ will be sought while he may be found; if we slip our time, we may lose our passage. Christ justly rebukes our delays and suspends the communications of comfort from those that are remiss.

2. She still calls him her beloved, being resolved, how cloudy and dark soever the day be, she will not quit her relation to him. She now remembers the words he said to her when he called her: "My soul failed when he spoke; his words melted me when he said, My head is wet with the dew; and yet I lay still, and made excuses, and did not open to him." She went in pursuit of him: I sought him; I called him. I could not find him; he gave me no answer. There are those who have a true love for Christ, and yet have not immediate answers to their prayers for his smiles; but he gives them an equivalent if he strengthens them with strength in their souls to continue seeking him, Ps. cxxxviii. 3. St. Paul could not prevail for the removing of the thorn in the flesh, but was answered with grace sufficient for him. She was ill-treated by the watchmen: They found me; they smote me; they wounded me, v. 7. They took her for a lewd woman and beat her accordingly. Disconsolate saints are taken for sinners, and are censured and reproached as such. When she was disabled to prosecute her enquiry herself she gave charge to those about her to assist her (v. 8): I charge you, O you daughters of Jerusalem! all my friends and acquaintance, if you find my beloved, "Speak a good word for me; tell him that I am sick of love." It is better to be sick of love to Christ than at ease in love to the world.

Verses 9–16

I. The daughters of Jerusalem answer to the charge she had given them, v. 9. Observe the respectful title they give to the spouse: O thou fairest among women! The church is the most excellent society in the world, and the beauty of the sanctuary a transcendent beauty. Holiness is the symmetry of the soul. Even those that have little acquaintance with Christ, as those daughters of Jerusalem, cannot but see beauty in those that bear his image. Their enquiry concerning her beloved: "What is thy beloved more than another beloved?" Some take it for a scornful question, blaming her for making such ado about him. Carnal hearts see nothing excellent or extraordinary in the Lord Jesus, in his person or offices, in his doctrine or in his favours. Others rather take it for a serious question, and suppose that those who put it intended to comfort the spouse, who, they knew would recover new spirits if she did but talk awhile of her beloved. They wondered what moved the spouse to charge them concerning her beloved with so much concern, and concluded there must be something more in him than in another. There begin to be hopes of people when they begin to enquire concerning Christ. And sometimes the extraordinary zeal of one, in enquiring after Christ, may be a means to provoke many (2 Cor. ix. 2).

II. The account which the spouse gives of her beloved in answer to this question. She assures them, in general, that he is one of incomparable perfections and unparalleled worth (v. 10). He has everything in him that is lovely: My beloved is white and ruddy. This points not at any extraordinary beauty of his body, when he should be incarnate, but at his divine glory, in the eyes of those that are enlightened to discern spiritual things. In him we may behold the beauty of the Lord; he was the holy child Jesus; that was his fairness. His love to us renders him lovely. He is white in the spotless innocency of his life, ruddy in the bloody sufferings he went through at his death,—white, in his glory, as God, ruddy in his assuming the nature of man, Adam—red earth. He has that loveliness in him which is not to be found in any other: He is the chief among ten thousand. She gives a particular detail of his accomplishments, conceals not his power or comely proportion. Ten instances she here gives of his beauty. The design, in general, is to show that he is every way qualified for his undertaking, and has all that in him which may recommend him to our esteem, love, and confidence. Christ's appearance to John (Rev. i. 13, &c.) may be compared with the description which the spouse gives of him here, the scope of both being to represent him transcendently glorious. (1) His head is as the most fine gold. The head of Christ is God (1 Cor. xi. 3). Christ's head bespeaks his sovereign dominion over all and his vital influence upon his church and all its members. (2) His locks are bushy and black, black as a raven, whose blackness is his beauty; black and bushy, denoting that he is ever young and that there is in him nothing that waxes old. (3) His eyes are as the eyes of doves, fair and clear, and chaste and kind (4) His cheeks are as a bed of spices, and as sweet flowers, or towers of sweetness. The half discoveries Christ makes of himself to the soul are reviving and refreshing, fragrant above the richest flowers and perfumes. (5) His lips are like lilies, sweet and pleasant. Such are the words of his lips to all that are sanctified; grace is poured into his lips, and those that heard him wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth. (6) His hands are as gold rings set with the beryl, a noted precious stone, v. 14. Great men had their hands adorned with gold rings on their fingers, set with precious stones, but, in her eye, his hands themselves were as gold rings; all the instances of his power, the works of his hands, all the performances of his providence and grace, are all precious, as gold, as the precious onyx and the sapphire, all fitted to the purpose for which they were designed, and all beautiful, as rings set with beryl. (7) His bowels are as bright ivory. It denotes his tender compassion and affection for his spouse. This love of his is like bright ivory, finely polished, and richly overlaid with sapphires. The love itself is strong and firm, bright and sparkling. (8) His legs are as pillars of marble, v. 15. This bespeaks his stability and steadfastness; he is able to bear all the weight of the government that is upon his shoulders. (9) His countenance (his port and mien) is as Lebanon, that stately hill; his aspect beautiful and charming, excellent as the cedars. (10) His mouth is most sweet; it is sweetness (so the word is), v. 16. The words of his mouth are all sweet to a believer. The tokens of his love, have a transcendent sweetness in them, and are most delightful to those who have their spiritual senses exercised. To you that believe he is precious. She concludes with a full assurance both of faith and hope, and so gets the mastery of her trouble. Here is a full assurance of faith concerning the complete beauty of the Lord Jesus: "He is altogether lovely." Here is a full assurance of hope concerning her own interest in him: "This is my beloved, and this is my friend; and therefore wonder not that I thus long after him. He is mine, my Lord and my God (John xx. 28), mine according to the tenor of the gospel-covenant, mine in all relations, bestowed upon me, to be all that to me that my poor soul stands in need of." It is spoken of here with an air of triumph: "This is he whom I have chosen, and to whom I have given up myself. None but Christ, none but Christ. This is he on whom my heart is, for he is my best-beloved; this is he in whom I trust, and from whom I expect all good, for this is my friend."

CHAP. VI

In this chapter, I. The daughters of Jerusalem, moved with the description which the church had given of Christ, enquire after him, ver. 1. II. The church directs them where they may meet with him, ver. 2, 3. III. Christ is now found of those that sought him, and very highly applauds the beauty of his spouse (ver. 4–7), before all others (ver. 8, 9), recommending her to the love and esteem of all her neighbours (ver. 10), and expressing the great delight he took in her, ver. 11–13.

Verses 1-3

I. The enquiry which the daughters of Jerusalem made concerning Christ, v. 1. They still continue their high thoughts of the church, and call her, as before, the fairest among women. And now they raise their thoughts higher concerning Christ: Whither has thy beloved gone, that we may seek him with thee? This would be but an unacceptable compliment, if the song were not to be understood spiritually; for love is jealous of a rival; but those that truly love Christ are desirous that others should love him too. The spouse had described him and had expressed her own love to him, and that flame in her breast scattered sparks into theirs. As sinful lusts, when they break out, defile many, so the pious zeal of some may provoke many, 2 Cor. ix. 2.

II. The answer which the spouse gave to this enquiry, v. 2, 3. Now she knows very well where he is (v. 2): "My beloved is not to be found in the streets of the city, and the crowd and noise that are there, but he has gone down to his garden, a place of retirement." The more we withdraw from the hurry of the world the more likely we are to have acquaintance with Christ, who took his disciples into a garden, there to be witnesses of the agonies of his love. Christ's church is a garden enclosed, his garden, which he has planted. Those that would find Christ may expect to meet with him in his garden the church; they must attend upon him in the ordinances which he has instituted, the word, sacraments, and prayer, wherein he will be with us always, even to the end of the world. When Christ comes down to his church it is to feed his flock, which he feeds not, as other shepherds, in the open fields, but in his garden. He comes to feed his friends, and entertain them, for the Lord takes pleasure in those that fear him. He has many gardens, many particular churches of different sizes and shapes; but, while they are his, he manifests himself among them, and is well pleased with them. He picks the lilies one by one, and gathers them to himself; and there will be a general harvest of them at the great day. She had acted unkindly to her beloved, and he had justly withdrawn himself from her, and therefore there was occasion to take fresh hold of the covenant, which continues firm between Christ and believers, notwithstanding their failings and his frowns, Ps. lxxxix. 30–35. "I have been careless and wanting in my duty, and yet I am my beloved's. He has justly hidden his face from me and yet my beloved is mine." When we have not a full assurance of Christ's love we must live by a faithful adherence to him. "Though I have not the sensible consolation I used to have, yet I will cleave to this, Christ is mine and I am his."

Verses 4-10

Now we must suppose Christ graciously returned to his spouse, having forgiven and forgotten all her unkindness, for he speaks very tenderly and respectfully to her.

I. He pronounces her truly amiable (v. 4): Thou art beautiful, O my love! as Tirzah, a city in the tribe of Manasseh, whose name signifies pleasant, or acceptable. Thou art comely as Jerusalem, a city compact together (Ps. cxxii. 3), and which Solomon had built and beautified. It was the holy city, and that was the greatest beauty of it; and fitly is the church compared to it. The gospel-church is the Jerusalem that is above (Gal. iv. 26), the heavenly Jerusalem (Heb. xii. 22); in it God has his sanctuary, and is, in a special manner, present; therefore it is comely as Jerusalem, and, being so, is terrible as an army with banners.

II. He owns himself in love with her, v. 5, though, for a small moment, he had hid his face from her. Turn thy eyes towards me (so some read it), "turn the eyes of faith and love towards me, for they have lifted me up; look unto me, and be comforted." When we are calling to God to turn the eye of his favour towards us he is calling to us to turn the eye of our obedience towards him.

III. He repeats, almost word for word, part of the description, he had given of her beauty (ch. iv. 1–3), her hair, her teeth, her temples (v. 5–7), to show that he had still the same esteem for her that he had before.

IV. He sees all the beauties and perfections of others meeting and centring in her (v. 8, 9): "There are, it may be, threescore queens, who, like Esther, have by their beauty attained to the royal state and dignity, and fourscore concubines, virgins without number, but my dove, my undefiled, is but one, a holy one." She excels them all. Go through all the world, and view the societies of men that reckon themselves wise and happy, kingdoms, courts, senates, councils, they are none of them to be compared with the church of Christ. There are particular persons who are famed for their accomplishments, the beauties of their language, and performances, but the beauty of holiness is beyond all other beauty. "Though there are many particular churches, some of greater dignity, others of less, some of longer, others of shorter, standing, and many particular believers, of different gifts and attainments, yet they all constitute but one catholic church, are all but parts of that whole, and that is my dove, my undefiled." Christ is the centre of the church's unity.

V. He shows how much she was esteemed, not by him only, but by all that had acquaintance with her. As Solomon himself is said to have been tender and an only one in the sight of his mother (Prov. iv. 3), so was she the only one of her mother, as dear as if she had been an only one, the choice one of her that bore her. All the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them, are nothing, in Christ's account, compared with the church. She was admired by all her acquaintance, not only the daughters, her juniors, but even the queens and the concubines, who might have reason to be jealous of her as a rival; they all blessed her, praised her, and spoke well of her. Those that have any correct sense of things cannot but be convinced in their consciences (whatever they say) that godly people are excellent people; many will give them their good word, and more their goodwill. Jesus Christ is well pleased with those that honour such as fear the Lord, and takes it ill of those that offend any of his little ones.

VI. He produces the encomium that was given of her, and makes it his own (v. 10): Who is she that looks forth as the morning? This is applicable both to the church in the world and to grace in the heart. Christians are, or should be, the lights of the world. The patriarchal church looked forth as the morning when the promise of the Messiah was first made known, and the day-spring from on high visited this dark world. The Jewish church was fair as the moon; the ceremonial law was an imperfect light; it shone by reflection; did not make day, nor had the sun of righteousness yet risen. But the Christian church is clear as the sun, exhibits a great light to those that sat in darkness. The beauty of the church and of believers is awful as an army with banners. The church, in this world, is as an army, as the camp of Israel in the wilderness; its state is militant; it is in the midst of enemies, and is engaged in a constant conflict with them. Believers are soldiers in this army. It has its banners; the gospel of Christ is an ensign (Isa. xi. 12). It is marshalled, and kept in order and under discipline. It is terrible to its enemies. When the church preserves her purity she secures her honour and victory; when she is fair as the moon, and clear as the sun, she is truly great and formidable.

Verses 11–13

Christ having now returned to his spouse, and the breach being entirely made up, here gives an account of the distance and of the reconciliation.

I. When he had withdrawn from his church as his spouse, yet even then he had his eye upon it as his garden, which he took care of (v. 11): "I went down into the garden of nuts, or nutmegs, to see the fruits of the valley, with concern, to see them as my own." When he was out of sight he was no further off than the garden, observing how the vine flourished, that he might do all which was necessary to promote its flourishing. He went to see whether the pomegranates budded. Christ observes the first beginnings of the good work of grace in the soul and the early buddings of devout affections and inclinations there, and is well pleased with them, as we are with the blossoms of the spring.

II. Yet he could not long content himself with this, but suddenly felt a powerful inclination to return to his church, being moved with her lamentations after him (v. 12): "Or ever I was aware, my soul made me like the chariots of Ammi-nadib; I could not any longer keep at a distance; and I presently resolved to fly back to my love." And now the spouse perceives that he heard the voice of her supplications, and became like the chariots of Ammi-nadib, which were noted for their beauty and swiftness. Christ's people ought to be a willing people. If they continue seeking Christ and longing after him, even when he seems to withdraw from them, he will return to them in due time.

III. He, having returned to her, kindly courted her return to him, notwithstanding the discouragements she laboured under. Let her take the comfort of the return of her beloved, v. 13. Here the church is called the Shulamite, referring to Salem, the place of her birth and residence, as the woman of Shunem is called the Shunamite. Heaven is the Salem whence the saints have their birth, and where they have their citizenship. She is invited to return. As revolting sinners have need to be called to again and again (Turn you, turn you, why will you die?) so disquieted saints have need to be called to again and again, Turn you, turn you, why will you droop; Why art thou cast down, O my soul? Having returned, she is desired to show her face: That we may look upon thee. Go no longer with thy face covered like a mourner. Christ is pleased with the cheerfulness and humble confidence of his people and would have them look pleasant. A short account is given of what is to be seen in her. The question is asked, What will you see in the Shulamite? And it is answered, As it were the company of two armies. (1) Some think she gives this account of herself. Alas! says she, What will you see in the Shulamite? nothing that is worth your looking upon, nothing but as it were the company of two armies actually engaged, where nothing is to be seen but blood and slaughter. The watchmen had wounded her, and she carried in her face the marks of those wounds, looked as if she had been fighting. She had said (ch. i. 6), Look not upon me because I am black; here she says, "Look not upon me because I am bloody." (2) Others think her beloved gives this account of her. "I will tell you what you shall see in the Shulamite; you shall see as noble a sight as that of two armies, or two parts of the same army, drawn out in rank and file; not only as an army with banners, but as two armies, with a majesty double to what was before. She is as Mahanaim, as the two hosts which Jacob saw (Gen. xxxii. 1, 2), a host of saints and a host of angels ministering to them; the church militant, the church triumphant."

CHAP. VII

In this chapter, I. Christ, the royal bridegroom, goes on to describe the beauties of his spouse, the church, and to express his love to her, ver. 1–9. II. The spouse, the church, expresses her great delight in him, and the desire that she had of communion with him, ver. 10–13.

Verses 1–9

The title which Jesus Christ here gives to the church is new: O prince's daughter! agreeing with Ps. xlv. 13, where she is called the king's daughter. She is so in respect of her new birth, born from above, begotten of God, and his workmanship, bearing the image of the King of kings, and guided by his Spirit. She is so by marriage; Christ, by betrothing her to himself, though he found her mean and despicable, has made her a prince's daughter.

I. A copious description of the beauty of the spouse, which seems to be given by Christ himself, and to be designed to express his love to her as before, ch. iv. 1, &c., and ch. vi. 5, 6. The similitudes are here different from before, to show that the beauty of holiness is such as nothing in nature can reach. That commendation of the spouse, ch. iv, was immediately upon the espousals (ch. iii. 11), this upon her return from a by-path (ch. vi. 13); yet this exceeds that, to show the constancy of Christ's love to his people; he loves them to the end. The spouse had described the beauty of her beloved in ten particulars (ch. v. 11, &c.); and now he describes her in as many. The beauties of the church are reckoned from foot to head. 1. Her feet are here praised; the feet of Christ's ministers are beautiful in the eyes of the church (Isa. lii. 7), and her feet are here said to be beautiful in the eyes of Christ. How beautiful are thy feet with shoes! When believers, being made free from the captivity of sin (Acts xii. 8), have their feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace, and walk steadily according to the rule of the gospel, then their feet are beautiful with shoes; they tread firmly. 2. The joints of the thighs are here said to be like jewels, and those curiously wrought by a cunning workman. This is explained by Eph. iv. 16 and Col. ii. 19, where the mystical body of Christ is said to be held together by joints and bands, as the hips and knees (both which are the joints of the thighs) serve the natural body in its strength and motion. The church is then comely in Christ's eyes when those joints are kept firm by holy love and unity. 3. The navel is here compared to a round cup or goblet. The fear of the Lord is said to be health to the navel. See Prov. iii. 8. 4. The belly is like a heap of wheat in the store-chamber, which perhaps was sometimes adorned with flowers. The wheat is useful, the lilies are beautiful; there is everything in the church which may be to the members of that body either for use or for ornament. All the body is nourished from the belly; it denotes the spiritual prosperity of a believer and the healthful constitution of the soul. 5. The breasts are like two young roes that are twins, v. 3. This comparison we had before, ch. iv. 5. 6. The neck, which before was compared to the tower of David (ch. iv. 4), is here compared to a tower of ivory, so white, so precious; such is the faith of the saints, by which they are joined to Christ their head. 7. The eyes are compared to the fishpools in Heshbon, or the artificial fish-ponds, by a gate, either of Jerusalem or of Heshbon, which is called Bath-rabbim, the daughter of a multitude, because a great thoroughfare. The understanding, the intentions of a believer, are clean and clear as these ponds. 8. The nose is like the tower of Lebanon, the forehead or face set like a flint (Isa. l. 7), undaunted as that tower was impregnable. So it denotes the magnanimity and holy bravery of the church, or (as others) a spiritual sagacity to discern things that differ, as animals strangely distinguish by the smell. This tower looks towards Damascus, the head city of Syria, denoting the boldness of the church in facing its enemies. 9. The head like Carmel, a very high hill near the sea, v. 5. The head of a believer is lifted up above his enemies (Ps. xxvii. 6), above the storms of the lower region, as the top of Carmel was, pointing heavenward. 10. The hair of the head is said to be like purple. This denotes the amiableness of a believer in the eyes of Christ, even to the hair, or (as some understand it) the pins with which the hair is dressed.

II. The church thus beautified and adorned is lovely indeed if she be so in his eyes. His love makes this comeliness truly valuable. 1. He delighted to look upon his church. The king is held in the galleries, and cannot leave them. And, if Christ has such delight in the galleries of communion with his people, much more reason have they to delight in them. 2. He was struck with admiration at the beauty of his church (v. 6): How fair and how pleasant art thou, O love! How art thou made fair! (so the word is), "not born so, but made so with the comeliness which I have put upon thee." 3. He determined to keep up communion with his church. He compares her stature to a palm-tree (v. 7), so straight, so strong, does she appear. The palm-tree is observed to flourish most when it is loaded; so the church, the more it has been afflicted, the more it has multiplied; and the branches of it are emblems of victory. Christ says, "I will go up to the palm-tree, to entertain myself with the shadow of it (v. 8) and I will take hold of its boughs and observe the beauty of them." He compares her breasts (her pious affections towards him) to clusters of grapes, a most pleasant fruit (v. 7), and he repeats it (v. 8): They shall be (that is, they shall be to me) as clusters of the vine, which make glad the heart. "Now that I come up to the palm-tree thy graces shall be exerted and excited." The smell of their nostrils is like the smell of apples, or oranges, which is pleasing and reviving. And, lastly, the roof of her mouth is like the best wine (v. 9); her spiritual taste and relish, of the words she speaks to God and man, which come from the roof of the mouth, these are pleasing to God. The prayer of the upright is his delight. It is like that wine which is palatable and grateful to the taste. It goes down sweetly. Nothing goes down so sweetly with a gracious soul as the wine of God's consolations. The presence of Christ by his Spirit with his people shall be reviving and refreshing to them, as that strong wine which makes the lips even of those that are asleep (that are ready to faint away in a delirium), to speak. Unconverted sinners are asleep; saints are often drowsy, and listless, and half asleep; but the word and Spirit of Christ will put life and vigour into the soul, and out of the abundance of the heart that is thus filled the mouth will speak.

These are the words of the spouse, the church, the believing soul.

I. She here triumphs in her relation to Christ. With what holy exultation does she say (v. 10), "I am my beloved's, not my own, but entirely devoted to him and owned by him." Glorying in this, that she is his, to serve him, she comforts herself with this, that his desire is towards her. Christ's desire was strongly towards his chosen remnant, when he came from heaven to earth to seek and save them. This is a comfort to believers that, whosoever slights them, Christ has a desire towards them, such a desire as will again bring him from heaven to earth to receive them to himself.

II. She humbly and earnestly desires communion with him (v. 11, 12): "Come, my beloved, let us take a walk together, that I may receive counsel, instruction, and comfort from thee, and may make known my wants and grievances to thee, with freedom, and without interruption." Thus Christ walked with the two disciples that were going to the village called Emmaus, and talked with them, till he made their hearts burn within them. She desires to go forth into the fields and villages to have this communion with him. Those that would converse with Christ must go forth from the world, must avoid everything that would divert the mind and be a hindrance to it when it should be wholly taken up with Christ. Let us get up early to the vineyards. It intimates her care to improve opportunities of conversing with her beloved. She will be content to take up her lodging in the villages. His presence will make them fine and pleasant. A gracious soul can reconcile itself to the poorest accommodations, if it may have communion with God in them.

III. She desires to be better acquainted with the state of her own soul and the present posture of its affairs (v. 12): Let us see if the vine flourish. Our own souls are our vineyards. We are made keepers of these vineyards, and therefore are concerned often to look into them, to examine the state of our own souls, to seek whether the vine flourishes, whether we be fruitful in the fruits of righteousness. And especially let us enquire whether the tender grape appear and whether the pomegranates bud forth, what good motions and dispositions there are in us that are yet but young and tender, that they may be protected and cherished with particular care, that they may bring forth fruit unto perfection. And, if we would be acquainted with ourselves, we must beg of him to search and try us, to help us in the search, and discover us to ourselves.

IV. She promises to her beloved the best entertainment she can give him; for he will come in to us, and sup with us, Rev. iii. 20. 1. She promises him her best affections. 2. She promises him her best provision, v. 13. "There we shall find pleasant odours, for the mandrakes give a smell. We shall also find that which is good for food, as well as pleasant to the eye: At our gates are all manner of pleasant fruits." The fruits and exercises of grace are pleasant to the Lord Jesus. These must be carefully devoted to his service and honour, must be always ready, as that is which is laid up at our gates. There is a great variety of these pleasant fruits, with which our souls should be well stocked; we must have grace for all occasions. Those that truly love Christ will think all they have even their most pleasant fruits, and what they have treasured up most carefully, too little to be bestowed upon him.

CHAP. VIII

The affections between Christ and his spouse are as strong in this closing chapter of the song, as ever. I. The spouse continues her importunity for a more intimate communion with him, ver. 1–3. II. She charges the daughters of Jerusalem not to interrupt her communion with her beloved (ver. 4); and they admire her dependence on him, ver. 5. III. She begs of her beloved, that he would by his grace confirm that blessed union with him to which she was admitted, ver. 6, 7. IV. She makes intercession for others also, that care might be taken of them (ver. 8, 9). V. She owns herself his tenant for a vineyard she held of him at Baal-hamon, ver. 11, 12. VI. The song concludes with an interchanging of parting requests. Christ charges his spouse that she should often let him hear from her (ver. 13), and she begs of him that he would hasten his return to her, ver. 14.

Verses 1–4

1. The spouse wishes for a constant intimacy and freedom with the Lord Jesus. She was obliged to be shy and to keep at some distance; she therefore wishes she may be taken for his sister, he having called her so (ch. v. 1), and that she might have the same chaste and innocent familiarity with him that a sister has with a brother. It is the wish of all believers for a more intimate communion with him, that they might receive the Spirit of sanctification, and so Christ might be as their brother, that is, that they might be as his brethren, which then they are when by grace they are made partakers of a divine nature, Heb. ii. 11, &c. 2. She promises herself then the satisfaction of making a more open profession of her relation to him than at present she could make: "When I should find thee without, anywhere, even before company, I would kiss thee, as a sister does her own brother." The church, since Christ's incarnation, can better own him than she could before, when she would have been laughed at for being so much in love with one that was not yet born. Christ has become as our brother; wherever we find him, therefore, let us be ready to own our relation to him and affection for him. 3. She promises to improve the opportunity she should then have for cultivating an acquaintance with him (v. 2): "I would lead thee, as my brother. I would bring thee into my mother's house, into the church, into the solemn assemblies (ch. iii. 4), and there thou wouldst instruct me." It is the presence of Christ in and with his church that makes the word and ordinances instructive to her children, who shall all be taught of God. 4. She promises him to bid him welcome to the best she had; she would cause him to drink of her spiced wine and the juice of her pomegranate. The exercise of grace and the performance of duty are to the Lord Jesus, very acceptable to him, as expressive of a grateful sense of his favours. 5. She doubts not but to experience his tender care of her, that she should be supported by his power. (His left hand shall be under my head) and that she should be comforted with his love—His right hand should embrace me. While we are following hard after Christ his right hand sustains Ps. lxiii. 8. Underneath are the everlasting arms. 6. She charges those about her to take heed of doing anything to interrupt the pleasing communion she now had with her beloved (v. 4). The church, our common mother, charges all her children that they never do anything to provoke Christ to withdraw.

Verses 5–7

I. The spouse is much admired by those about her. It comes in in a parenthesis, but in it gospel-grace lies as plain, and as much above ground, as anywhere in this mystical song: Who is this that comes up from the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved? They are the words of the daughters of Jerusalem, to whom she spoke (v. 4); they see her, and bless her. The Jewish church came up from the wilderness supported by the divine power and favour, Deut. xxxii. 10, 11. The Christian church was raised up from a low and desolate condition by the grace of Christ relied on, Gal. iv. 27. Particular believers are admirable, and divine grace is to be admired in them, when by the power of that grace they are brought up from the wilderness, leaning with a holy confidence upon Jesus Christ their beloved. This bespeaks the beauty of a soul, and the wonders of divine grace.

II. She addresses herself to her beloved.

1. She puts him in mind of the former experience which she and others had had of comfort in applying to him. (1) For her own part: "I raised thee up under the apple tree, that is, I have many a time wrestled with thee by prayer and have prevailed. When I was alone in the acts of devotion, retired in the orchard, under the apple-tree, meditating and praying, then I raised thee up, to help me and comfort me," as the disciples raised him up in the storm, saying, Master, carest thou not that we perish? (Mark iv. 38). (2) Others also had had like experience of comfort in Christ. There thy mother brought thee forth, the universal church, or believing souls, in whom Christ was formed, Gal. iv. 15. Those that had travailed in convictions at last brought forth in consolations, and the pain was forgotten for joy of the Saviour's birth.

2. She begs of him that her union with him might be confirmed, and her communion with him continued and made more intimate (v. 6): Set me as a seal upon thy heart, as a seal upon thy arm. "Let me have a place in thy heart, an interest in thy love. Be thou my high priest; let my name be written on thy breast-plate, nearer thy heart. Let thy power be engaged for me, as an evidence of thy love to me; let me be not only a seal upon thy heart, but a seal upon thy arm; let me be ever borne up in thy arms, and know it to my comfort."

3. To enforce this petition, she pleads the power of love.

(1) Love is a vigorous passion. It is strong as death. Christ's love to us was strong as death, for it broke through death itself. He loved us, and gave himself for us. The love of true believers to Christ is strong as death, for it makes them dead to everything else. Jealousy is cruel as the grave, which swallows up and devours all; those that truly love Christ are jealous of everything that would draw them from him. The coals thereof burn with incredible fury and irresistible force, as the coals of fire that have a most vehement flame, a flame of the Lord (so some read it). Holy love is a fire that begets a vehement heat in the soul, and consumes the dross and chaff that are in it.

(2) Love is a valiant victorious passion. Holy love is so; the reigning love of God in the soul is constant and firm, and will not be drawn off from him by life or death, Rom. viii. 38. Death, and all its terrors, will not frighten a believer from loving Christ: Many waters, though they will quench fire, cannot quench this love, no, nor the floods drown it, v. 7. No waters could quench Christ's love to us, nor any floods drown it; he waded through the greatest difficulties, even seas of blood. Love sat king upon the floods; let nothing then abate our love to him. Life, and all its comforts, will not entice a believer from loving Christ. Love will enable us to repel and triumph over temptations from the smiles of the world, as much as from its frowns.

Verses 8–12

Christ and his spouse having sufficiently confirmed their love to each other, strong as death and inviolable, they are here, in these verses, consulting together about their affairs. Yoke-fellows, having laid their hearts together, lay their heads together.

I. They are here consulting about their sister, their little sister, and the disposing of her.

1. The spouse proposes her case with a compassionate concern (v. 8): We have a little sister and she has no breasts (she has not grown up to maturity); what shall we do for this little sister of ours in the day that she shall be spoken for? (1) This may be understood as spoken by the Jewish church concerning the Gentile world. God had espoused the church of the Jews, and she was richly endowed, but what shall become of the poor Gentiles. Their condition (say the pious Jews) is very forlorn; they are sisters, but they are little, because not dignified with the knowledge of God; they have no breasts, no divine revelation, no scriptures, no ministers, no breasts of consolation, being strangers to the covenants of promise. What shall we do for them? We can but pity them, and pray for them. Now the tables are turned; the Gentiles are betrothed to Christ, and ought to return the kindness by an equal concern for the bringing in of the Jews again, our eldest sister, that once had breasts, but now has none. Or, (2) It may be applied to any other that belong to the election of grace, but are yet uncalled. They are remotely related to Christ and his church, and sisters to them both, other sheep that are not of this fold, John x. 16; Acts xviii. 10. Those that through grace are brought to Christ themselves should contrive what they may do to help others to him, to carry on the great design of his gospel, which is to espouse souls to Christ, and convert sinners to him from whom they have departed.

2. Christ soon determines what to do in this case, and his spouse agrees with him in it (v. 9): "If she be a wall, if the good work be once begun with the Gentiles, with the souls that are to be called in, if the little sister, when she shall be spoken for by the gospel, will but receive the word, and build herself upon Christ the foundation, we will build upon her a palace of silver, we will carry on the good work that is begun, till the wall become a palace, the wall of stone a palace of silver." This little sister, when once she is joined to the Lord, shall be made to grow into a holy temple, a habitation of God through the Spirit, Eph. ii. 21, 22. If she be a door, when this palace comes to be finished, then we will enclose her with boards of cedar. Though the beginnings of grace be small, the latter end shall greatly increase. The church is in care concerning those that are yet uncalled. "Let me alone," says Christ; "I will do all that which is necessary to be done for them. Trust me with it."

3. The spouse takes this occasion to acknowledge with thankfulness his kindness to her, v. 10. She is very willing to trust him with her little sister, for she herself had had great experience of his grace, and, for her part, she owed her all to him: I am a wall, and my breasts like towers. Then was I in his eyes as one that found favour. With what joy and triumph we ought to speak of God's grace towards us, and with what satisfaction we should look back upon the special times and seasons when we were in his eyes as those that find favour; these were days never to be forgotten.

II. They are here consulting about a vineyard they had in the country, the church of Christ on earth considered under the notion of a vineyard (v. 11, 12): Solomon had a vineyard at Baal-hamon; his vineyard was a type of the church of Christ. Our Saviour has given us a key to these verses in the parable of the vineyard let out to unthankful husbandmen, Matt. xxi. 33. The bargain was that, every one of the tenants having so much of the vineyard assigned him as would contain 1000 vines, he was to pay the annual rent of 1000 pieces of silver; for we read (Isa. vii. 23) that in a fruitful soil there were 1000 vines at 1000 silverlings. 1. Christ's church is his vineyard, a pleasant place; he delights to walk in it, and is pleased with its fruits. 2. He has entrusted each of us with his vineyard, as keepers of it. The privileges of the church are that good thing which he has committed to us, to be kept as a sacred trust. The service of the church is to be our business. 3. He expects rent from those that are employed in his vineyard and entrusted with it. He comes, seeking fruit, and requires gospel-duty of all those that enjoy gospel-privileges. 4. Though Christ has let out his vineyard to keepers, yet still it is his, and he has his eye always upon it for good. Some take these for Christ's words (v. 12): My vineyard, which is mine, is before me; and they observe how he dwells upon his property in it: It is my vineyard, which is mine; so dear is his church to him, it is his own in the world (John xiii. 1), and therefore he will always have it under his protection. 5. The church, that enjoys the privileges of the vineyard, must have them always before her. The keeping of the vineyard requires constant care and diligence. They are rather the words of the spouse: My vineyard, which is mine, is before me. She had lamented her fault and folly in not keeping her own vineyard (ch. i. 6), but now she resolves to reform. Our hearts are our vineyards, which we must keep with all diligence. 6. Our great care must be to pay our rent for what we hold of Christ's vineyard. Thou, O Solomon! must have 1000, and shalt have. The main profits belong to Christ; to him all our fruits must be dedicated. 7. If we be careful to give Christ the praise of our church-privileges, we may then take to ourselves the comfort and benefit of them. If the owner of the vineyard have had his due, the keepers of it shall be well paid for their care and pains; they shall have 200, which sum, no doubt, was looked upon as good profit.

Verses 13–14

Christ and his spouse are here parting for a while; she must stay below in the gardens on earth, where she has work to do for him; he must remove to the mountains of spices in heaven, where he has business to attend for her, as an advocate with the Father.

I. He desires to hear often from her. "Thou that, for the present, dwellest in the gardens, dressing and keeping them till thou remove from the garden below to the paradise above—thou, O believer! that dwellest in the gardens of solemn ordinances, in the gardens of church-fellowship and communion, the companions are so happy as to hear thy voice, cause me to hear it too." The communion of saints is an article of our covenant, as well as an article of our creed, to exhort one another daily. Hearken to the voice of the church, as far as it agrees with the voice of Christ. In the midst of our communion with one another we must not neglect our communion with Christ; he here bespeaks it: "The companions hearken to thy voice; it is a pleasure to them; cause me to hear it. Pour out thy heart to me." We cause him to hear our prayers when we not only pray, but wrestle and strive in prayer.

II. She desires his speedy return to her (v. 14): Make haste, my beloved, to come again, and receive me to thyself; be thou like a roe, or a young hart, upon the mountains of spices. Even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. True believers, as they are looking for, so they are hastening to, the coming of that day of the Lord. The spouse, after an endearing conference with her beloved, finding it must break off, concludes with this affectionate request for the perfecting and perpetuating of this happiness in the future state. It is good to conclude our devotions with a joyful expectation of the glory to be revealed, and holy humble breathings towards it. We should not part but with the prospect of meeting again. It is good to conclude every sabbath with thoughts of the everlasting sabbath, which shall have no night at the end of it, nor any week-day to come after it. It is good to conclude every sacrament with thoughts of the everlasting feast, when we shall sit down with Christ at his table in his kingdom, and to break up every religious assembly in hopes of the general assembly of the church of the first-born, when time and days shall be no more.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE BOOK OF THE PROPHET ISAIAH

A prophet is one that has a great intimacy with Heaven and a great interest there, and consequently a commanding authority upon earth. Prophecy was most commonly by dreams, voices, or visions, communicated to prophets first, and by them to the children of men, Num. xii. 6. Before the sacred canon of the Old Testament began to be written there were prophets, who were instead of Bibles to the church. Our Saviour seems to reckon Abel among the prophets, Matt. xxiii. 31, 35. Enoch was a prophet; Noah was a preacher of righteousness. God said of Abraham, He is a prophet, Gen. xx. 7. Jacob foretold things to come, Gen. xlix. 1. Moses was, beyond all comparison, the most illustrious of all the Old Testament prophets, for with him the Lord spoke face to face, Deut. xxxiv. 10. But after the death of Moses, for some ages, the Spirit of the Lord appeared and acted in the church of Israel more as a martial spirit than as a spirit of prophecy, and inspired men more for acting than speaking in the time of the judges. We find the Spirit of the Lord coming upon Othniel, Gideon, Samson, and others, for the service of their country, with their swords, not with their pens. In all the book of Judges there is never once mention of a prophet, only Deborah is called a prophetess. Then the word of the Lord was precious; there was no open vision, 1 Sam. iii. 1. But in Samuel prophecy revived, and in him a famous period of the church began, a time of great light in a constant uninterrupted succession of prophets, till some time after the captivity, when the canon of the Old Testament was completed. Then prophecy ceased for nearly 400 years. We read of prophets raised up for special public services, among whom the most famous were Elijah and Elisha in the kingdom of Israel. There was nothing of their own writing but one epistle of Elijah's, 2 Chron. xxi. 12. But, towards the latter end of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel, it pleased God to direct his servants the prophets to write some of their sermons. The dates of many of their prophecies are uncertain, but the earliest of them was in the days of Uzziah king of Judah, and Jeroboam the second, his contemporary, king of Israel, about 200 years before the captivity. If they begin to murder the prophets, yet they shall not murder their prophecies; these shall remain as witnesses against them. Hosea was the first of the writing prophets; and Joel, Amos, and Obadiah, published their prophecies about the same time. Isaiah began some time after, but his prophecy is placed first, because it is the largest of them all, and has most in it of him to whom all the prophets bore witness; and indeed so much of Christ that he is justly styled the Evangelical Prophet, and, by some of the ancients, a fifth Evangelist.

I. Concerning the prophet himself. He was (if we may believe the tradition of the Jews) of the royal family, his father being (they say) brother to King Uzziah. He was certainly much at court, especially in Hezekiah's time. The Spirit of God sometimes served his own purpose by the particular genius of the prophet; for prophets were not speaking trumpets, through which the Spirit spoke, but speaking men, by whom the Spirit spoke, making use of their natural powers, in respect both of light and flame, and advancing them above themselves.

II. Concerning the prophecy. It is transcendently useful; serving for conviction of sin, direction in duty, and consolation in trouble. Two great distresses of the church are here referred to, Sennacherib's invasion, which happened in his own time, and the captivity in Babylon, which happened long after; and in encouragements laid up for these times of need we find abundance of the grace of the gospel. There are not so many quotations in the gospels out of any, perhaps not out of all, the prophecies of the Old Testament, as out of this; nor such express testimonies concerning Christ, witness that of his being born of a virgin (ch. vii) and that of his sufferings (ch. liii). The beginning of this book abounds most with reproofs for sin and threatenings of judgment; the latter end of it is full of good words and comfortable words. This method the Spirit of Christ took formerly in the prophets and does still, first to convince and then to comfort; and those that would be blessed with the comforts must submit to the convictions.

CHAP. I

The first verse of this chapter is intended for a title to the whole book. The sermon which is contained in this chapter has in it, I. A charge, in God's name, against the Jewish church and nation, 1. For their ingratitude, ver. 2, 3. 2. For their incorrigibleness, ver. 5. 3. For the universal corruption and degeneracy of the people, ver. 4, 6, 21, 22. 4. For the perversion of justice by their rulers, ver. 23. II. A sad complaint of the judgments of God, which they had brought upon themselves by their sins, and by which they were brought almost to utter ruin, ver. 7–9. III. A just rejection of those shadows of religion which they kept up among them, notwithstanding this general defection and apostasy, ver. 10–15. IV. An earnest call to repentance and reformation, setting before them life and death, ver. 16–20. V. A threatening of ruin to those that would not be reformed, ver. 24, 28–31. VI. A promise of a happy reformation at last, and a return to their primitive purity and prosperity, ver. 25–27.

Verse 1

I. The name of the prophet, Isaiah, which, in the New Testament, is read Esaias. His name signifies the salvation of the Lord—a proper name, especially for this prophet, who prophesies so much of Jesus the Saviour and of the great salvation wrought out by him. He is said to be the son of Amoz, the brother, or son, of Amaziah king of Judah, a tradition as uncertain as that rule, that, where a prophet's father is named, he also was himself a prophet.

II. The nature of the prophecy. It is a vision. The prophets were called seers, and therefore their prophecies are fitly called visions. It was what he saw with the eyes of his mind, and foresaw as clearly by divine revelation, as if he had seen it with his bodily eyes.

III. The subject of the prophecy. Some chapters there are in this book which relate to Babylon, Egypt, Tyre, and other neighbouring nations; but it takes its title from that which is the main substance of it, and is therefore said to be concerning Judah and Jerusalem. Isaiah brings to them in a special manner, 1. Instruction; for to them pertain the oracles of God. 2. Reproof and threatening; for if in Judah, if in Salem, iniquity be found, they, sooner than any other, shall be reckoned with for it. 3. Comfort and encouragement in evil times; for the children of Zion shall be joyful in their king.

IV. The date of the prophecy. Isaiah prophesied in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah. By this it appears, 1. That he prophesied long, especially if (as the Jews say) he was at last put to death by Manasseh, being sawn asunder, to which some suppose the apostle refers, Heb. xi. 37. From the year that king Uzziah died (ch. vi. 1) to Hezekiah's sickness and recovery was forty-seven years; how much before, and after, he prophesied, is not certain. 2. That he passed through variety of times. Jotham was a good king, and Hezekiah a better, and no doubt took advice from this prophet; but between them, and when Isaiah was in the prime of his time, the reign of Ahaz was very profane and wicked.

Verses 2–9

I. The prophet, though he speaks in God's name, despairing to gain audience with the children of his people, addresses himself to the heavens and the earth (v. 2): Hear, O heavens! and give ear, O earth! Sooner will the inanimate creatures hear, who observe the law and answer the end of their creation, than this stupid senseless people. Let the lights of heaven shame their darkness, and the fruitfulness of the earth their barrenness, and the strictness of each to its time their irregularity. Moses begins thus in Deut. xxxii. 1.

II. He charges them with base ingratitude. Let heaven and earth hear and wonder at, 1. God's gracious dealings with such a peevish provoking people: "I have nourished and brought them up as children: they have been well fed and well taught" (Deut. xxxii. 6). 2. Their ill-natured conduct towards him, who was so tender of them: "They have rebelled against me."

III. He attributes this to their ignorance and inconsideration (v. 3): The ox knows, but Israel does not. Observe, 1. The sagacity of the ox and the ass, creatures of the dullest sort; yet the ox has such a sense of duty as to know his owner and to serve him. The ass has such a sense of interest as to know his master's crib, where he is fed, and to abide by it. Man is shamed in knowledge by these silly animals, and is not only sent to school to them (Prov. vi. 6, 7), but set in a form below them (Jer. viii. 7). 2. The sottishness and stupidity of Israel. God is their owner and proprietor. He made us, and has provided well for us; yet many that are called the people of God ask, "What is the Almighty, that we should serve him?" They do not know, they do not consider. They know; but their knowledge does them no good, because they do not consider what they know; they do not apply it to their case, nor their minds to it. Inconsideration of what we do know is as great an enemy to us in religion as ignorance of what we should know. Therefore men revolt from God, and rebel against him.

IV. He laments the corruption of their church and kingdom. The disease of sin was epidemic, and all orders and degrees of men were infected with it: Ah sinful nation! v. 4.

1. The wickedness was universal. They were a sinful nation; the generality of the people were vicious and profane. Their wickedness was upon them as a talent of lead, Zech. v. 7, 8. They came of a bad stock, were a seed of evil-doers. Treachery ran in the blood. They were a race and family of rebels. They were not only corrupt children, but children that were corrupters, that propagated vice, and infected others with it. They have provoked the Holy One of Israel unto anger wilfully and designedly; they knew what would anger him, and that they did.

2. He illustrates it by a comparison taken from a sick and diseased body, all overspread with leprosy, or, like Job's, with sore boils, v. 5, 6. The distemper has seized the vitals, and so threatens to be mortal. They had become corrupt in their judgment: the leprosy was in their head. It has overspread the whole body, and so becomes exceedingly noisome. There is no soundness, no good principles, no religion (for that is the health of the soul), nothing but wounds and bruises, guilt and corruption. No attempts were made for reformation, or, if they were, they proved ineffectual: The wounds have not been closed, nor bound up, nor mollified with ointment. While sin remains unrepented of, the wounds are not mollified or closed up, nor anything done towards the healing of them.

V. He sadly bewails the judgments of God which they had brought upon themselves. Their kingdom was almost ruined, v. 7. "Look and see how it is; your country is desolate; as for the fruits of your land, which should be food for your families, strangers devour them before your eyes, and you cannot prevent it; you starve while your enemies surfeit." Jerusalem, which was as the daughter of Zion (the temple built on Zion was a mother to Jerusalem), was now lost, deserted, and exposed as a cottage in a vineyard, which, when the vintage is over, nobody dwells in, and every person is afraid of coming near it as if it were a besieged city, v. 8. Probably this sermon was preached in the reign of Ahaz, when Judah was invaded by the kings of Syria and Israel, the Edomites and the Philistines, who slew many, and carried many away into captivity, 2 Chron. xxviii. 5, 17, 18. National impiety and immorality bring national desolation. Yet they were not at all reformed, and therefore God threatens to take another course with them (v. 5). God sometimes, in a way of righteous judgment, ceases to correct those who have been long incorrigible, and whom therefore he designs to destroy.

VI. He comforts himself with the consideration of a remnant that should be the monuments of divine grace and mercy, notwithstanding this general corruption and desolation, v. 9. The Lord of hosts left unto them a very small remnant, that were kept pure from the common apostasy and kept safe and alive from the common calamity. This is quoted by the apostle (Rom. ix. 27), and applied to those few of the Jewish nation who in his time embraced Christianity. This remnant is often a very small one. Multitude is no mark of the true church. Christ's is a little flock. It is good for a people that have been saved from utter ruin to look back and see how near they were to it, to see how much they owed to a few good men that stood in the gap, and that that was owing to a good God, who left them these good men.

Verses 10–15

I. God calls to them (but calls in vain) to hear his word, v. 10. 1. The title he gives them is very strange: You rulers of Sodom, and people of Gomorrah. This intimates what a righteous thing it would have been with God to make them like Sodom and Gomorrah (v. 9). The rulers are boldly attacked here by the prophet as rulers of Sodom; for he knew not how to give flattering titles. The tradition of the Jews is that for this he was long after put to death. His demand upon them is very reasonable: "Hear the word of the Lord, and give ear to the law of our God; attend to that which God has to say to you, and let his word be a law unto you."

II. He justly refuses to hear their prayers and accept their services, their sacrifices and burnt-offerings, the fat and blood of them (v. 11), their attendance in his courts (v. 12), their oblations, their incense, and their solemn assemblies (v. 13), their new moons and their appointed feasts (v. 14), their devoutest addresses

(v. 15); they are all rejected, because their hands were full of blood.

1. There are many who are strangers, nay, enemies, to the power of religion, and yet seem very zealous for the show and shadow and form of it. This sinful nation brought to the altar of the God of Israel, sacrifices, peace-offerings and burnt-offerings, which were wholly consumed to the honour of God. They prayed, prayed often, made many prayers, thinking they should be heard for their much speaking. Their hearts were empty of true devotion. They came to appear before God (v. 12), to be seen before him (so the margin reads it). Their hands were full of blood. They were guilty of murder, rapine, and oppression, under colour of law and justice. Malice is heart-murder in the account of God; he that hates his brother in his heart has, in effect, his hands full of blood.

2. When sinners are under the judgments of God they will more easily be brought to fly to their devotions than to forsake their sins and reform their lives.

3. The most pompous and costly devotions of wicked people, without a thorough reformation of the heart and life, are so far from being acceptable to God that really they are an abomination to him. It is here shown in a great variety of expressions that to obey is better than sacrifice; nay, that sacrifice, without obedience, is a jest, an affront and provocation to God. Their sacrifices are here represented as fruitless and insignificant: To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices? v. 11. They are vain oblations, v. 13. Their attention to God's institutions was all lost labour, and served not to answer any good intention: Who has required these things at your hands? v. 12. They pray, but God will not hear, for, though they make many prayers, none of them come from an upright heart. "They are your sacrifices, they are none of mine; I am full of them, even surfeited with them." Their coming into his courts he calls treading them, or trampling upon them. Their incense, though ever so fragrant, was an abomination to him, for it was burnt in hypocrisy and with an ill design. Their solemn assemblies he could not away with, could not see with any patience. God is never weary of hearing the prayers of the upright, but soon weary of the costly sacrifices of the wicked. Sin is hateful to God, so hateful that it makes even men's prayers and their religious services hateful to him. Dissembled piety is double iniquity.

Verses 16–20

I. A call to repentance and reformation: "If you would have your sacrifices accepted, and your prayers answered, you must begin your work at the right end: Be converted to my law else expect not to be accepted in the acts of your devotion." As justice and charity will never atone for atheism and profaneness, so prayers and sacrifices will never atone for fraud and oppression.

1. They must cease to do evil, must do no more wrong, shed no more innocent blood. This is the meaning of washing themselves and making themselves clean, v. 16. We must put away not only the evil of our doings by refraining from the gross acts of sin, but the roots and habits of sin, that are in our hearts.

2. They must learn to do well. This was necessary to the completing of their repentance. We must be doing good, the good which the Lord our God requires. We must learn to do well; take pains to get the knowledge of our duty. He urges them particularly to second-table duties: "Seek judgment; enquire what is right, that you may do it. Relieve the oppressed. Avenge those that suffer wrong, the fatherless and the widow, whom, because they are weak and helpless, proud men trample upon and abuse. Speak for those that know not how to speak for themselves and that have not wherewithal to gratify you for your kindness."

II. A demonstration, at the bar of right reason, of the equity of God's proceedings with them: "Come now, and let us reason together (v. 18); while your hands are full of blood I will have nothing to do with you, though you bring me a multitude of sacrifices; but if you wash, and make yourselves clean, you are welcome to draw nigh to me; come now, and let us talk the matter over." Religion has reason on its side; there is all the reason in the world why we should do as God would have us do. The case needs only to be stated and it will determine itself.

1. They could not in reason expect any more than that, if they repented and reformed, they should be restored to God's favour, notwithstanding their former provocations. Here is no penance imposed, nor the yoke made heavier. He does not say, "If you be perfectly obedient", but, "If you be willingly so"; for, if there be a willing mind, it is accepted. All their sins should be pardoned, and should not be mentioned against them. Though our sins have been as scarlet and crimson, a deep dye, though we have been often dipped, by our many backslidings, into sin, and though we have lain long soaking in it, as the cloth does in the scarlet dye, yet pardoning mercy will thoroughly discharge the stain. If we make ourselves clean by repentance and reformation (v. 16), God will make us white by a full remission. "Be but willing and obedient, and you shall eat the good of the land, the land of promise." If sin be pardoned, creature-comforts become comforts indeed.

2. They could not in reason expect any other than that, if they continued obstinate in their disobedience, the sentence of the law should be executed upon them (v. 20).

Verses 21–30

I. The woeful degeneracy of Judah and Jerusalem is sadly lamented. The royal city had been a faithful city, faithful to God and the interests of his kingdom among men, faithful to the nation and its public interests. It was full of judgment; justice was duly administered. Righteousness lodged in it. That beauteous virtuous spouse was now become an adulteress; righteousness no longer dwelt in Jerusalem, even murderers lived undisturbed there; the princes themselves were so cruel and oppressive that they had become no better than murderers. The degeneracy of Jerusalem is illustrated (v. 22): Thy silver has become dross. This degeneracy of the magistrates is as great a reproach and injury to the kingdom as the debasing of their coin would be and the turning of their silver into dross. Thy wine is mixed with water, and so has become flat and sour. Dross may shine like silver, and the wine that is mixed with water may retain the colour of wine, but neither is worth anything. Thus they retained a show and pretence of virtue and justice, but had no true sense of either. "Thy princes, that should keep others in their allegiance to God and subjection to his law, are themselves rebellious, and set God and his law at defiance. Those that should restrain thieves, are themselves companions of thieves; they share with the thieves they protect in their unlawful gain. The profit of their places is all their aim, to make the best hand they can of them, right or wrong. They ought to protect those that are injured. But they judge not the fatherless, take no care to guard the orphans, nor does the cause of the widow come unto them, because the poor widow has no bribe to give, with which to bring her cause on."

II. A resolution is taken up to redress these grievances (v. 24):. Therefore saith the Lord, the Lord of hosts, the Mighty One of Israel—who has power to make good what he says—Ah! I will ease me of my adversaries. God will find out a time and a way to ease himself of this burden. If God's professing people conform not to his image, as the Holy One of Israel (v. 4), they shall feel the weight of his hand as the Mighty One of Israel. Though the church has a great deal of dross in it, yet it shall not be thrown away, but refined (v. 25): "I will purely purge away thy dross. Vice shall be suppressed and oppressors deprived of their power to do mischief." The reformation of a people is God's own work: "I will turn my hand upon thee; I will do that for the reviving of religion which I did at first for the planting of it." He does it by blessing them with good magistrates and good ministers of state (v. 26): "I will restore thy judges as at the first, to put the laws in execution against evil-doers, and thy counsellors, to transact public affairs, as at the beginning." He does it (v. 27), by planting in men's minds principles of justice and governing their lives by those principles. Men may do much by external restraints; but God does it effectually by the influences of his Spirit. All the redeemed of the Lord shall be converts, and their conversion is their redemption: "Her converts, or those that return of her (so the margin), shall be redeemed with righteousness." The reviving of a people's virtue is the restoring of their honour: Afterwards thou shalt be called the city of righteousness, the faithful city. Those that hate to be reformed shall be destroyed and not chastened only. The openly profane that have quite cast off all religion, and the hypocrites that live wicked lives under the cloak of a religious profession shall both be destroyed together. And those that forsake the Lord, to whom they had formerly joined themselves, shall be consumed, as the water in the conduit-pipe is soon consumed when it is cut off from the fountain. Their idols shall not be able to help them, the oaks which they have desired, and the gardens which they have chosen; that is, the images which they have worshipped in their groves and under the green trees, for which they forsook the true God, and which they worshipped privately in their own gardens. This was the practice of the transgressors and the sinners; but they shall be ashamed of it, not with a show of repentance, but of despair, v. 29. They shall be ashamed of their idols; for the idols themselves shall go into captivity, ch. xlvi. 1, 2. They shall not be able to help themselves (v. 31): "Even the strong man shall be as tow, not only soon broken and pulled to pieces, but easily catching fire; and his work (so the margin reads it), shall be as a spark to his own tow."

Now all this is applicable to, 1. The blessed work of reformation which was wrought in Hezekiah's time after the abominable corruptions of the reign of Ahaz. 2. To their return out of their captivity in Babylon. 3. To the gospel-kingdom and the pouring out of the Spirit, by which the New Testament church should be made a new Jerusalem, a city of righteousness. 4. To the second coming of Christ, when he shall thoroughly purge his floor.

CHAP. II

With this chapter begins a new sermon, which is continued in the two following chapters. The subject is Judah and Jerusalem, ver. 1. In this chapter the prophet speaks, I. Of the glory of the Christians, Jerusalem, the gospel-church in the latter days, in the accession of many to it (ver. 2, 3), and the great peace it should introduce into the world (ver. 4), whence he infers the duty of the house of Jacob, ver. 5. II. Of the shame of the Jews, Jerusalem, as it then was, and as it would be after its rejection of the gospel and being rejected of God. 1. Their sin was their shame, ver. 6-9. 2. God by his judgments would humble them and put them to shame, ver. 10-17. 3. They should themselves be ashamed of their confidence in their idols and in an arm of flesh, ver. 18-22.

Verses 1-5

The particular title of this sermon (v. 1) is the same with the general title of the book (ch. i. 1), only that what is there called the vision is here called the word which Isaiah saw.

This sermon begins with the prophecy relating to the last days, the days of the Messiah, when his kingdom should be set up in the world, at the latter end of the Mosaic economy. In the last days of the earthly Jerusalem, just before the destruction of it, this heavenly Jerusalem should be erected, Heb. xii. 22; Gal. iv. 26. Gospel times are the last days. For, 1. They were a great while waited for by the Old Testament saints, and came at last. 2. We are not to look for any dispensation of divine grace but what we have in the gospel, Gal. i. 8, 9. 3. We are to look for the second coming of Jesus Christ at the end of time, 1 John ii. 18.

The prophet here foretells,

I. The planting of the Christian religion in the world. Christianity shall then be the mountain of the Lord's house. The gospel church shall then be the rendezvous of all the spiritual seed of Abraham. Now it is here promised, 1. That Christianity shall be openly preached and professed; it shall be prepared (so the margin reads it) in the top of the mountains, in the view and hearing of all. What the apostles did was not done in a corner, Acts xxvi. 26. It was the lighting of a beacon, the setting up of a standard. 2. That it shall be firmly fixed and rooted; it shall be established on the top of the everlasting mountains, built upon a rock, so that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it, unless they could pluck up mountains by the roots. 3. That it shall not only overcome all opposition, but overtop all competition; it shall be exalted above the hills. This wisdom of God in a mystery shall outshine all the wisdom of this world, all its philosophy and all its politics.

II. The bringing of the Gentiles into it. 1. The nations shall be admitted into it, even the uncircumcised, who were forbidden to come into the courts of the temple at Jerusalem. 2. All nations shall flow into it; having liberty of access, multitudes shall embrace the Christian faith.

III. The mutual assistance and encouragement which this confluence of converts shall give to one another. "Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord; though it be uphill and against heart, yet it is the mountain of the Lord, who will assist the ascent of our souls towards him." The gospel church is here called, not only the mountain of the Lord, but the house of the God of Jacob; for in it God's covenant with Jacob and his praying seed is kept up and has its accomplishment. It is worth while to take pains to go up to his holy mountain to be taught his ways, and those who are willing to take that pains shall never find it labour in vain. "If he will teach us his ways, we will walk in his paths; if he will let us know our duty, we will by his grace make conscience of doing it."

IV. The means by which this shall be brought about: Out of Zion shall go forth the law, the New Testament law, the law of Christ, as of old the law of Moses from Mount Sinai, even the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. The gospel is a law, a law of faith; it is the word of the Lord. And in the temple on Mount Zion the disciples preached the gospel, Acts v. 20. And it was by this gospel, which took rise from Jerusalem, that the gospel church was established on the top of the mountains.

V. The erecting of the kingdom of the Redeemer in the world: He shall judge among the nations. By his Spirit working on men's consciences he shall judge, and try men and check them; his kingdom is spiritual, and not of this world.

VI. The great peace which should be the effect of the success of the gospel in the world (v. 4): They shall beat their swords into ploughshares. Nation shall then not lift up sword against nation, as now they do, neither shall they learn war any more, for they shall have no more occasion for it. The design and tendency of the gospel are to make peace and to slay all enmities. It has in it the most powerful obligations and inducements to peace. The gospel of Christ, as far as it prevails, disposes men to be peaceable, softens men's spirits, and sweetens them; and the love of Christ, shed abroad in the heart, constrains men to love one another. The primitive Christians were famous for brotherly love; their very adversaries took notice of it. Here is a practical inference drawn from all this (v. 5): O house of Jacob! come you, and let us walk in the light of the Lord. By the house of Jacob is meant either Israel according to the flesh, or spiritual Israel, all that are brought to the God of Jacob. Will God teach us his ways? Will he show us his glory in the face of Christ? Let us walk comfortably in the light of this peace. Shall there be no more war? Let us then go on our way rejoicing.

Verses 6–9

I. Israel's doom. This is set forth in two words, the first and the last of this paragraph; but they are two dreadful words. 1. Their case (v. 6): Therefore thou hast forsaken thy people. Miserable is the condition of that people whom God has forsaken. This was the deplorable case of the Jewish church after they had rejected Christ. Your house is left unto you desolate, Matt. xxiii. 38. 2. Their case desperate, wholly desperate (v. 9): Therefore forgive them not. This prophetical prayer amounts to a threatening that they should not be forgiven. This refers not to particular persons (many of them repented and were pardoned), but to the body of that nation.

II. Israel's doom, and the reasons upon which it is grounded. In general, it is sin that provokes God to forsake his people. The particular sins which the prophet specifies are such as abounded among them at that time. There was a partial and temporary rejection of them by the captivity in Babylon, which was a type of their final destruction by the Romans, and which the sins here mentioned brought upon them.

1. God set them apart for himself, as a peculiar people, dignified above all other people (Num. xxiii. 9); but they were replenished from the east; they naturalized foreigners, and encouraged them to settle among them, and mingled with them, Hos. vii. 8. Their country was peopled with Syrians and Chaldeans, Moabites and Ammonites, and with them they admitted the fashions and customs of those nations, and pleased themselves in the children of strangers. Thus did they profane their crown and their covenant.

2. God gave them his oracles, the scriptures and the seers, but they slighted these, and became soothsayers like the Philistines, introduced their arts of divination, and hearkened to those who by the stars, or the clouds, or the flight of birds, or the entrails of beasts, pretended to discover things secret or foretell things to come. The Philistines were noted diviners, 1 Sam. vi. 2.

3. God assured them that he would be their wealth and strength; but, distrusting his power and promise, they made gold their hope, and furnished themselves with horses and chariots, and relied upon them for their safety, v. 7. It is not having silver and gold, horses and chariots, that is a provocation to God, but desiring them insatiably.

4. God himself was their God, and instituted ordinances of worship for them; but they slighted both him and his institutions, v. 8. Their land was full of idols; every city had its god (Jer. xi. 13). Those that love idols will multiply them; so sottish were they that they worshipped the work of their own hands. God had enriched them with silver and gold, and yet of that silver and gold they made idols.

5. God had put honour upon them; but they basely diminished themselves (v. 9): The mean man boweth down to his idol, a thing below the meanest that has any spark of reason left. Nor is it only the illiterate that do this, but even the great man forgets his grandeur and humbles himself to worship idols, deifies men no better than himself, and consecrates stones so much baser than himself.

The prophet here goes on to show what a desolation would be brought upon their land when God should have forsaken them. This may refer particularly to their destruction by the Chaldeans first, and afterwards by the Romans.

I. To startle and awaken sinners, who bid defiance to God and his judgments (v. 10): "Enter into the rock; God will attack you with such terrible judgments that you shall be forced to enter into the rock, and hide yourself in the dust, for fear of the Lord. You shall lose all your courage, and tremble at the shaking of a leaf." To the same purport, v. 19. They shall go into the holes of the rocks, and into the caves of the earth, the darkest the deepest places. It was so particularly at the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans (Luke xxiii. 30) and of the persecuting pagan powers, Rev. vi. 16. And all for fear of the Lord, and of the glory of his majesty. Those that will not fear God and flee to him will be forced to fear him and flee from him to a refuge of lies. It will be in vain to think of finding refuge in the caves of the earth when the earth itself is shaken; there will be no shelter then but in God and in things above.

II. To humble and abase proud sinners, v. 11: The lofty looks of man shall be humbled. It is repeated (v. 17), The loftiness of man shall be bowed down. Men's haughtiness will be brought down, either by the grace of God convincing them of the evil of their pride, and clothing them with humility, or by the providence of God depriving them of all those things they were proud of and laying them low. This shall be done: because the Lord alone will be exalted. This shall be done: by humbling judgments, that shall mortify men, and bring them down (v. 12): The day of the Lord of hosts, the day of his wrath and judgment, shall be upon everyone that is proud. This day of the Lord is here said to be upon all the cedars of Lebanon, that are high and lifted up. Here the day of the Lord is said to be upon the cedars, those of Lebanon, that were the straightest and stateliest,—upon the oaks, those of Bashan, that were the strongest and sturdiest, —upon the natural elevations, the high mountains and the hills that are lifted up (v. 14), that overtop the valleys and seem to push the skies,—and upon the artificial fastnesses, every high tower and every fenced wall, v. 15. Understand these, 1. As representing the proud people themselves, that are in their own apprehensions like the cedars and the oaks, firmly rooted, and not to be stirred by any storm, and looking on all around them as shrubs. The highest hills are most exposed to lightning. These vaunting men, who are as high towers in which the noisy bells are hung,—these fenced walls, that fortify themselves with their native hardiness, and intrench themselves in their fastnesses—shall be brought down. 2. As particularizing the things they are proud of, and of which they make their boast. He will take from them all their armour wherein they trusted. They were proud of their trade abroad; but the day of the Lord shall be upon all the ships of Tarshish; they shall founder at sea or be ship-wrecked in the harbour. The day of the Lord shall be upon all pleasant pictures, the curious painting they brought home in their ships from other countries.

III. To make idolaters ashamed of their idols, and of the respect they have paid to them (v. 18):

The idols he shall utterly abolish. When the Lord alone shall be exalted (v. 17) he will not only pour contempt upon proud men, but much more upon all pretended deities. Their friends shall desert them; their enemies shall destroy them. They cannot secure themselves, so far are they from being able to secure their worshippers. Their worshippers shall abandon them, either from a conviction of their falsehood or from a sad experience of their inability to help them, v. 20. When men are themselves frightened by the judgments of God into the holes of the rocks, they shall cast their idols, which they have made their gods and hoped to make their friends in the time of need, to the moles and to the bats. God can make men sick of those idols that they have been most fond of. Covetous men make silver and gold their idols, money their god; but the time may come when they may feel it as much their burden as ever they made it their confidence. There was a time when the mariners threw the wares, and even the wheat, into the sea (Jonah i. 5; Acts xxvii. 38). The darkest holes, where the moles and the bats lodge, are the fittest places for idols, that have eyes and see not. It is possible that sin may be both loathed and left and yet not truly repented of out of any love to God, but only from a slavish fear of his wrath.

IV. To make those that have trusted in an arm of flesh ashamed of their confidence (v. 22): "Cease from man. How weak man is: His breath is in his nostrils, puffed out every moment, soon gone for good and all. Put not your trust in man. Let not him be your fear, let not him be your hope; but look up to the power of God, to which all the powers of men are subject and subordinate; let your hope be in the Lord your God."

CHAP. III

The prophet, in this chapter, goes on to foretell the desolations that were coming upon Judah and Jerusalem for their sins, both that by the Babylonians and that which completed their ruin by the Romans. God threatens, I. To deprive them of all the supports both of their life and of their government, ver. 1–3. II. To leave them to fall into confusion and disorder, ver. 4, 5, 12. III. To deny them the blessing of magistracy, ver. 6–8. IV. To strip the daughters of Zion of their ornaments, ver. 17–24. V. To lay all waste by the sword of war, ver. 25, 26. The sins that provoked God were, 1. Their defiance of God, ver. 8. 2. Their impudence, ver 9. 3. The abuse of power to oppression and tyranny, ver. 12–15. 4. The pride of the daughters of Zion, ver. 16. In the midst of the chapter the prophet is directed (1) To assure good people that it should be well with them, ver. 10. (2) To assure wicked people that, however God might, in judgment, remember mercy, yet it should go ill with them, ver. 11.

Verses 1–8

God was now about to ruin all their creature-confidences, so that they should meet with nothing but disappointments in all their expectations from them (v. 1): The stay and the staff shall be taken away, all their supports. Their church and kingdom had now grown old and were going to decay, and they were (after the manner of aged men, Zech. viii. 4) leaning on a staff: now God threatens to take away their staff. St. Jerome refers this to the sensible decay of the Jewish nation after they had crucified our Saviour, Rom. xi. 9, 10. I rather take it as a warning to all nations not to provoke God.

I. Bread is the staff of life: but God can take away the whole stay of bread and the whole stay of water; and it is just with him to do so when that which was given to be provision for the life is made provision for the lusts. He can take away the bread and the water by withholding the rain, Deut. xxviii. 23, 24. He can take away the stay of bread and the stay of water by withholding his blessing, by which man lives. Christ is the bread of life and the water of life; if he be our stay, we shall find that this is a good part not to be taken away, John iv. 14; vi. 27.

II. Their army—their generals, and commanders shall be taken away. The mighty man, and the man of war, and even the inferior officer, the captain of fifty, shall be removed. Let not the strong man therefore glory in his strength, nor any people trust too much to their mighty men.

III. Their ministers of state, their learned men, their politicians, their clergy, also should be taken away—the judges, the prophets, the prudent, who were assistants to the judges, the diviners, who used unlawful arts, the ancients, elders in age, in office. When the whole stay is to be broken, the cunning artificer too shall be taken away; and the last is the eloquent orator, the man skilful of speech, who in some cases may do good service. Moses cannot speak well, but Aaron can.

IV. It is the business of the sovereign to bear up the pillars of the land, Ps. lxxv. 3. But it is here threatened that this stay should fail them. When the mighty men and the prudent are removed children shall be their princes—children in age, who must be under tutors and governors, children in understanding and disposition, childish men, no more fit to rule than a child in the cradle. These shall rule over them, with all the folly, fickleness, and frowardness, of a child.

V. The union of the subjects among themselves, their good order and the good understanding is here threatened. God would send an evil spirit among them too (as Judges ix. 23), which would make them unneighbourly one towards another (v. 5): "The people shall be oppressed every one by his neighbour, and their princes, being children, will take no care to restrain the oppressors or relieve the oppressed." It is as ill an omen to a people as can be when the rising generation are untractable and ungovernable.

VI. The government shall go a-begging, v. 6. It is taken for granted that there is no way of redressing all these grievances, and bringing things into order again, but by good magistrates, who shall be invested with power by common consent, and shall exert that power for the good of the community. The case is represented as very deplorable, and things as having come to a sad pass; for children being their princes, every man will think himself fit to prescribe who shall be a magistrate. A man shall take hold by violence of one to make him a ruler; he shall urge it upon his brother. It will be looked upon as ground sufficient for the preferring of a man to be a ruler that he has clothing better than his neighbours. It would have been some sense to have said, "Thou hast wisdom, integrity, experience; be thou our ruler." But it was a jest to say, Thou hast clothing; be thou our ruler. Those who are thus pressed to come into office will swear themselves off, because they know themselves unable to bear the charges of the office (v. 7): He shall swear (shall lift up the hand, the ancient ceremony used in taking an oath) I will not be a healer; make not me a ruler. Rulers must be healers, and good rulers will be so; they must study to unite their subjects, and not widen the differences that are among them. But why will he not be a ruler? Because in my house is neither bread nor clothing. It was a sign that the case of the nation was very bad when nobody was willing to accept a place in the government of it. God brought things to this sad pass, not for want of goodwill to the country. Jerusalem is ruined and Judah is fallen; and they may thank themselves. They have brought their destruction upon their own heads, for their tongue and their doings are against the Lord; in word and action they broke the law of God. They provoked him to his face, as if the more they knew of his glory the greater pride they took in slighting it.

Verses 9–15

God proceeds in his controversy with his people.

I. It was for sin that God contended with them; if they vex themselves they will see that they must thank themselves: Woe unto their souls! For they have rewarded evil unto themselves. Alas for their souls! (so it may be read, in a way of lamentation), for they have procured evil to themselves, v. 9. They had grown impudent, v. 9. This hardens men against repentance as much as anything. Those that are past shame (we say) are past grace, and then past hope (v. 12): "Those who lead thee (the princes, priests, and prophets) mislead thee; they cause thee to err." Their judges, who should have patronised and protected the oppressed, were themselves the greatest oppressors, v. 14, 15. The elders of the people, and the princes have eaten up the vineyard. God's vineyard, which they were appointed to be the dressers and keepers of, they burnt (so the word signifies). God reasons with these great men (v. 15): "What mean you, that you beat my people in pieces? Do you think you had power given you for such a purpose as this?" You grind the faces of the poor; you put them to as much pain and terror as if they were ground in a mill.

II. In this controversy God himself is the prosecutor (v. 13): The Lord stands up to plead, and he stands to judge the people, for those that were oppressed; and he will enter into judgment with the princes, v. 14. The greatest of men cannot exempt themselves from the scrutiny and sentence of God's judgment. The indictment is proved: "Look upon the oppressors, and the show of their countenance witnesses against them (v. 9); look upon the oppressed, and you see how their faces are battered and abused," v. 15. To punish those that had abused their power God sets those over them that had not sense to use their power: Children are their oppressors, and women rule over them (v. 12), men that have as weak judgments and strong passions as women and children. Had they been righteous, it would have been well with them; but, if it be ill with them, it is because they are wicked and will be so (v. 10, 11). When the whole stay of bread is taken away, yet in the day of famine the righteous shall be satisfied; they shall eat the fruit of their doings—they shall have the testimony of their consciences that they kept themselves pure from iniquity, and therefore the common calamity is not to them what it is to others. There is a woe to wicked people, and it shall be ill with them.

Verses 16–26

The prophet's business was to show all sorts of people what they had contributed to the national guilt and what share they must expect in the national judgments that were coming. Here he reproves and warns the daughters of Zion.

I. The sin charged upon the daughters of Zion, v. 16. Two things they here stand indicted for—haughtiness and wantonness. They discovered the disposition of their mind by their gait and gesture. They are haughty, for they walk with stretched-forth necks, that they may seem tall. Their eyes are wanton, deceiving (so the word is). They affect a formal starched way of going, mincing, or nicely tripping. They make a tinkling with their feet, having, as some think, little bells upon their shoes. These were the daughters of Zion who should have behaved with the gravity that becomes women professing godliness.

II. The punishments threatened for this sin; and they answer the sin as face answers to face in a glass, v. 17, 18. 1. They walked with stretched-forth necks, but God will smite with a scab the crown of their head, which shall make them ashamed to show their heads, being obliged to cut off their hair. 2. They cared not what they laid out in great variety of fine clothes; but God will reduce them to such poverty and distress that they shall not have clothes sufficient to cover their nakedness. 3. They were extremely proud of their ornaments; but God will strip them of those ornaments, when their houses shall be plundered, their treasures rifled, and they themselves led into captivity. It is not at all material to enquire what sort of ornaments these were. Fashions alter and so do the names of them. Many of these things, we may suppose, were ridiculous, and, if they had not been in fashion, would have been hooted at. Those things that were decent and convenient, as the linen, the hoods, and the veils, needed not to be provided in such abundance and variety.

III. They were very nice about their clothes; but God would make those bodies of theirs a reproach and burden to them (v. 24): Instead of sweet smell (those tablets, or boxes, of perfume, houses of the soul or breath, as they are called, v. 20, margin) there shall be stink, garments grown filthy with being long worn. Instead of a rich embroidered girdle used to make the clothes sit tight, there shall be a rent; old rotten clothes rent into rags. Instead of well-set hair, there shall be baldness, the hair being plucked off or shaven, as was usual in times of great affliction (ch. xv. 2; Jer. xvi. 6), or in great servitude, Ezek. xxix. 18. Instead of a stomacher, or sash, there shall be a girding of sackcloth, in token of deep humiliation; and burning instead of beauty. Those that had a good complexion when they are carried into captivity shall be tanned and sunburnt; the best faces are soonest injured by the weather. From all this let us learn not to affect that which is gay and costly. There shall be none to be charmed by them (v. 25): Thy men shall fall by the sword, and thy mighty in the war. And, when Zion's guards are cut off, no marvel that Zion's gates lament and mourn (v. 26). The city itself, being desolate, shall sit upon the ground like a disconsolate widow.

CHAP. IV

In this chapter we have, I. A threatening of the paucity and scarceness of men (ver. 1). II. A promise of the restoration of Jerusalem's peace and purity, righteousness and safety, in the days of the Messiah, ver. 2–6 Thus, in wrath, mercy is remembered.

Verse 1

Here we have the effect and consequence of that great slaughter of men. Providence has so wisely ordered that, on an average of years, there is nearly an equal number of males and females born into the world, yet, through the devastations made by war, there should scarcely be one man in seven left alive. As there are deaths attending the bringing forth of children, which are peculiar to the woman, there are deaths peculiar to men, those by the sword perhaps devour more than child-bed does. It is foretold that there should be seven women to one man. By reason of the scarcity of men, whereas men ordinarily make their court to the women, the women should now take hold of the men. Seven should now, by consent, become the wives of one man,—and that whereas by the law the husband was obliged to provide food and raiment for his wife (Exod. xxi. 10), these women will be bound to support themselves; they will eat bread of their own earning, and wear apparel of their own working, and the man they court shall be at no expense, only they desire to be called his wives, to take away the reproach of a single life. They are willing to be wives upon any terms. All their care was to get husbands—modesty was forgotten, and with them the reproach of vice was nothing to the reproach of virginity.

Verses 2–6

By the foregoing threatenings everything looks melancholy. But here the sun breaks out from behind the cloud. Many exceedingly great and precious promises we have in these verses, giving assurance of comfort, and these certainly point at the kingdom of the Messiah, and the great redemption to be wrought out by him, under the figure of the restoration of Judah and Jerusalem by the reforming reign of Hezekiah after Ahaz and the return out of their captivity in Babylon; to both these events the passage may have some reference, but chiefly to Christ.

I. God will raise up a righteous branch, which shall produce fruits of righteousness (v. 2): In that day, when Jerusalem shall be destroyed, and the Jewish nation dispersed, the kingdom of the Messiah shall be set up.

1. Christ himself shall be exalted. He is the branch of the Lord; it is one of his prophetical names, my servant the branch (Zech. iii. 8; vi. 12), a rod out of the stem of Jesse and a branch out of his roots (ch. xi. 1). The ancient Chaldee paraphrase here reads, The Christ, or Messiah, of the Lord. He shall himself be advanced to the glory which he had with the Father before the world was.

2. His gospel shall be embraced. The success of the gospel is the fruit of the branch of the Lord; all the graces and comforts of the gospel spring from Christ. But it is called the fruit of the earth because it sprang up in this world. We may understand it of both the persons and the things that are the products of the gospel. If the branch of the Lord be beautiful and glorious in our eyes, even the fruit of the earth also will be excellent and comely, because then we may take it as the fruit of the promise, Ps. xxxvii. 16; 1 Tim. iv. 8.

II. God will reserve to himself a holy seed, v. 3. When the generality shall be cut off as withered branches, by their own unbelief, yet some shall be left. 1. This is a remnant such as are written among the living. Those that are kept alive in killing times were written for life in the book of divine Providence, written in the Lamb's book of life, Rev. xiii. 8. All that were written among the living shall be found among the living, every one; for of all that were given to Christ he will lose none. 2. It is a remnant under the dominion of grace; for everyone that is written among the living shall be called holy, and shall be accepted of God accordingly.

III. God will reform his church and will rectify and amend whatever is amiss in it, v. 4. Then the remnant shall be called holy, when the Lord shall have washed away their filth, washed it from among them by cutting off the wicked persons, washed it from within them by purging out the wicked thing. Jerusalem, though the holy city, needed reformation. By the daughters of Zion may be meant the country towns and villages, which were related to Jerusalem as the mother-city, and which needed reformation. The filth shall be washed away; for wickedness is filthiness, particularly blood-shed. The Lord shall do it. Reformation-work is God's work. But how? By the judgment of his providence the sinners were destroyed; but it is by the Spirit of his grace that they are reformed and converted. The Spirit herein acts, enlightening the mind, convincing the conscience, guiding us, separating between the precious and the vile, quickening and invigorating the affections, and making men zealous in good work.

IV. God will protect his church, and all that belong to it (v. 5, 6). Those that are sanctified are well fortified.

1. Their tabernacles shall be defended, v. 5, tabernacles of their rest, their houses, where they worship God with their families. God takes particular care of the dwelling-places of his people, the poorest cottage as well as the stateliest palace. Their assemblies or tabernacles of meeting for religious worship—all the congregations of Christians, though but two or three met together in Christ's name, shall be taken under the special protection of heaven. This writ of protection is drawn up in a similitude taken from the safety of the camp of Israel when they marched through the wilderness. God will give to the Christian church as real proofs of his care of them, as he then gave to Israel. Though miracles have ceased, yet God is the same to the New Testament church that he was to Israel of old. A similitude is taken from the outside cover of rams' skins and badgers' skins that was upon the curtains of the tabernacle, as if every dwelling-place and every assembly were as dear to God as that tabernacle was: Upon all the glory shall be a defence, to save it from wind and weather. Gospel truths and ordinances, the scriptures and the ministry, are the church's glory; and upon all this glory there is a defence. If God himself be the glory in the midst of it, he will himself be a wall of fire round about it, impenetrable and impregnable. Grace in the soul is the glory of it, and those that have it are kept by the power of God as in a stronghold, 1 Pet. i. 5. The divine power and goodness shall be a tabernacle to all the saints. God himself will be their hiding-place (Ps. xxxii. 7); they shall be at home in him, Ps. xci. 9. God is a refuge to his people in all weathers.

CHAP. V

In this chapter the prophet, in God's name, shows the people of God their transgressions, and the judgments to be brought upon them for their sins. I. By a parable of an unfruitful vineyard, representing the favours God had bestowed, their disappointing his expectations from them, and the ruin they deserved, ver. 1–7. II. By an enumeration of the sins among them, with a threatening of punishments that should answer to the sins. 1. Covetousness, and greediness, which shall be punished with famine, ver. 8–10. 2. Rioting, revelling, and drunkenness (ver. 11, 12, 22, 23), which shall be punished with captivity, ver. 13–17. 3. Presumption and defying the justice of God, ver. 18, 19. 4. Confounding the distinctions between virtue and vice, and so undermining the principles of religion, ver. 20. 5. Self-conceit, ver. 21. 6. Perverting justice, for which great and general desolation is threatened (ver. 24, 25), which should be effected by a foreign invasion (ver. 26–30), referring perhaps to the havoc made not long after by Sennacherib's army.

Verses 1–7

God, to awaken sinners to repentance, speaks sometimes in plain terms and sometimes in parables, sometimes in prose and sometimes in verse, as here. God the Father dictates it to the honour of Christ his well beloved Son, whom he has constituted Lord of the vineyard. The prophet sings it to the honour of Christ. The Old Testament prophets were friends of the bridegroom. Christ is God's beloved Son and our beloved Saviour. This parable was put into a song that it might be the more moving and the more easily learned, remembered, and transmitted to posterity. It is an exposition of the song of Moses (Deut. xxxii), showing that what he then foretold was now fulfilled.

I. The great things which God had done for the Jewish church and nation. The soil they were planted in was a very fruitful hill, the horn of the son of oil: so it is in the margin. There was plenty, and there was dainty: they did there eat the fat and drink the sweet. Observe further what God did for this vineyard. 1. He fenced it. If they had not thrown down their fence, no inroad could have been made upon them, Ps. cxxv. 2; cxxi. 4. 2. He gathered the stones out of it. He proffered his grace to take away the stony heart. 3. He planted it with the choicest vine, set up a pure religion among them. 4. He built a tower in the midst of it for defence. The temple was this tower. 5. He made a wine-press therein, set up his altar, to which the sacrifices, as the fruits of the vineyard, should be brought.

II. The disappointment of his just expectations: He looked that it should bring forth grapes. God expects vineyard-fruit from those that enjoy vineyard-privileges. Good purposes and good beginnings are good things, but not enough; there must be fruit, a good heart and a good life, vineyard fruit, thoughts and affections, words and actions, agreeable to the Spirit. His expectations are frustrated: It brought forth wild grapes. 1. Wild grapes are the fruits of the corrupt nature. 2. Wild grapes are hypocritical performances in religion, that look like grapes.

III. An appeal to themselves whether God must not be justified and they condemned, v. 3, 4. O inhabitants of Jerusalem, and men of Judah! judge, I pray you, betwixt me and my vineyard. Here is a challenge to show wherein God had been wanting to them: What could have been done more to my vineyard, that I have not done in it? They had everything requisite. "Wherefore, what reason can be given why it should bring forth wild grapes, when I looked for grapes?"

IV. Their doom read, and sentence passed upon them (v. 5, 6): "And now go to, since nothing can be offered in excuse of the crime or arrest of the judgment, I will tell you what I am now determined to do to my vineyard. I will be troubled with it no more; in short, it shall cease to be a vineyard, and be turned into a wilderness: the church of the Jews shall be unchurched. I will take away the hedge thereof, and then it will become bare." God will remove all their defences and they will become an easy prey to their enemies. They shall no longer have the face of a vineyard, the form and shape of a church and commonwealth, but shall be levelled and laid waste. Those who would not bring forth good fruit should bring forth none. The curse of barrenness is the punishment of the sin of barrenness. This had its partial accomplishment in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, its full accomplishment in the final rejection of the Jews, and has its frequent accomplishment in the departure of God's Spirit from those who have long resisted him.

V. The explanation of this parable, or a key to it (v. 7). The vineyard is the house of Israel, the body of the people, incorporated in one church and commonwealth, and the vines are the men of Judah; these he had dealt graciously with, and from them he expected suitable returns. The grapes that were expected and the wild grapes that were produced: He looked for judgment and righteousness, that the people should be honest and the magistrates strictly administer justice. This might reasonably be expected; but the fact was quite otherwise; instead of judgment there was the cruelty of the oppressors, and instead of righteousness the cry of the oppressed.

Verses 8–17

Eagerness of the world, and indulgence of the flesh, are the two sins against which the prophet, in God's name, here denounces woes. These were sins which then abounded among the men of Judah, some of the wild grapes they brought forth (v. 4).

I. Here is a woe to those who set their hearts upon the wealth of the world (v. 8), who join house to house and lay field to field, till there be no place, no room for anybody to live by them. If they could succeed, they monopolize possessions and preferments. They are inordinate in their desires to enrich themselves. They are herein careless of others. They care not what hardships they put upon those that they have power over, nor what wicked arts they use to heap up treasure to themselves. The punishment of this sin is that neither the houses nor the fields should turn to any account, v. 9, 10. The houses they were so fond of should be untenanted, should stand long empty: Many houses shall be desolate. the people that should dwell in them, being cut off by sword, famine, or pestilence, or carried into captivity. We have a saying, That fools build houses for wise men to live in; but sometimes, as the event proves, they are built for no man to live in. The fields they were so fond of should be unfruitful (v. 10): Ten acres of vineyard shall yield only such grapes as will make but one bath of wine (about eight gallons), and the seed of a homer, a bushel's sowing, shall yield but an ephah, the tenth part of a homer; so that they should not have more than a tenth part of their seed again.

II. Here is a woe to those that dote upon the pleasures of sense, v. 11, 12. Sensuality ruins men as certainly as worldliness and oppression. The sinners against whom this woe is denounced are such as are given to drink. They sit at their cups all day, and continue till night, till wine inflame them—inflame their lusts. They are such as never give their mind to anything that is serious: They regard not the work of the Lord; they observe not his power, wisdom, and goodness, in those creatures which they abuse, nor the bounty of his providence in giving them those good things which they make the food and fuel of their lusts. It is here foretold they should be dislodged; the land should spew out these drunkards (v. 13): My people have therefore gone into captivity, because they have no knowledge; how should they have knowledge when by their excessive drinking they make sots and fools of themselves? They should be impoverished, and come to want that which they had wasted and abused to excess: Even their glory are men of famine, subject to it and slain by it; and their multitude are dried up with thirst. Multitudes should be cut off by famine and sword (v. 14): Therefore hell has enlarged herself. Tophet, the common burying-place, proves too little; so many are there to be buried that they shall be forced to enlarge it. They should be humbled and abased, and all their honours laid in the dust. God shall be glorified, v. 16. He shall be exalted in the judgment and righteousness of these dispensations. Good people shall be relieved and succoured (v. 17): Then shall the lambs feed after their manner: the meek ones of the earth, who followed the Lamb, who were persecuted and put into fear by those proud oppressors, shall feed quietly, and there shall be none to make them afraid. The country shall be laid waste, and become a prey to the neighbours: The waste places of the fat ones, the possessions of those rich men that lived at their ease, shall be eaten by strangers that were nothing akin to them.

Verses 18–30

I. Sins described which will bring judgments upon the men of Judah who lived at that time, and though it may relate primarily to them, is intended for warning to all people, in all ages. Those are here said to be in a woeful condition,

1. Who are violent in their sinful pursuits (v. 18), who draw iniquity with cords of vanity, who take as much pains to sin as the cattle do that draw in a team. They think themselves as sure of compassing their wicked project as if they were pulling it towards them with strong cart-ropes; but they will prove cords of vanity, which will break when they come to any stress. Those that sin through infirmity are drawn away by sin; those that sin presumptuously draw iniquity to them, in spite of the oppositions of Providence and the checks of conscience. Some by sin pull God's judgments upon their own heads, as it were, with cart-ropes.

2. Who set the justice of God at defiance, and challenge the Almighty to do his worst (v. 19): They say, Let him make speed, and hasten his work. They ridicule the prophets, and banter them. They will not believe the revelation of God's wrath from heaven unless they see it executed. If God should appear against them, as he has threatened, yet they think themselves able to make their part good with him. "We have heard his word, but it is all talk; let him hasten his work, we shall shift for ourselves well enough."

3. Who confound the distinctions between moral good and evil, who call evil good and good evil (v. 20). Those do a great deal of wrong to God, and religion, and conscience, to their own souls, and to the souls of others, who call drunkenness good fellowship, and covetousness good husbandry, and on the other hand, call seriousness ill-nature, and who say all manner of evil falsely concerning godliness.

4. Who though they are guilty of such gross mistakes have a great opinion of their own judgments (v. 21): They are wise in their own eyes; they think they can outwit Infinite Wisdom and countermine Providence itself.

5. Who glory that they are able to bear a great deal of strong liquor without being overcome by it (v. 22), who are mighty to drink wine, and use their strength in the service of their lusts. Drunkards ungratefully abuse their bodily strength, which God has given them for good purposes, and by degrees cannot but weaken it.

6. Who, as judges, pervert justice, v. 23. They justify the wicked for reward, and find some pretence or other to clear him from his guilt and shelter him from punishment; and they condemn the innocent, and take away their righteousness from them.

II. The judgments described, which these sins would bring upon them. The righteous God will take vengeance, v. 24–30. He had compared this people to a vine (v. 7), which, it was hoped, would be fruitful; but the grace of God was received in vain, and the root became rottenness, being dried up from beneath, and the blossom would blow off as dust. Sin weakens the strength, the root, of a people, so that they are easily rooted up; it defaces the beauty, the blossoms, of a people, and takes away the hopes of fruit. Sinners make themselves as stubble and chaff. As the fire devours the stubble, chaff is consumed, unhelped and unpitied. God does not reject men for every transgression of his law and word; but, when his word is despised and his law cast away, what can they expect but that God should utterly abandon them? The justice of God appoints it; for that is the anger of the Lord which is kindled against his people, his necessary vindication. He has stretched forth his hand against them. That hand which had many a time been stretched out for them against their enemies is now stretched out against them. When God comes forth in wrath against a people the hills tremble, fear seizes even their great men. What sight can be more frightful than the carcases of men thrown as dung (so the margin reads it) in the midst of the streets? This intimates that multitudes should be slain, not only soldiers in battle, but the inhabitants of their cities put to the sword in cold blood, and that the survivors should neither have hands nor hearts to bury them. This ruin should be done by a foreign enemy, that should lay all waste. Those who know him are not made use of to fulfil his counsel. If God set up his standard, he can incline men's hearts to enlist themselves under it, though perhaps they know not why or wherefore. Behold, they shall come with speed swiftly. This is described here in elegant and lofty expressions, v. 27–30. Though their marches be long, yet none among them shall be weary. Though the way be rough, yet none among them shall stumble. Though they be forced to keep constant watch, yet none shall slumber nor sleep. They shall not desire any rest or relaxation; they shall not put off their clothes, nor loose the girdle of their loins, but shall always have their belts on and swords by their sides. Not a latchet of their shoes shall be broken which they must stay to mend, as Joshua ix. 13. Their arms and ammunition shall all be fixed, and in good posture; their arrows sharp, and all their bows bent, none unstrung. Their horses and chariots of war shall all be fit for service; their horses so strong, that their hoofs shall be like flint, and the wheels of their chariots not broken, or battered, but swift like a whirlwind. All the soldiers shall be bold and daring (v. 29): Their roaring shall be like a lion, who with his roaring animates himself, and terrifies all about him. They shall roar like the roaring of the sea in a storm. There shall not be the least prospect of relief or succour. If the light is darkened in the heavens, how great is that darkness! If God hide his face, no marvel the heavens hide theirs and appear gloomy, Job xxxiv. 29.

CHAP. VI

Hitherto, Isaiah, having only a virtual and tacit commission, perhaps, having seen little success of his ministry, began to think of giving it up; and therefore God saw fit to renew his commission in such a manner as might encourage his zeal, though he seemed to labour in vain. In this chapter we have, I. A vision which Isaiah saw of the glory of God (ver. 1–4), the terror it put him into (ver. 5), and the relief given him against that terror by an assurance of the pardon of his sins, ver. 6, 7. II. A commission which Isaiah received to go as a prophet, in God's name (ver. 8), preaching to the impenitent (ver. 9–12), yet with a reservation of mercy for a remnant, ver. 13. And it was as to an evangelical prophet that these things were shown him and said to him.

Verses 1–4

The vision which Isaiah saw when he was, as is said of Samuel, established to be a prophet of the Lord (1 Sam. iii. 20), was intended to confirm his faith. Thus God appeared at first as a God of glory to Abraham (Acts vii. 2), and to Moses, Exod. iii. 2. Ezekiel's prophecies, and St. John's, begin with visions of the divine glory. Those who are to teach others the knowledge of God ought to be well acquainted with him themselves.

The vision was in the year that king Uzziah died, who had reigned as well as any of the kings of Judah, above fifty years. About the time that he died Isaiah saw this vision of God upon a throne. Israel's king dies, but Israel's God still lives. King Uzziah died a leper in an hospital, but the King of kings still sits upon his throne.

I. See God upon his throne, and that throne high and lifted up, not only above other thrones, as it transcends them, but over other thrones, as it rules them. Isaiah saw not Jehovah—the essence of God (no man has seen that, or can see it), but Adonai—his dominion. He saw the Lord Jesus; so this vision is explained John xii. 41, that Isaiah now saw Christ's glory. See the sovereignty of the Eternal Monarch: he sits upon a throne—a throne of glory, before which we must worship,—a throne of government, under which we must be subject,—and a throne of grace, to which we may come boldly.

II. See his temple, his church on earth, filled with the manifestations of his glory. His train, the skirts of his robes, filled the temple, the whole world (for it is all God's temple), or rather the Church, which is filled, enriched, and beautified with the tokens of God's special presence.

III. See the bright and blessed attendants on his throne (v. 2): Above the throne the seraphim stood, the holy angels, who are called seraphim—burners; for he makes his ministers a flaming fire, Ps. civ. 4. They burn in love to God, and zeal for his glory and against sin. It is the glory of the angels that they are seraphim, have heat proportionable to their light, have abundance, not only of divine knowledge, but of holy love. They had each of them six wings, not stretched upwards (as those whom Ezekiel saw, ch. i. 11), but, 1. Four were for covering; with the two upper wings they covered their faces, and with the two lowest wings they covered their feet. This bespeaks their great humility and reverence. They not only cover their feet, but even their faces. Two were made use of for flight; when they are sent on God's errands they fly swiftly (Dan. ix. 21). This teaches us to do the work of God with cheerfulness and expedition.

IV. Hear the song of praise, which the angels sing to the honour of him that sits on the throne, v. 3. With zeal and fervency—they cried aloud; and with unanimity—they cried one to another, without the least jarring voice to interrupt the harmony. The song was the same which is sung by the four living creatures, Rev. iv. 8. The church above is the same in its praises; there is no change of times or notes there. Here is one of his most glorious titles praised: he is the Lord of hosts, of all hosts; and one of his most glorious attributes, his holiness. Power, without purity to guide it, would be a terror to mankind. God's power was spoken twice (Ps. lxii. 11), but his holiness thrice, Holy, holy, holy. It may refer to the three persons in the Godhead, Holy Father, Holy Son, and Holy Spirit (for it follows, v. 8, Who will go for us?) or perhaps to that which was, and is, and is to come. The earth is full of his glory, of the glory of his power and purity; for he is holy in all his works, Ps. cxlv. 17.

V. Observe the tokens of terror with which the temple was filled, upon this vision of the divine glory, v. 4. The house was shaken; even the posts of the door, which were firmly fixed, moved at the voice of him that cried, at the voice of God, who called to judgment (Ps. l. 4). The house was darkened; it was filled with smoke, which was as a cloud spread upon the face of his throne (Job xxvi. 9). In the temple above, everything will be seen clearly. There God dwells in light; here he makes darkness his pavilion, 2 Chron. vi. 1.

Verses 5–8

I. The consternation that the prophet was put into by the vision which he saw of the glory of God (v. 5): Then said I, Woe is me! One would think, he should have said, "Happy am I, nothing now shall trouble me"; but, on the contrary, he cries out, "Woe is me! for I am undone."

1. What the prophet reflected upon in himself which terrified him: "I am undone because I am a man of unclean lips." Some think he refers particularly to some rash word he had spoken, or to his sinful silence in not reproving sin with boldness. But it may be taken more generally: I am a sinner; particularly, I have offended in word. We all have reason to bewail it before the Lord, (1) That we are of unclean lips ourselves; our lips are not consecrated to God. We are unworthy to take God's name into our lips. The impurity of our lips ought to be the grief of our souls, for by our words we shall be justified or condemned. (2) That we dwell among those who are so too. The disease is hereditary and epidemic, which is so far from lessening our guilt that it should rather increase our grief, considering that we have not done what we might have done for the cleansing of the pollution of other people's lips; we have rather learned their way and spoken their language, as Joseph in Egypt learned the courtier's oath, Gen. xlii. 16.

2. What gave occasion for these sad reflections: My eyes have seen the King, the Lord of hosts. We are undone if there be not a Mediator between us and this holy God, 1 Sam. vi. 20. Isaiah was thus humbled, to prepare him for the honour he was now to be called to as a prophet.

II. The silencing of the prophet's fears by the comfortable words, with which the angel answered him, v. 6, 7. One of the seraphim immediately flew to him, to purify him. Those that are struck down with the visions of God's glory shall soon be raised up again with the visits of his grace. Here was one of the seraphim dismissed, for a time, from the throne of God's glory, to be a messenger of his grace to a good man; and he came flying to him. To our Lord Jesus himself, in his agony, there appeared an angel from heaven, strengthening him, Luke xxii. 43. The seraph brought a live coal from the altar, and touched his lips with it to cleanse them. The blessed Spirit works as fire, Matt. iii. 11. The seraph put life into the prophet, for the way to purge the lips from the uncleanness of sin is to fire the soul with the love of God. "Lo, this has touched thy lips, to assure thee of this, that thy iniquity is taken away and thy sin purged. The guilt of thy sin is removed by pardoning mercy, the guilt of thy tongue-sins. Thy corrupt disposition to sin is removed by renewing grace; and therefore nothing can hinder thee from being accepted with God as a worshipper, or from being employed for God as a messenger to the children of men."

III. The renewing of the prophet's mission, v. 8. Here is a communication between God and Isaiah. How can we expect that God should speak by us if we never heard him speaking to us? God is here deliberating with himself: Whom shall I send? And who will go for us? Thus he would teach us that the sending forth of ministers is a work not to be done but upon mature deliberation. It puts an honour upon the ministry that, when God would send a prophet to speak in his name, he appeared in all the glories of the upper world. Whom shall I send? intimating that he would send them a prophet from among their brethren, Heb. ii. 17. God is pleased to send us his mind by men like ourselves, who are themselves concerned in the messages they bring. Those who are workers together with God are sinners and sufferers together with us. Who is sufficient? Such a degree of courage and concern for the souls of men, and withal such an insight into the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, are seldom to be met with. None are allowed to go for God but those who are sent by him, Rom. x. 15. It is Christ's work to put men into the ministry, 1 Tim. i. 12. The office seemed to go a-begging, yet Isaiah offered himself: "I will go, and leave the success to God. Here am I; send me." What he says denotes readiness: "Here am I, a volunteer, not pressed into the service." Behold me; so the word is. "Here I am, ready to encounter the greatest difficulties. I have set my face as a flint."

Verses 9–13

God takes Isaiah at his word, and here sends him on a strange errand—to foretell the ruin of his people and even to ripen them for that ruin. And this was to be a type of the state of the Jewish church in the days of the Messiah, when they should obstinately reject the gospel, and should thereupon be rejected of God. These verses are quoted in part, or referred to, six times, in the New Testament. Isaiah is here given to understand these four things:

1. That the generality of the people to whom he was sent would turn a deaf ear to his preaching, and wilfully shut their eyes against all the discoveries of the mind and will of God which he had to make to them (v. 9).

2. That, as they would not be made better by his ministry, they should be made worse by it; those that were wilfully blind should be judicially blinded (v. 10): "They will not understand or perceive thee, and therefore thou shalt be instrumental to make their heart fat, senseless, and sensual, and so to make their ears yet more heavy, and to shut their eyes the closer; so that, at length, their recovery and repentance will become utterly impossible." Even the word of God oftentimes proves a means of hardening sinners.

3. That the consequence of this would be their utter ruin, v. 11, 12. The prophet asks, "Lord, how long?" (an abrupt question): "Shall it always be thus? Must I and other prophets always labour in vain among them, and will things never be better?" In answer to this he is told that it should issue in the final destruction of the Jewish church and nation. "Their cities shall be uninhabited, and the land shall be untilled, desolate with desolation (as it is in the margin)." Spiritual judgments often bring temporal judgments upon persons and places. This was in part fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, but, the foregoing predictions being so expressly applied in the New Testament to the Jews in our Saviour's time, doubtless this points at the final destruction of that people by the Romans.

4. That yet a remnant should be reserved to be the monuments of mercy, v. 13. But in it shall be a tenth, a certain number, but a very small number in comparison with the multitude that shall perish in their unbelief. Concerning this tithe, this saved remnant, we are here told, (1) That they shall return (ch. vi. 13; x. 21), shall return from sin to God and duty, shall return out of captivity to their own land. (2) That they shall be eaten, that is, shall be accepted of God as the tithe was, which was meat in God's house, Mal. iii. 10. (3) That they shall be like a timber-tree in winter, which has life, though it has no leaves: As a teil-tree and as an oak, whose substance is in them even when they cast their leaves, so this remnant, though they may be stripped of their outward prosperity, shall yet recover themselves, as a tree in the spring, and flourish again. (4) That this distinguished remnant shall be the stay and support of the public interests. The holy seed in the soul is the substance of the man; a principle of grace reigning in the heart will keep life there; he that is born of God has his seed remaining in him, 1 John iii. 9. As the trees that grow on either side of the causeway (the raised way, or terrace-walk, that leads from the king's palace to the temple (1 Kings x. 5), support the causeway by keeping up the earth, which would otherwise be crumbling away, so the small residue of religious, serious, praying people, are the support of the state, and help to keep things together and save them from going to decay.

CHAP. VII

This chapter is an occasional sermon, in which the prophet sings both of mercy and judgment to those that did not perceive or understand either. Here is, I. The consternation that Ahaz was in upon an attempt of the confederate forces of Syria and Israel against Jerusalem, ver 1, 2. II. The assurance which God, by the prophet, sent him for his encouragement, that the attempt should be defeated and Jerusalem should be preserved, ver. 3–9. III The confirmation of this by a sign which God gave to Ahaz, ver. 10–16. IV. A threatening of the great desolation that God would bring upon Ahaz and his kingdom by the Assyrians, notwithstanding their escape from this present storm, because they went on still in their wickedness, ver. 17–25.

Verses 1–9

The prophet Isaiah had his commission renewed in the year that king Uzziah died, ch. vi. 1. Jotham his son reigned, and reigned well, sixteen years. All that time, no doubt, Isaiah prophesied as he was commanded, and yet we have not in this book any of his prophecies dated in the reign of Jotham; but this, which is put first, was in the days of Ahaz the son of Jotham.

I. A formidable design laid against Jerusalem by Rezin king of Syria and Pekah king of Israel, who had made descents upon Judah severally, 2 Kings xv. 37. But now, in the second or third year of the reign of Ahaz, they entered into an alliance against Judah. Because Ahaz, though he found the sword over his head, began his reign with idolatry, God delivered him into the hand of the king of Syria and of the king of Israel (2 Chron. xxviii. 5). Flushed with this victory, they went up towards Jerusalem to besiege it.

II. The great distress that Ahaz and his court were in when they received advice of this design: It was told the house of David that Syria and Ephraim had signed a league against Judah, v. 2. News being brought that the two armies of Syria and Israel had taken the field. The heart of Ahaz was moved with fear, and then no wonder that the heart of his people was so, as the trees of the wood are moved with the wind. Now that which caused this fright was the sense of guilt and the weakness of their faith. They had made God their enemy, and knew not how to make him their friend.

III. The orders given to Isaiah to encourage Ahaz in his distress, because he was a son of David and king of Judah. God had kindness for him for his father's sake, who must not be forgotten, and for his people's sake, who must not be abandoned. He ordered Isaiah to take his little son with him, because he carried a sermon in his name, Shear-jashub—A remnant shall return. This son was so called for the encouragement of those of God's people who were carried captive, assuring them that they should return. He directed him where he should find Ahaz, at the end of the conduit of the upper pool, where he was contriving how to order the water-works, so as to secure them to the city (ch. xxii. 9–11; 2 Chron. xxxii, 3, 4), or giving some necessary directions for the fortifying of the city. He put words in his mouth, else the prophet would not have known how to bring a message of good to such a bad man, but God intended it for the support of faithful Israelites. The prophet must rebuke their fears (v. 4): Take heed, and be quiet. Pluck up thy spirits and be courageous. He must teach them to despise their enemies, not in pride, or security, but in faith and dependence upon God. Ahaz's fear called them two powerful politic princes, for either of whom he was an unequal match. "No," says the prophet, "they are two tails of smoking firebrands; they are angry they are fierce, as fireballs, and they make one another worse by being in a confederacy, as sticks of fire put together burn the more violently. But they are only smoking firebrands, tails of smoking firebrands, in a manner burnt out already; their force is spent; you may put your foot on them, and tread them out." He must assure them that the present design of these high allies (so they thought themselves) against Jerusalem should certainly be defeated and come to nothing, v. 5–7. Judah had done them no wrong; they had no pretence to quarrel with Ahaz; but, without any reason, they said, Let us go up against Judah, and vex it. They count upon dividing the kingdom into two parts, one for the king of Israel, the other for the king of Syria, who had agreed in one viceroy—a king to be set in the midst of it, even the son of Tabeal, some obscure person, it is uncertain whether a Syrian or an Israelite. So sure were they of gaining their point that they divided the prey before they had caught it. God himself gives them his word that the attempt should not take effect (v. 7): Thus saith the Lord God, It shall not stand, neither shall it come to pass. They should neither of them enlarge their dominions, nor push their conquests any further: The head city of Syria is Damascus, and the head man of Damascus is Rezin: this he glories in, and this let him be content with, v. 8. The head city of Ephraim has long been Samaria, and the head man in Samaria is now Pekah the son of Remaliah. These shall be made to know their own; their bounds are fixed, and they shall not pass them, to make themselves masters of the cities of Judah, much less to make Jerusalem their prey. Ephraim, which perhaps was the more malicious and forward enemy of the two, should shortly be quite rooted out, and should be so far from seizing other people's lands that they should not be able to hold their own. It was the greatest folly in the world for those to be ruining their neighbours who were themselves marked for ruin, and so near to it. He must urge them to mix faith with assurances (v. 9): "If you will not believe what is said to you, surely you shall not be established. The things told you are encouraging, yet they will not be so to you, unless you be willing to take God's word."

Verses 10–16

I. God, by the prophet, makes a gracious offer to Ahaz, to confirm the foregoing predictions by such sign or miracle as he should choose (v. 10, 11): Ask thee a sign of the Lord thy God. He considers our frame, and that, living in a world of sense, we are apt to require proofs, which he has favoured us with in sacramental signs and seals. See how gracious God is even to the evil and unthankful; Ahaz is bidden to choose his sign, as Gideon about the fleece (Judges vi. 37).

II. Ahaz rudely refuses this gracious offer (v. 12): I will not ask. The true reason why he would not ask for a sign was because, having a dependence upon the Assyrians, their forces, and their gods, for help, he would not thus far be beholden to the God of Israel. Yet he pretends a pious reason: I will not tempt the Lord.

III. The prophet reproves him and his court for their contempt of prophecy (v. 13): "Is it a small thing for you to weary men by your oppression and will you weary my God also with the affronts you put upon him? In affronting the prophets, you think you put a slight only upon men like yourselves, and consider not that you affront God himself, whose messengers they are."

IV. The prophet, in God's name, gives them a sign (v. 14), a sign in general of his goodwill to Israel and to the house of David. Of your nation, of your family, the Messiah is to be born, and you cannot be destroyed while that blessing is in you. You have been told that he should be born among you, I am now further to tell you that he shall be born of a virgin, which will signify both the divine power and the divine purity with which he shall be brought into the world. This, though it was to be accomplished above 500 years after, was a most encouraging sign to the house of David, and an assurance that God would not cast them off. The Messiah shall be introduced on a glorious errand, wrapped up in his glorious name: They shall call his name Immanuel—God with us, God in our nature, God at peace with us, in covenant with us. This was fulfilled in their calling him Jesus—a Saviour (Matt. i. 21–25), for, if he had not been Immanuel—God with us, he could not have been Jesus—a Saviour. The promised seed shall be Immanuel, God with us; let that word comfort you (ch. viii. 10), that God is with us, and (v. 8) that your land is Immanuel's land. Let not the heart of the house of David be moved thus (v. 2), nor let Judah fear the setting up of the son of Tabeal (v. 6), for nothing can cut off the entail on the Son of David that shall be Immanuel. The strongest consolations, in time of trouble, are those which are borrowed from Christ, our relation to him, our interest in him, and our expectations of him and from him. Of this child it is further foretold (v. 15), he shall be truly man, and shall be nursed and brought up like other children: Butter and honey shall he eat. Here is another sign in particular of the speedy destruction of these princes now a terror to Judah, v. 16. "Before this child (so it should be read), this child which I have now in my arms"—not Immanuel, but Shearjashub, his own son—v. 3, "shall know how to refuse the evil and choose the good, before this child be three or four years older, the land that thou abhorrest, these confederate forces of Israelites and Syrians shall be forsaken of both their kings, both Pekah and Rezin." This was fully accomplished; for, within two or three years after this, Hoshea conspired against Pekah, and slew him (2 Kings xv. 30), and, before that, the king of Assyria took Damascus, and slew Rezin, 2 Kings xvi. 9. Nay, there was a present event, which happened immediately. Shearjashub signifies The remnant shall return, which doubtless points at the wonderful return of those 200,000 captives whom Pekah and Rezin had carried away, who were brought back, by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts. Read the story, 2 Chron. xxviii. 8–15. The prophetical naming of this child having thus had its accomplishment, no doubt this should have its accomplishment likewise. Syria and Israel should be deprived of both their kings.

Verses 17–25

After the comfortable promises made to Ahaz as a branch of the house of David, here follow terrible threatenings against him, as a degenerate branch of that house. His iniquity shall be chastened with the rod.

I. The judgment threatened is great, v. 17, brought upon the prince himself and upon the people, and upon the royal family, upon all thy father's house.

II. The enemy employed as the instrument of this judgment is the king of Assyria. Ahaz reposed great confidence in that prince for help against the confederate powers of Israel and Syria, 2 Kings xvi. 7, 8. Now God threatens that that king of Assyria whom he made his stay instead of God should become a scourge to him. Henceforward the kings of Assyria were, for a long time, grieving thorns to Judah. 1. Summons given to the invaders (v. 18): The Lord shall whistle for the fly and the bee. See ch. v. 26. Enemies that seem as contemptible as a fly or a bee and are as easily crushed, shall yet, when God pleases, do his work as effectually as lions and young lions. 2. Possession taken by them, v. 19. It should seem as if the country were in no condition to make resistance. They find no difficulties in forcing their way, but come and rest all of them in the desolate valleys, which the inhabitants had deserted upon the first alarm. They shall come and rest in the low grounds like swarms of flies and bees, and shall render themselves impregnable by taking shelter in the holes of the rocks, as bees often do, and show themselves formidable by appearing openly upon all thorns and all bushes; so generally shall the land be overspread with them. 3. Great desolations made, and the country generally depopulated (v. 20): The Lord shall shave the hair of the head, and beard, and feet; he shall sweep all away. God will make that to be an instrument of his destruction which he hired into his service. Many are beaten with that arm of flesh which they trusted to rather than to the arm of the Lord. 4. The consequences of this general depopulation: The flocks of cattle shall be all destroyed, so that a man shall with much ado save for his own use a young cow and two sheep—a poor stock (v. 21). The few cattle that are left shall have such a large compass of ground to feed in that they shall give abundance of milk, such as shall produce butter enough, v. 22. There shall also be such want of men that the milk of one cow and two sheep shall serve a whole family, which used to keep servants and consume a great deal. The country shall be so depopulated that there shall be butter and honey enough, for the few that are left in it. Good land, that used to be let well, shall be all overrun with briers and thorns (v. 23). The implements of husbandry shall be turned into instruments of war, v. 24, with arrows and bows, to hunt for wild beasts in the thickets, or to defend themselves from robbers. There shall be briers and thorns in abundance where they should not be, but none where they should be, v. 25. The hills that shall be digged with the mattock, for special use, from which the cattle used to be kept off with the fear of briers and thorns, shall now be thrown open, the hedges broken down for the boar out of the wood to waste it, Ps. lxxx. 12, 13.

CHAP. VIII

This chapter, and the four next that follow it (to chap. xiii) are all one continued discourse, the scope of which is to show the great destruction that should now shortly be brought upon the kingdom of Israel, but rich provision is made of comfort for those that feared God in those dark times. In this chapter we have, I. A prophecy of the destruction of the confederate kingdoms of Syria and Israel by the king of Assyria, ver. 1–4. II. Of the desolations that should be made by that proud victorious prince in the land of Israel and Judah, ver. 5–8. III. Great encouragement given to the people of God in the midst of those distractions; they are assured, 1. That the enemies shall not gain their point against them, ver. 9, 10. 2. That if they kept up the fear of God, and kept down the fear of man, they should find God their refuge (ver. 11–14), and while others fell into despair, they should be enabled to wait on God for better times, ver. 15–18. Lastly, He gives a necessary caution to all not to consult with familiar spirits, ver. 19–22.

Verses 1–8

In these verses we have a prophecy of the successes of the king of Assyria against Damascus, Samaria, and Judah, that the two former should be laid waste by him, and the last greatly frightened.

I. Orders given to the prophet to write this prophecy, to be read of all men, that when the thing came to pass they might know that God had sent him; for that was one end of prophecy, John xiv. 29. He must take a great roll, and he must write in it all that he had foretold concerning the king of Assyria's invading the country; he must write it with a man's pen, in the usual way. The prophet is directed to call his book Maher-shalal-hash-baz—Make speed to the spoil, hasten to the prey, intimating that the Assyrian army should come upon them with great speed and make great spoil.

II. The care of the prophet to get this record well attested (v. 2): I took unto me faithful witnesses to record, he wrote the prophecy in their presence that they might be ready to make oath of it, that the prophet had so long before foretold the descent which the Assyrians made upon that country. He names his witnesses. One was Uriah the priest; he is mentioned in the story of Ahaz (2 Kings xvi. 10, 11).

III. The making of the title of his book the name of his child. His wife (because the wife of a prophet) is called the prophetess; she conceived and bore a son, another son, who must carry a sermon in his name, as the former had done (ch. vii. 3), but with this difference, that spoke mercy, Shearjashub—The remnant shall return; but, that being slighted, this speaks judgment, Maher-shalal-hash-baz—In making speed to the spoil he shall hasten, or he has hastened, to the prey. Every time the child was called by his name, or any part of it, it would serve as a memorandum of the judgments approaching.

IV. The prophecy itself, which explains this mystical name.

1. That Syria and Israel, who were now in confederacy against Judah, should in a little time become an easy prey to the king of Assyria (v. 4): "Before the child, now newly born and named, shall have knowledge to cry, My father, and, My mother", that is, "in about a year or two, the riches of Damascus, and the spoil of Samaria, those cities that are now so secure, shall be taken away before the king of Assyria, who shall plunder both city and country as trophies of his victory."

2. That forasmuch as there were many in Judah that were secretly in the interests of Syria and Israel, and were disaffected to the house of David, God would chastise them also by the king of Assyria. What was the sin of the discontented party in Judah (v. 6): This people, whom the prophet here speaks to, refuse the waters of Shiloah that go softly, despise their own country and love to run it down, because it does not make so great a noise in the world, as some other kings and kingdoms do. They refuse the comforts which God's prophets offer them from the word of God, but they rejoice in Rezin and Remaliah's son, who were the enemies of their country, and were now actually invading it. Such vipers does many a state foster in its bosom, that eat its bread, and yet adhere to its enemies, and are ready to quit its interests if they but seem to totter. The same king of Assyria that should lay Ephraim and Syria waste should be a scourge and terror to those of their party in Judah, v. 7, 8. Because they refuse the waters of Shiloah the Lord brings upon them the waters of the river, strong and many, the river Euphrates. They slighted the land of Judah, because it had no river to boast of comparable to that. "Well," says God, "if you be such admirers of Euphrates, you shall have enough of it; the king of Assyria, whose country lies upon that river, shall come with his great army. God shall bring that army upon you." Let us be best pleased with the waters of Shiloah, that go softly, for rapid streams are dangerous. It is threatened that the Assyrian army should break in upon them like a deluge, bearing down all before it. He shall reach even to the neck, that is, he shall advance so far as to lay siege to Jerusalem. In the greatest deluge of trouble God can and will keep the head of his people above water. Though the stretching out of the wings of the Assyrian, that bird of prey, though the right and left wing of his army, should fill the breadth of the land of Judah, yet still it is thy land, O Immanuel! It was to be Christ's land; for there he was to be born.

Verses 9–15

The prophet here returns to speak of the present distress that Ahaz and his court and kingdom were in upon account of the threatening confederacy of the ten tribes and the Syrians against them.

I. He triumphs over the invading enemies, and, in effect, bids them do their worst (v. 9, 10): "O you people, you of far countries, give ear to what the prophet says to you in God's name. We doubt not but you will now make your utmost efforts against Judah and Jerusalem. You associate yourselves in alliance. You gird yourselves, and again you gird yourselves. You take counsel together. You speak the word; you determine what to do, and are confident that the matter will be accomplished with a word's speaking. All your efforts will be ineffectual. You shall be broken in pieces. Not only shall your attempts be ruined, but your attempts shall be your ruin; you shall be broken by those designs you have formed against Jerusalem. For God is with us: he is on our side, to take our part and fight for us; and, if God be for us, who can be against us?"

II. He comforts and encourages the people of God with the same comforts and encouragements which he himself had received.

1. The prophet tells us how he was himself taught of God not to give way to such amazing fears (v. 11): "The Lord spoke to me with a strong hand not to walk in the way of this people, not to say as they say nor do as they do, not to approve of making peace upon any terms, or calling in the help of the Assyrians." God instructed the prophet not to go down the stream. There is a proneness in the best of men to be frightened at threatening clouds, especially when fears are epidemic.

2. Now what is it that he says to God's people?

(1) He cautions them against a sinful fear, v. 12. It seems it was the way of this people at this time, and fear is catching. He whose heart fails him makes his brethren's heart to fail, like his heart (Deut. xx. 8); therefore Say you not, A confederacy, to all those to whom this people shall say, A confederacy. Do not join with those that are for making a league with the Assyrians, through unbelief, and distrust of God and their cause. Do not, when any little thing is amiss, cry out, There is a plot, a plot. When they talk what dismal news there is, Syria is joined with Ephraim, what will become of us? do not you fear their fear.

(2) He advises them to a gracious religious fear: But sanctify the Lord of hosts himself, v. 13. The believing fear of God is a special preservative against the disquieting fear of man; see 1 Pet. iii. 14, 15, where this is quoted, and applied to suffering Christians.

(3) He assures them of a holy security and serenity of mind in so doing (v. 14): He shall be for a sanctuary; make him your fear, and you shall find him your hope, your help, your defence, and your mighty deliverer. He will be your sanctuary, to which you may flee for safety, and where you shall not need to fear any evil.

III. He threatens the ruin of the ungodly and unbelieving, both in Judah and Israel. They have no part nor lot in the foregoing comforts. The prophet foresees that the greatest part of both the houses of Israel would not sanctify the Lord of hosts. What was a savour of life unto life to others would be a savour of death unto death to them. "So that many among them shall stumble and fall."

Verses 16–22

I. The unspeakable privilege which the people of God enjoy in being entrusted with the sacred writings. That they may sanctify the Lord of hosts, may make him their fear and find him their sanctuary, bind up the testimony, v. 16. 1. It is a testimony and a law; God has attested it, and he has enjoined it. As a testimony it directs our faith; as a law it directs our practice; and we ought both to subscribe to the truths of it and to submit to the precepts of it. 2. This testimony and this law are bound up and sealed, for we are not to add to them nor diminish from them. 3. They are lodged as a sacred deposit in the hands of the disciples of the children of the prophets and the covenant, Acts iii. 25. This is the good thing which is committed to them, 2. Tim. i. 13, 14.

II. The good use which we ought to make of this privilege. This we are taught,

1. By the prophet's own practice and resolutions, v. 17, 18. He specifies two discouragements: (1) The frowns of God upon his people, whose interests lay very near his heart: "He hides his face from the house of Jacob, and seems at present to neglect them, and lay them under the tokens of his displeasure." (2) The contempt and reproaches of men, not only upon himself, but upon his disciples, among whom the law and the testimony were sealed: I and the children whom the Lord has given me are for signs and wonders; we are gazed at as outlandish people. Christ looks upon believers as his children, whom the Father gave him (John xvii. 6), and both he and they are for signs and wonders, spoken against (Luke ii. 34), everywhere spoken against, Acts xxviii. 22. He saw the hand of God in all that which was discouraging to him, and kept his eye upon that. He therefore resolved to wait upon the Lord and to look for him; to attend even while he hid his face, and to expect with a humble assurance his return in mercy.

2. By the counsel and advice which he gives to his disciples, to whom were committed the lively oracles. He supposes they would be tempted, in the day of their distress, to consult those that had familiar spirits. Thus Saul, when he was in straits, made his application to the witch of Endor (1 Sam. xxviii. 7, 15), and Ahaziah to the god of Ekron, 2 Kings i. 2. These conjurors peeped and muttered. The words here may refer to their voice and manner of speaking. They spoke not with boldness and plainness, but as those who desire to amuse people rather than to instruct them. There were express laws against this wickedness (Lev. xix. 31; xx. 27), and yet it was found in Israel, is found even in Christian nations. Dread the use of spells and charms, and consulting those that by hidden arts pretend to tell fortunes, cure diseases. He furnishes them with an answer to this temptation, "If any go about thus to ensnare you, give them this reply: Should not a people seek to their God? What! for the living to the dead! Tell them that a people ought to seek unto their God; now Jehovah is our God, and therefore we ought to consult with him, and not with those that have familiar spirits, Mic. iv. 5. Should not a people under guilt, and in trouble, seek to their God for pardon and peace? Should not a people in doubt, in want, and in danger, seek to their God for direction, supply, and protection?" What can be more absurd than to expect that our friends that are dead should do that for us, when we deify them and pray to them, which our living friends cannot do? Necromancers consulted the dead, as the witch of Endor, and so proclaimed their own folly. He directs them to consult the oracles of God. If the prophets that were among them did not speak directly to every case, yet they had the written word, and to that they must have recourse. Those will never be drawn to consult wizards that know how to make a good use of their Bibles. Make God's statutes your counsellors, and you will be counselled aright. We must speak according to that word, that is, we must make this our standard (1 Tim. vi. 3). We must make this use of the law and the testimony because those that concur not with the word of God do thereby evince that there is no light, no morning light (so the word is) in them. Those that reject divine revelation have not human understanding; nor do those rightly admit the oracles of reason who will not admit the oracles of God. Some read it as a threatening: "If they speak not according to this word, there shall be no light to them, but they shall be driven to darkness and despair"; as it follows here, v. 21, 22. What light had Saul when he consulted the witch? 1 Sam. xxviii. 18, 20. He reads the doom of those that seek familiar spirits and regard not God's law and testimony; they may expect all horror and misery, v. 21, 22. They shall pass through the land, unfixed, unsettled; they shall be hardly bestead whither to go for the necessary supports of life. Those who used to be fed to the full shall be hungry. Those that go away from God go out of the way of all good. These people when they shall be hungry shall fret themselves, and shall be very provoking to all about them; they will forget all the rules of duty and decency, and will treasonably curse their king and blasphemously curse their God. When they have broken the bonds of their allegiance, no marvel if those of their religion do not hold them long: they next curse their God, curse him, and die. They shall look upward, but heaven shall frown upon them and look gloomy; and how can it be otherwise when they curse their God? They shall look to the earth, but what comfort can that yield to those with whom God is at war?

CHAP. IX

The prophet in this chapter saith to the righteous, It shall be well with thee, but Woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with him. I. Gracious promises to those that adhere to the law and to the testimony; while those that seek familiar spirits shall be driven into darkness and dimness, they shall see a great light, relief in the midst of their distresses, typical of gospel grace. 1. In the doctrine of the Messiah, ver. 1–3. 2. His victories, ver. 4, 5. 3. His government and dominion as Immanuel, ver 6, 7. II.

Dreadful threatenings against the people of Israel, who had revolted (ver. 8–10), their neighbours should make a prey of them (ver. 11, 12), for their impenitence and hypocrisy, all their ornaments and supports should be cut off (ver. 13–17), and by the wrath of God against them, and their wrath one against another, they should be brought to utter ruin, ver. 18–21.

Verses 1–7

The first words of this chapter plainly refer to the close of the foregoing chapter, where everything looked black and melancholy: Behold, trouble, and darkness, and dimness—but to the upright there shall arise light in the darkness (Ps. cxii. 4). Nevertheless it shall not be such dimness as sometimes there has been. In the worst of times God's people have a nevertheless to allay and balance their troubles; they are persecuted, but not forsaken (2 Cor. iv. 9), sorrowful yet always rejoicing, 2 Cor. vi. 10. And it is matter of comfort to us, when things are at the darkest, that he who forms the light and creates the darkness (ch. xlv. 7) has appointed to both their bounds and set the one over against the other, Gen. i. 4.

I. Three things are here promised, and they all point ultimately at the grace of the gospel, with which the saints were to comfort themselves in every cloudy and dark day.

1. A glorious light, which shall by degrees dispel the dimness, that it shall not be as it sometimes has been: Not such as was in her vexation; when at first he lightly afflicted the land of Zebulun and Naphtali (which lay remote and most exposed to the inroads of the neighbouring enemies), and afterwards he more grievously afflicted the land by the way of the sea and beyond Jordan (v. 1), 2 Kings x. 32. If a light affliction do not humble and reform us, we must expect to be afflicted more grievously. Israel has been without the true God and a teaching priest, and in those times there was no peace. But the dimness threatened (ch. viii. 22) shall not prevail to such a degree; for (v. 2) the people that walked in darkness have seen a great light. At this time when the prophet lived, there were many prophets in Judah and Israel, whose prophecies were a great light both for direction and comfort to the people of God, who adhered to the law and the testimony. This was to have its full accomplishment] when our Lord Jesus began to appear as a prophet, and to preach the gospel in the land of Zebulun and Naphtali, and in Galilee of the Gentiles.

2. A glorious increase, and a universal joy arising from it (v. 3) "Thou, O God! hast multiplied the nation; it has been diminished by one sore judgment after another, yet now thou hast begun to multiply it again." Yet it follows, "Thou hast not increased the joy—the carnal joy and mirth. But, notwithstanding that, they joy before thee; there is a great deal of serious spiritual joy among them, joy in the presence of God." This is very applicable to the times of gospel light, spoken of v. 2. "And to him" (so the Masorites read it) "thou hast magnified the joy, to everyone that receives the light." The following words favour this reading: "They joy before thee; they come before thee in holy ordinances with great joy; their mirth is not like that of Israel under their vines and fig-trees (thou hast not increased that joy) but it is in the favour of God and in the tokens of his grace." It is holy joy: They joy before thee; they rejoice in spirit (as Christ did, Luke x. 21), and that is before God. It is a great joy; according to the joy in harvest, when those who have with patience waited for the precious fruits of the earth, reap in joy; and as in war men rejoice when, after a hazardous battle, they divide the spoil. The gospel brings with it plenty and victory.

3. A glorious liberty and enlargement (v. 4, 5): "They shall rejoice before thee, and with good reason, for thou hast broken the yoke of his burden, for he shall no longer be in servitude; and thou hast broken the staff of his shoulder and the rod of his oppressor, as the Midianites' yoke was broken from off the neck of Israel by the agency of Gideon." Do unto them as to the Midianites. What temporal deliverance this refers to is not clear, probably the preventing of Sennacherib from making himself master of Jerusalem, which was done, as in the day of Midian, by the immediate hand of God; done silently and without noise. But doubtless it looks further, to that great light which should visit those that sat in darkness; it would bring deliverance to the captives, Luke iv. 18. The design of the gospel is to break the yoke of sin and Satan, to remove the burden of guilt and corruption, that we might be brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God. Christ broke the yoke of the ceremonial law (Acts xv. 10; Gal. v. 1), and delivered us out of the hand of our enemies, that we might serve him without fear, Luke i. 74, 75. This is done by the Spirit working like fire (Matt. iii. 11), not as the battle of the warrior is fought, with confused noise; no, the weapons of our warfare are not carnal.

II. But who, where, is he that shall undertake and accomplish these great things for the church? The prophet tells us (v. 6, 7) they shall be done by the Messiah, Immanuel (ch. vii. 14), and now speaks of it, in the prophetic style, as a thing already done: the child is born, because the church before his incarnation reaped great benefit and advantage. As he was the Lamb slain, so he was the child born, from the foundation of the world, Rev. xiii. 8. All the great things that God did for the Old Testament church were done by him as the eternal Word, and for his sake as the Mediator. The Jewish nation, and particularly the house of David, were preserved many a time from imminent ruin only because that blessing was in them. The Chaldee paraphrast understands it of the man that shall endure for ever, even Christ.

1. See him in his humiliation. The same that is the mighty God is a child born; thus did he humble and empty himself, to exalt and fill us. He is born into our world. The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. God so loved the world that he gave him. He is born to us, he is given to us.

2. See him in his exaltation. This child, this Son of God, this Son of man, is invested with the highest honour and power so that we cannot but be happy if he be our friend. He shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, &c. His people shall know him and worship him by these names. He is wonderful, counsellor. Justly is he called wonderful, for he is both God and man. He is the counsellor, for he was intimately acquainted with the counsels of God from eternity, and he gives counsel to the children of men. He is the wisdom of the Father, and is made of God to us wisdom. He is the mighty God—God, the mighty One. As he has wisdom, so he has strength. He is able to save to the utmost. He is the everlasting Father, or the Father of eternity; he is God, one with the Father, who is from everlasting to everlasting. He is the author of everlasting life and happiness to them, and so is the Father of a blessed eternity to them. He is the prince of peace. As a King, he preserves, commands, creates peace, in his kingdom. He is our peace. His throne is above every throne (v. 6): The government shall be upon his shoulder —his only. He shall not only wear the badge of it upon his shoulder (the key of the house of David, ch. xxii. 22), but he shall bear the burden of it. Glorious things are here spoken of Christ's government, v. 7. It shall be multiplied; the lustre of it shall increase, and it shall shine more and more brightly in the world. It shall be a peaceable government, agreeable to his character as the prince of peace. He shall rule by love, and as his government increases the peace shall increase. It shall be administered with prudence and equity: He shall order it, and settle it, with justice and judgment. It shall be an everlasting kingdom: There shall be no end of the increase of his government. God himself has undertaken to bring all this about: "The Lord of hosts, who has all power in his hand and all creatures at his beck, shall perform this."

Verses 8–21

Here are terrible threatenings directed primarily against Israel, the kingdom of the ten tribes, Ephraim and Samaria, the ruin of which is here foretold, all which came to pass within a few years, but they look further and read the doom of all the nations that forget God, and will not have Christ to reign over them.

I. The preface to this prediction (v. 8): The Lord sent a word into Jacob, sent it by his servants the prophets. He warns before he wounds, but they took no care to turn away his wrath. It fell upon them as a storm of rain and hail from on high, which they could not avoid.

II. The sins charged upon the people of Israel, which provoked God to bring these judgments upon them. 1. Their insolent defiance of the justice of God, thinking themselves a match for him: "They say, in the pride and stoutness of their heart, Let God himself do his worst. If he ruin our houses, we will repair them, and make them stronger. If the houses that were built of bricks be demolished in the war, we will rebuild them with hewn stones. If the enemy cut down the sycamores, we will plant cedars." 2. Their incorrigibleness under all the rebukes of Providence hitherto (v. 13): The people turn not unto him that smiteth them, neither do they seek the Lord of hosts; either they are atheists, and have no religion, or idolators, and seek those gods that are the creatures of their own fancy and the works of their own hands. 3. Their general corruption of manners and abounding profaneness. Those that should have reformed them helped to debauch them (v. 16): The leaders of this people mislead them, and cause them to err. But it is ill with a people when their physicians are their worst disease. "Those that bless this people, or call them blessed (so the margin reads it), that flatter them, and soothe them in their wickedness, and cry Peace, peace, to them, cause them to err." We have reason to be afraid of those that speak well of us when we do ill; see Prov. xxiv. 24; xxix. 5. Wickedness was universal, and all were infected with it (v. 17): Every one is a hypocrite and an evil doer. Everyone is profane towards God (so the word properly signifies) and an evil doer towards man. These two commonly go together: those that fear not God regard not man.

III. The judgments threatened against them for this wickedness of theirs.

1. In general, hereby they exposed themselves to the wrath of God. It should devour as fire (v. 18): Wickedness shall burn as the fire. The briers and thorns, when the fire consumes them, shall mount up like the lifting up of smoke, so that the whole land shall be darkened by it; they shall be in trouble, and see no way out (v. 19): The people shall be as the fuel of the fire.

2. God would arm the neighbouring powers against them, v. 11, 12. At this time Israel was in league with Syria against Judah; but the Assyrians, who were adversaries to the Syrians, when they had conquered them should invade Israel, and God would join the enemies of Israel together in alliance. Those that partake with each other in sin, as Syria and Israel in invading Judah, must expect to share in the punishment of sin. The Syrians themselves, whom they were now in league with, should be a scourge to them, they before and the Philistines behind. They should be surrounded with enemies on all sides, who should devour them with open mouths, v. 12. The Philistines were not now looked upon as formidable enemies, and the Syrians were looked upon as firm friends; and yet these shall devour Israel.

3. God would take from the midst of them those they confided in, v. 14, 15. The Lord will cut off head and tail, branch and rush, which is explained in the next verse. (1) Their magistrates, who were honourable by birth and office were the head, these were the branch; but because these caused them to err they should be cut off. (2) Their false prophets, were the tail and the rush, the most despicable of all. A wicked minister is the worst of men. Corruptio optimi est pessima—The best things become when corrupted the worst.

4. The desolation should be as general as the corruption had been, and none should escape it, v. 17. The Lord shall have no joy in their young men, that were in the flower of their youth; nor will he say, Deal gently with the young men for my sake. He shall not have mercy on their fatherless and widows, though he is, in a particular manner, the patron and protector of such. They had corrupted their way like all the rest.

5. Every one should help forward the common ruin, No man shall spare his brother. Civil wars soon bring a kingdom to desolation. Such there were in Israel. In these broils, men snatched on the right hand, and yet were hungry still, and did eat the flesh of their own arms, preyed upon themselves for hunger, v. 20. This bespeaks famine and scarcity. These broils should be not only among particular persons and private families, but among the tribes (v. 21): Manasseh shall devour Ephraim, and Ephraim Manasseh. Those that could unite against Judah could not unite with one another. Mutual enmity and animosity among the tribes of God's Israel is a sin that ripens them for ruin, and a sad symptom of ruin hastening on apace.

6. Though they should be followed with all these judgments, yet God would not let fall his controversy with them. It is the burden of this song (v. 12, 17, 21): For all this his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still. They do not repent and reform. His anger therefore continues to burn against them and his hand is stretched out still. The people turn not to him that smites them, and therefore he continues to smite them.

CHAP. X

The prophet, in this chapter, is dealing, I. With the proud oppressors of his people at home, that abused their power, ver. 1–4. II. With a threatening invader of his people from abroad, Sennacherib king of Assyria, concerning whom observe, 1. The commission given him to invade Judah, ver 5, 6. 2. His pride and insolence in the execution of that commission, ver 7–11, 13, 14. 3. A rebuke given to his haughtiness, and a threatening of his fall and ruin, when he had served the purposes for which God raised him up, ver. 12, 15–19. 4. A promise of grace to the people of God, to enable them to bear up under the affliction, ver. 20–23. 5. Great encouragement given to them not to fear this threatening storm, but to hope that it would end in the destruction of this formidable enemy, ver. 24–34.

Verses 1–4

Whether they were the princes and judges of Israel or Judah, or both, that the prophet denounced this woe against, is not certain. Here is,

I. The indictment drawn up against these oppressors, v. 1, 2. They are charged, 1. With making wicked laws and edicts: They decree unrighteous decrees. Woe to the superior powers that devise these decrees! And woe to the inferior officers that draw them up, and enter them upon record—the writers that write the grievousness. 2. With perverting justice in the execution of the laws that were made. 3. With enriching themselves by oppressing those that lay at their mercy. They rob the fatherless of the little that is left them, because they have no friend to appear for them.

II. A challenge given them with all their pride and power to outface the judgments of God (v. 3): "What will you do? To whom will you flee? You can trample upon the widows and fatherless; but what will you do when God riseth up?" Job xxxi. 14. "Where will you leave your glory, to find it again when the storm is over?" The wealth they had got was their glory, and they had no place of safety in which to deposit it.

III. Sentence passed upon them, by which they are doomed, some to imprisonment and captivity (they shall bow down among the prisoners, or under them) others to death. Those that had trampled upon the widows and fatherless shall themselves be trodden down, v. 4. "This it will come to," says God, "without me, that is, because you have deserted me and driven me away from you."

Verses 5–19

The destruction of the kingdom of Israel by Shalmaneser king of Assyria was foretold in the foregoing chapter, and it had its accomplishment in the sixth year of Hezekiah, 2 Kings xviii. 10. It was total and final, head and tail were all cut off. Now the correction of the kingdom of Judah by Sennacherib king of Assyria is foretold in this chapter; and this prediction was fulfilled in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii. 13, 17). It ended in the confusion of the Assyrians and the great encouragement of Hezekiah and his people in their return to God.

I. God, in his sovereignty, deputed the king of Assyria to be his servant, and made use of him as a tool (v. 5, 6): "O Assyrian! know this, that thou art the rod of my anger; and I will send thee to be a scourge to the people of my wrath." The Jews though they appeared very good, were a hypocritical nation, that made a profession of religion, and at this time particularly of reformation, but were not truly religious, not truly reformed. Hezekiah had in a great measure cured them of their idolatry, and now they ran into profaneness; hypocrisy is profaneness. Being a profane hypocritical nation, they are the people of God's wrath. See what a change sin made: those that had been God's chosen and hallowed people, had now become the people of his wrath, Amos iii. 2. The Assyrian, though he appeared very great, was but the rod of God's anger, an instrument God was pleased to make use of for the chastening of his people. The staff in their hand, wherewith they smite his people, is his indignation; it is his wrath that puts the staff into their hand. Sometimes God makes an idolatrous nation, that serves him not at all, a scourge to a hypocritical nation, that serves him not in sincerity and truth. The Assyrian is called the rod of God's anger. I will send him; I will give him a charge. The Assyrian is to take the spoil and to take the prey, not to shed any blood. He is to plunder the country, rifle the houses, drive away the cattle, strip the people of all their wealth and ornaments, and tread them down like the mire of the streets. But why must the Assyrian prevail thus against them? Not that they might be ruined, but that they might be reformed.

II. The king of Assyria, in his pride, pretended to be absolute and to act for his own honour. God ordained him for judgment to be an instrument of bringing his people to repentance, howbeit he means not so, nor does his heart think so, v. 7. He does not think that he is either God's servant or Israel's friend. God designs to correct his people, and to cure them of their hypocrisy, and bring them nearer to himself; but was that Sennacherib's design? He designs nothing but to destroy and to cut off nations not a few, and to make himself master of them. He designs to gratify his own covetousness and to set up for a universal monarch. By his general's letter to Hezekiah, written in his name, vainglory and arrogance seem to have entered into the spirit of the man. His haughtiness and presumption are here described, partly to represent him as ridiculous and partly to assure the people of God that he would be brought down. He boasts of the great things he had done to other nations. He had made their kings his courtiers (v. 8): "My princes are altogether kings. Those that are now my princes are such as have been kings." Or those that were absolute princes in their own dominions held their crowns under him, and did him homage. He had made himself master of cities. He names several (v. 9) that were all alike reduced by him. Calno soon yielded as Carchemish did, Hamath could not hold out any more than Arpad, and Samaria had become his as well as Damascus. He found out the kingdoms of the idols and found out ways to make them his own, v. 10. Sennacherib vainly imagined that every conquest of a kingdom was the conquest of a god. He had enlarged his own dominions, and removed the bounds of the people (v. 13), enclosing many large territories within the limits of his own kingdom. I have robbed their treasures. Great conquerors are often no better than great robbers. "I have put down the inhabitants as a valiant man. Those that sat high I have humbled." He boasts he had done all this by his own policy and power (v. 13): "By the strength of my hand, for I am valiant; and by my wisdom, for I am prudent." He had done all this with ease, and had made but a diversion of it, as if he had been taking birds' nests (v. 14): My hand has found as a nest the riches of the people. "As one gathers the eggs that are left in the nest by the dam, so easily have I gathered all the earth." Like Alexander, he thought he had conquered the world. He threatens what he will do to Jerusalem, which he was now about to lay siege to, v. 10, 11. He blasphemously calls the God of Israel an idol, and sets him on a level with the false gods of other nations, as if none were the true God but Mithras, the sun, whom he worshipped. He might have known that the worshippers of the God of Israel were expressly forbidden to make any graven images, and if any did it must be by stealth, and therefore they could not be so rich and pompous as those of other nations. If he means the ark and the mercy-seat, he speaks like himself, very foolishly. Those who make external pomp and splendour a mark of the true church go by the same rule. Because he had conquered Samaria he concluded Jerusalem would fall. But it did not follow; for Jerusalem adhered to her God, whereas Samaria had forsaken him.

III. God, in his justice, rebukes his pride and reads his doom.

1. He shows the vanity of his insolent and audacious boasts (v. 15): Shall the axe boast itself against him that hews therewith? or shall the saw magnify itself against him that shaketh it? "O what a dust do I make!" said the fly upon the cart-wheel in the fable. "What destruction do I make among the trees!" says the axe. Two ways the axe may be said to boast itself against him that hews with it: By way of resistance and opposition. Sennacherib blasphemed God, threatened to serve him as he had served the gods of the nations; now this was as if the axe should fly in the face of him that hews with it. The tool striving with the workman is no less absurd than the clay striving with the potter; and as it is a thing not to be justified that men should fight against God with the wit, and wealth, and power, which he gives them, so it is a thing not to be suffered. By way of competition. Shall the axe take to itself the praise of the work it is employed in? So absurd was it for Sennacherib to say, By the strength of my hand I have done it, and by my wisdom, v. 13. It is as if the rod, when it is shaken, should boast that it guides the hand which shakes it; whereas, when the staff is lifted up, is it not wood still?

2. He foretells his fall and ruin. When God had done his work by him he would then do his work upon him, v. 12. In reference to Sennacherib's invasion, God designed to do good to Zion and Jerusalem by this providence. When God brings his people into trouble it is to bring sin to their remembrance, and to awaken them to a sense of their duty, to teach them to pray and to love and help one another. When these points are, in some measure, gained by the affliction, it shall be removed, in mercy (Lev. xxvi. 41, 42). The rod shall accomplish that for which God sends it. When God had wrought this work of grace for his people he would work a work of wrath upon their invaders: I will punish the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria. This attempt upon Zion and Jerusalem should certainly be baffled, and come to nothing, v. 16, 19. God himself will do it, as the Lord of hosts, and as the light of Israel. We are sure he can do it, for he is the Lord of hosts, of all the hosts of heaven and earth. We have reason to hope he will do it, for he is the light of Israel, and his Holy One. This destruction shall be as a consumption of the body by a disease: The Lord shall send leanness among his fatnesses, or his fat ones. His numerous army, that was like a body covered with fatness, shall be diminished, and waste away, and become like a skeleton. Under his glory he will kindle a burning, as the burning of a fire, which shall lay his army in ruins as suddenly as a raging fire lays a stately house in ashes. The light of Israel shall be for a fire to the Assyrians, as the same pillar of cloud was a light to the Israelites and a terror to the Egyptians in the Red Sea. It shall burn and devour its thorns and briers, his officers and soldiers, as thorns and briers. "Even the glory of his forest (v. 18), the choice troops of his army, that he valued as men do their timber-trees (the glory of their forest) or their fruit-trees (the glory of their Carmel), shall be put as briers and thorns before the fire." The prophet tells us the army would hereby be reduced to a very small number: The rest of the trees of his forest shall be few. Those few who remained should be quite dispirited: They shall be as when a standard-bearer fainteth.

Verses 20–23

The prophet had said (v. 12) that the Lord would perform his whole work upon Mount Zion and upon Jerusalem, by Sennacherib's invading the land.

I. The conversion of some, to whom this providence should yield the peaceable fruit of righteousness, though for the present it was not joyous, but grievous; these are but a remnant (v. 22), the remnant of Israel (v. 20), the remnant of Jacob (v. 21). This remnant of Israel are said to be such as had escaped of the house of Jacob, such as escaped the corruptions of the house of Jacob, and kept their integrity in times of common apostasy. "They shall no more again stay upon him that smote them, shall never depend upon the Assyrians for help against their other enemies, finding that they are themselves their worst enemies." "The remnant shall return (that was signified by the name of the prophet's son, Shearjashub, ch. vii. 3), even the remnant of Jacob. They shall return, after the raising of the siege of Jerusalem, not only to the quiet possession of their houses and lands, but to God and to their duty; they shall repent, and pray, and seek his face, and reform their lives." This promise of the conversion and salvation of a remnant of Israel is applied by the apostle (Rom. ix. 27) to the remnant of the Jews which at the first preaching of the gospel received and entertained it.

II. The consumption of others: The Lord God of hosts shall make a consumption, v. 23. This meant the consumption of the estates and families of many of the Jews by the Assyrian army. It is determined, not only that there shall be such a consumption, but it is cut out (so the word is); it is particularly appointed how far it shall extend and how long it shall continue. God will justly bring this consumption upon a provoking people, but he will wisely and graciously set bounds to it.

The prophet, in his preaching, distinguishes between the precious and the vile. He speaks terror, in Sennacherib's invasion, to the hypocrites, who were the people of God's wrath, v. 6. But here he speaks comfort to the sincere, who were the people of God's love.

I. An exhortation to God's people not to be frightened at this threatening calamity. Let the sinners in Zion be afraid (ch. xxxiii. 14); but O my people, that dwellest in Zion, be not afraid of the Assyrian, v. 24.

II. The silencing of their fear. The Assyrian shall do nothing against them but what God has appointed and determined. The storm shall soon blow over (v. 25): Yet a very little while—a little, little while (so the word is), and the indignation shall cease, even my anger, which is the staff in their hand (v. 5). The enemy that threatens them shall himself be reckoned with. He lifted up his staff against Zion, but God shall stir up a scourge for him (v. 26); he is a terror to God's people, but God will be a terror to him. The prophet, for the encouragement of God's people, quotes precedents. The destruction of the Assyrian shall be According to the slaughter of Midian (which was effected by an invisible power), and as, at the rock of Oreb, one of the princes of Midian, after the battle, was slain, so shall Sennacherib be after the defeat of his forces. As his rod was upon the sea, the Red Sea, to divide it for the escape of Israel and then to close it for the destruction of their pursuers so shall his rod now be lifted up, after the manner of Egypt, for the deliverance of Jerusalem and the destruction of the Assyrian. They shall be wholly delivered from the power of the Assyrian, and from the fear of it, v. 27. The yoke shall not only be taken away, but it shall be destroyed, because of the anointing: (1) For Hezekiah's sake, the anointed of the Lord, an active reformer, dear to God. (2) For David's sake. This is why God would defend Jerusalem from Sennacherib (ch. xxxvii. 35). (3) For his people Israel's sake, the good people among them. (4) For the sake of the Messiah, the Anointed of God.

III. The terror of the enemy and the terror with which many were struck, v. 28.

1. How formidable the Assyrians were! Here is a particular description of the march of Sennacherib, what swift advances he made: He has come to Aiath, &c. At Michmash he has laid up his carriages, as if he had no further occasion for his heavy artillery, so easily was every place reduced; or the store-cities of Judah, fortified, had now become his magazines. Some remarkable pass he had taken: They have gone over the passage.

2. How cowardly the men of Judah were, the degenerate seed of that lion's whelp. They fled upon the first alarm. And poor Anathoth, a priests' city, that should have been a pattern of courage, shrieks louder than any, v. 30. With respect to those that gathered themselves together, it was not to fight, but to flee by consent, v 31. This shows how fast the news of the enemy's progress flew through the kingdom: He has come to Aiath, says one, nay, says another, He has passed to Migron, &c.

3. How impotent his attempt upon Jerusalem shall be: He shall remain at Nob, whence he may see Mount Zion, and there he shall shake his hand against it, v. 32. He shall threaten it, and that shall be all.

4. How fatal it would prove to himself. When he shakes his hand at Jerusalem, the Lord shall lop the bough with terror and cut down the thickets of the forest, v. 33, 34. The high and stately trees shall be hewn down; that is, the haughty shall be humbled. The thickets of the forest he shall cut down. The Assyrian soldiers under arms, their spears erect, looked like a forest, like Lebanon; but, when in one night they all became as dead, Lebanon was of a sudden cut down by a mighty one, by the destroying angel, and, if this be the exit of that proud invader, let not God's people be afraid of him.

CHAP. XI

It is a very good transition in prophecy to pass from the prediction of the temporal deliverances of the church to that of the great salvation, which in the fulness of time should be wrought out by Jesus Christ, of which the other were types and figures. Upon the prophecy of the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib comes a prophecy concerning Messiah the Prince. I. His rise out of the house of David, ver. 1. II. His qualifications for his great undertaking, ver. 2, 3. III. The justice and equity of his government, ver. 3–5. IV. The peaceableness of his kingdom, ver. 6–9. V. The accession of the Gentiles to it (ver. 10), and with them the remnant of the Jews, that should be united with them in the Messiah's kingdom, ver. 11–16. God would shortly give them a type, and some dark representation, in the excellent government of Hezekiah, the great peace which the nation should enjoy under him, after the ruin of Sennacherib's design, and the return of many of the ten tribes out of their dispersion to their brethren of the land of Judah.

Verses 1–9

The prophet had before spoken of a child that should be born, on whose shoulders the government should be. He had said (ch. x. 27) that the yoke should be destroyed because of the anointing; now here he tells us on whom that anointing should rest.

I. The Messiah should, in due time, arise out of the house of David, as that branch of the Lord which he had said (ch. iv. 2) should be glorious. This branch should arise—from Jesse. He should be the son of David, with whom the covenant of royalty was made. David is often called the son of Jesse, and Christ is called so. He is called a rod, and a branch; both the words here used signify a small, tender product, a twig and a sprig, such as is easily broken off. The enemies of God's church were just before compared to stately boughs (ch. x. 33), but Christ to a tender branch (ch. liii. 2); yet he shall be victorious over them. He is said to come out of Jesse rather than David, because Jesse lived and died in meanness and obscurity; his family was of small account (1 Sam. xviii. 18). He comes forth out of the stem, or stump, of Jesse. The house of David was reduced and brought very low at the time of Christ's birth, witness the obscurity and poverty of Joseph and Mary. The Chaldee paraphrase reads this, There shall come forth a King from the sons of Jesse, and the Messiah (or Christ) shall be anointed out of his sons' sons.

II. He should be every way qualified for that great work to which he was designed. This tender branch should be so watered with the dews of heaven as to become a strong rod for a sceptre to rule, v. 2. The Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him. He shall have the Spirit not by measure, but without measure, the fulness of the Godhead dwelling in him, Col. i. 19; ii. 9. He began his preaching with this (Luke iv. 18), The Spirit of the Lord is upon me. He shall have the spirit of wisdom and understanding, of counsel and knowledge. He shall know how to administer the affair of his spiritual kingdom to the glory of God and the welfare of men. He was famed for courage in his teaching the way of God in truth, and not caring for any man, Matt. xxii. 16.

III. He should be accurate, and exact in the administration of his government and the exercise of the power committed to him (v. 3): The Spirit wherewith he shall be clothed shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord. Jesus Christ had the spirit without measure, that he might perfectly understand his undertaking.

IV. He should be just and righteous in all the acts of his government. He shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, with respect of persons (Job xxxiv. 19), nor reprove after the hearing of his ears, by the representations of others, as men commonly do; nor by the fair words they speak, calling him, Lord, Lord; but he will judge by the hidden man of the heart, and the inward principles men are governed by, of which he is an infallible witness. He will judge righteous judgment (v. 5): Righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins. It shall constantly compass him and shall be his honour; he shall gird himself for every action, shall gird on his sword for war in righteousness. With righteousness shall he judge the poor; he shall judge in favour and defence of those that have right on their side, though they are poor in the world, and because they are poor in spirit. Christ is the poor man's King, Ps. lxxii. 2, 4. He shall debate with evenness for the meek of the earth, or of the land. Some read it, He shall reprove or correct the meek of the earth with equity. If his own people, the meek of the land, do amiss, he will visit their transgression with the rod. But he shall smite the earth, the man of the earth, that doth oppress (Ps. x. 18) with the rod of his mouth, the word of his mouth, speaking terror and ruin to them. With the breath of his lips, by the operation of his Spirit, according to his word, he shall slay the wicked.

V. That there should be great peace and tranquillity under his government (ch. ix. 6). Peace signifies two things:

1. Unity or concord, intimated in these figurative promises, that even the wolf shall dwell peaceably with the lamb; men of the most fierce and furious dispositions shall have their temper so strangely altered by the grace of Christ that they shall live in love even with the weakest and such as formerly were an easy prey. Christ, who is our peace, came to slay all enmities and to settle lasting friendships among his followers, particularly between Jews and Gentiles. The leopard shall not only not tear the kid, but shall lie down with her: even their young ones shall lie down together, and shall be trained up in blessed amity. The lion shall cease to be ravenous and shall eat straw like the ox, as some think all the beasts of prey did before the fall. The asp and the cockatrice shall cease to be venomous, so that parents shall let their children play with them. A generation of vipers shall become a seed of saints. This is fulfilled in the wonderful effect of the gospel upon the minds of those that sincerely embrace it; it changes the nature, and makes those that trampled on the meek of the earth, not only meek like them, but affectionate towards them. Some hope it shall yet have a further accomplishment in the latter days, when swords shall be beaten into ploughshares.

2. Safety or security. Christ, the great Shepherd, shall take such care of his flock that they shall not only not destroy one another, but no enemy from without shall be permitted to give them any molestation. God's people shall be delivered, not only from evil, but from the fear of it. The effect of it shall be tractableness, and a willingness to receive instruction: A little child shall lead those who formerly scorned to be controlled by the strongest man. The cause of it shall be the knowledge of God. The more there is of that the more there is of a disposition to peace. The earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, which shall extinguish men's heats and animosities. There is much more of the knowledge of God to be got by the gospel of Christ than could be got by the law of Moses.

Verses 10–16

A further prophecy of the enlargement and advancement of the kingdom of the Messiah, under the figure of Judah in the latter end of Hezekiah's reign, after the defeat of Sennacherib.

I. This prediction was in part accomplished when the great things God did for Hezekiah and his people proved as an ensign, inviting the neighbouring nations to them to enquire of the wonders done in the land, on which errand the king of Babylon's ambassadors came. To them the Gentiles sought; and Jerusalem was then glorious, v. 10. Then many of the Israelites of the ten tribes, who were forced by the king of Assyria to flee for shelter into all the countries about, were encouraged to return to their own country and put themselves under the protection of the king of Judah. This is said to be a recovery of them the second time (v. 11), such an instance of the power of God as their first deliverance out of Egypt. Then the outcasts of Israel should be brought home, and those of Judah too. Then the old feud between Ephraim and Judah shall be forgotten, and they shall join against the Philistines and their other common enemies, v. 13, 14. When God's time has come for the deliverance of his people mountains of opposition shall become plain before him. Let us not despair therefore when the interests of the church seem to be brought very low; God can soon turn gloomy days into glorious ones.

II. It had a further reference to the days of the Messiah and the accession of the Gentiles to his kingdom; for to these the apostle applies v. 10, of which the following verses are a continuation. Rom. xv. 12, There shall be a root of Jesse; and he that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles, in him shall the Gentiles trust. That is a key to this prophecy, which speaks of Christ as the root of Jesse, or a branch out of his roots (v. 1), a root out of a dry ground, ch. liii. 2.

1. He shall stand, or be set up, for an ensign of the people. When he was crucified he was lifted up from the earth, that, as an ensign or beacon, he might draw the eyes and the hearts of all men unto him, John xii. 32. He is set up as an ensign in the preaching of the everlasting gospel, in which the ministers are as standard-bearers.

2. To him shall the Gentiles seek. We read of Greeks that did so (John xii. 21, We would see Jesus).

3. His rest shall be glorious. Some understand this of the death of Christ (the triumphs of the cross made even that glorious), others of his ascension, when he sat down to rest at the right hand of God. Or rather it is meant of the gospel church.

4. Both Jews and Gentiles shall be gathered to him, v. 11. A remnant of both, a little remnant in comparison, recovered with great difficulty. There shall be a remnant of the Jews gathered in: The outcasts of Israel and the dispersed of Judah (v. 12), many of whom, at the time of the bringing of them in to Christ, were Jews of the dispersion.

5. There shall be a happy accommodation between Judah and Ephraim, and both shall be safe from their adversaries and have dominion over them, v. 13, 14. The coalescence between Judah and Israel at that time was a type and figure of the uniting of Jews and Gentiles. For they shall fly upon the shoulders of the Philistines, as an eagle strikes at her prey, and shall extend their conquests eastward over the Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites. Some of all nations shall become obedient to the faith.

6. Everything that might hinder the progress and success of the gospel shall be taken out of the way, so when Jews and Gentiles are to be brought together into the gospel church all obstructions shall be removed (v. 15, 16), difficulties that seemed insuperable shall be strangely got over, the blind shall be led by a way that they knew not. See ch. xlii. 15, 16; xliii. 19, 20. Converts shall be brought in chariots and in litters, ch. lxvi. 20.

CHAP. XII

The salvation promised in the foregoing chapter was compared to that of Israel "in the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt". As Moses and the children of Israel then sang a song of praise to the glory of God (Exod. xv. 1) so shall the people of God do in that day when the root of Jesse shall stand for an ensign of the people and shall be the desire and joy of all nations. In that day, I. Every believer shall sing a song of praise (ver. 1, 3). "Thou shalt say, Lord, I will praise thee." II. Many shall join in praising God for the common benefit arising from this salvation (ver. 4–6).

Verses 1–3

This is the former part of the hymn of praise prepared for the use of the Jewish church when God would work great deliverances for them, and of the Christian church when the kingdom of the Messiah should be set up in the world. The scattered church, being united into one body, shall, as one man, thus praise God.

I. The promise is sure, and the blessings contained when they are bestowed, will furnish the church with abundant matter for thanksgiving.

II. Thou shalt say, that is, thou oughtest to say so. In that day, when many are brought home to Jesus Christ and flock to him as doves to their windows, thou shalt say, O Lord! I will praise thee. O Lord! I will praise thee, though thou wast angry with me. Even God's frowns must not put us out of tune for praising him. By Jesus Christ, the root of Jesse, God's anger against mankind was turned away; for he is our peace. Those whom God is reconciled to he comforts. God sometimes brings his people into a wilderness that there he may speak comfortably to them, Hosea ii. 14. They are taught to triumph in God (v. 2): "Behold, and wonder; God is my salvation; not only my Saviour, by whom I am saved, but my salvation, in whom I am safe." We have work to do and temptations to resist, and we may depend upon him to enable us for both. We have many troubles to undergo, and we may depend upon him to comfort us in all our tribulations, for he giveth songs in the night. Observe the title here given to God: Jah, Jehovah. Jah is the contraction of Jehovah, and both signify his eternity and unchangeableness, which are a great comfort to those that depend upon him as their strength and their song. "Therefore, because the Lord Jehovah is your strength and song and will be your salvation, out of the wells of salvation in God, who is the fountain of all good to his people, you shall draw water with joy. God's promises revealed, ratified, and given out to us, in his ordinances, are wells of salvation.

Verses 4–6

This is the second part of this evangelical song, and believers stir up themselves to praise God and here invite and encourage one another to do it.

I. The inhabitants of Zion and Jerusalem, whom God had protected from Sennacherib's violence, v. 6, ought to be most forward and zealous in praising him. Thou inhabitress of Zion; the word is feminine. Let women be strong in the Lord, and out of their mouth praise shall be perfected.

II. Praise the Lord by prayer: Call upon his name. We must not only speak to God, but speak to others concerning him, proclaim his name. Declare his doings among the people, among the heathen, that they may be brought into communion with Israel and the God of Israel. When the apostles preached the gospel to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem, then this scripture was fulfilled. "Cry out and shout; welcome the gospel to yourselves and publish it to others with huzzas and loud acclamations, as those that shout for victory (Exod. xxxii. 18) or for the coronation of a king," Num. xxiii. 21. Great is the Holy One, for he is glorious in holiness; therefore great, because holy. It is the happiness of Israel that the God who is in covenant with them, and in the midst of them, is infinitely great.

CHAP. XIII

Hitherto the prophecies of this book related only to Judah and Israel, and Jerusalem especially; but now the prophet begins to read the doom of the neighbouring states and kingdoms: for he that is King of saints is also King of nations. But the nations to whom these prophecies relate were all such as the people of God were in some way or other concerned with Deut. xxxii. 8, 9. The threatenings we find here against Babylon, Moab, Damascus, Egypt, Tyre, &c., were intended for comfort to those in Israel that feared God, but were terrified and oppressed by those potent neighbours, and for alarm to those among them that were wicked. This chapter and that which follows contain what God had to say to Babylon and Babylon's king, who would in process of time become a greater enemy to them than any other had been, for which God would at last reckon with them. In this chapter we have, I. A general rendezvous of the forces that were to be employed against Babylon, ver. 1–5. II. The bloody work that those forces should make in Babylon, ver. 6–18. III. The utter ruin and desolation of Babylon, ver. 19–22.

Verses 1–5

The general title of this book was, The vision of Isaiah the son of Amoz, ch. i. 1, but the particular inscription of this sermon is the burden of Babylon. It is a burden, a lesson they were to learn (so some understand it), but it would be a load which should lie heavily upon them. It is the burden of Babylon or Babel, which at this time was a dependent upon the Assyrian monarchy (the metropolis of which was Nineveh), but soon after revolted and became a monarchy of itself, a very potent one, in Nebuchadnezzar. This prophet afterwards foretold the captivity of the Jews in Babylon, ch. xxxix. 6. In these verses a summons is given to those powerful nations whom God would use as instruments for the destruction of Babylon: he names them (v. 17) the Medes, who, in conjunction with the Persians, under the command of Darius and Cyrus, were the ruin of the Babylonian monarchy.

I. Babylon is here called the gates of the nobles (v. 2), because of the abundance of noblemen's houses that were in it. But the whole land is doomed to destruction (v. 5); for, though the nobles were the leaders in persecuting, yet the whole land concurred with them in it.

II. The persons brought together to lay Babylon waste are here called God's sanctified ones (v. 3), designed for this service and set apart to it by the purpose and providence of God. It intimates that in God's intention, though not in theirs, it was a holy war; they designed the enlargement of their own empire, but God designed the release of his people. Cyrus, the person principally concerned, was justly called a sanctified one, for he was God's anointed (ch. xlv. 1) and a figure of him that was to come. They are called God's mighty ones, because they had their might from God and were now to use it for him. It is said of Cyrus that in this expedition God held his right hand, ch. xlv. 1. Though Cyrus did not know God, yet God used him as his servant (ch. xlv. 4, I have surnamed thee as my servant, though thou hast not known me). They are very numerous, a multitude, a great people, kingdoms of nations (v. 4), not rude and barbarous, but regular troops. They come from a far country, from the end of heaven. The vast country of Assyria lay between Babylon and Persia.

III. The summons given them is effectual, A banner is lifted up upon the high mountain, v. 2. It is the Lord of hosts that musters the host of the battle, v. 4.

Verses 6–18

We have here a description of the terrible desolation which should be made in Babylon by the Medes and Persians. Those that were now secure were bidden to howl and lament for,

I. The day of the Lord is at hand (v. 6), a little day of judgment, when God will act as a just avenger of his own and his people's injured cause. The day of the Lord cometh, v. 9. God will deal in severity with them for the severities they exercised upon God's people.

II. Their hearts shall fail them, and they shall have neither courage nor comfort left, v. 7, 8. Those that in the day of peace were proud, and haughty, and terrible (v. 11), shall, when trouble comes, be dispirited and at their wits' end: All hands shall be faint, and unable to hold a weapon, and every man's heart shall melt, they shall be amazed one at another. In frightening themselves, they shall frighten one another. Their faces shall be as flames, pale as flames, through fear, or red as flames, blushing at their cowardice.

III. All hope shall fail them (v. 10): The stars of heaven shall not give their light, but shall be clouded and the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, a certain sign of foul weather.

IV. God will visit them for their iniquity, particularly the sin of pride, v. 11. That pride must now have its fall: The haughtiness of the terrible must now be laid low, particularly of Nebuchadnezzar and his son Belshazzar, who had, in their pride, trampled upon the people of God.

V. So great a slaughter will produce a scarcity of men (v. 12): I will make a man more precious than fine gold. Populous countries are soon depopulated by war.

VI. Such a confusion of their affairs shall be like the shaking of the heavens with thunders and the removing of the earth by earthquakes. All shall go to rack and ruin in the day of the wrath of the Lord of hosts, v. 13. Babylon, which used to be like a roaring lion and a raging bear shall become as a chased roe and as a sheep that no man takes up, v. 14. The army consisting of troops of divers nations, shall be so dispirited and dispersed, that they shall turn every man to his own people.

VII. There shall be a scene of blood and horror, as is usual where the sword devours. The conqueror gives no quarter, but puts all to the sword. Those of other nations that come in to their assistance shall be cut off with them. Since the most sacred laws of nature, and of humanity itself are silenced by the fury of war, the conquerors shall, in the most barbarous manner, dash the children to pieces, and ravish the wives, v. 16.

VIII. The enemy shall be inexorable. These Medes, in conjunction with the Persians, shall take no bribes, v. 17. The Medes shall not regard silver. They shall show no pity (v. 18), not to the young men that are in the prime; nor to the age of innocency—they shall have no pity on the fruit of the womb, nor spare little children.

Verses 19–22

The great havoc and destruction which it was foretold should be made by the Medes and Persians in Babylon here end in final destruction. Babylon was a noble city. It was the glory of kingdoms and the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency; it was that head of gold (Dan. ii. 37, 38); it was called the lady of kingdoms (ch. xlvii. 5), the praise of the whole earth (Jer. li. 41), like a pleasant roe (so the word signifies); but it shall be as a chased roe, v. 14. It is foretold that it should be wholly destroyed, like Sodom and Gomorrah. Babylon was taken when Belshazzar was in his revels; and, though Cyrus and Darius did not demolish it, yet by degrees it went to ruin. It is foretold here (v. 20) that it shall never be inhabited: in Adrian's time nothing remained but the wall. And whereas it is prophesied concerning Nineveh, that when it should be deserted and left desolate yet flocks should lie down in the midst of it, it is here said concerning Babylon that the Arabians, who were shepherds, should not make their folds there; the country should be so barren that there would be no grazing for sheep. It shall be the receptacle of wild beasts, that affect solitude; the houses of Babylon shall be full of doleful creatures, owls and satyrs, that are themselves frightened thither, and by whom all others are frightened thence. Benjamin Bar-Jona, in his Itinerary, speaking of Babel, has these words: "This is that Babel which was thirty miles in breadth; it is now laid waste. There are the ruins of a palace of Nebuchadnezzar, but men dare not enter in, for fear of serpents and scorpions, which possess the place." It is intimated that this destruction should come shortly (v. 22): Her time is near to come. This prophecy of the destruction of Babylon was intended for the support and comfort of the people of God when they were captives there and grievously oppressed; and the accomplishment of the prophecy was nearly 200 years after the time when it was delivered.

CHAP. XIV

In this chapter, I. More weight is added to the burden of Babylon. 1. Israel's cause is pleaded in this quarrel with Babylon, ver. 1–3. 2. The king of Babylon shall be brought down, ver. 4–20. 3. The whole race of the Babylonians shall be cut off, ver. 21–23. II. A confirmation of the prophecy of the destruction of Babylon, which was a thing at a distance, is here given in the prophecy of the destruction of the Assyrian army that invaded the land, which happened not long after, ver. 24–27. III. The success of Hezekiah against the Philistines is here foretold, and the advantages which his people would gain thereby, ver. 28–32.

Verses 1–3

Babylon must be ruined, because God has mercy in store for his people. The injuries done to them must be revenged upon their persecutors. The yoke which Babylon had long laid on their necks must be broken and they must be set at liberty.

I. The ground of these favours to Jacob and Israel —the kindness God had for them and the choice he had made of them (v. 1): "The Lord will have mercy on Jacob, the seed of Jacob now captives in Babylon; and will yet choose them, though he has seemed for a time to refuse and reject them."

II. The particular favours he designed them. The Lord will set them in their own land, out of which they were driven—the holy land, the land of promise. Strangers shall be joined with them, saying, We will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you, Zech. viii. 23. These proselytes should be very helpful to them in their return home: The people among whom they live shall take them, take care of them, and bring them to their place—as friends—as servants, willing to do them all the good offices they could. In the return of the captives from Babylon, all that were about them, pursuant to Cyrus's proclamation, contributed to their removal (Ezra i. 4, 6), not as the Egyptians, because they were sick of them, but because they loved them. Many would of choice go with them. They shall possess them in the land of the Lord for servants and handmaids. The advantages of that land made it the paradise of those servants that had been strangers to the covenants of promise, for there was one law to the stranger and to those that were born in the land. They that would not be reconciled should be reduced and humbled by them: They shall take those captives whose captives they were and shall rule over their oppressors, righteously, but not revengefully. They should see a happy termination of all their grievances (v. 3): The Lord shall give thee rest from thy sorrow and thy fear, and from thy hard bondage. God himself undertakes to work a blessed change.

Verses 4–23

The kings of Babylon, successively, were oppressors of God's people. The Babylonian monarchy bade fair to be an absolute, universal, and perpetual one, and, in these pretensions, vied with the Almighty; it is therefore very justly brought down and the last monarch, Belshazzar, was slain on that night that Babylon was taken (Dan. v. 30).

I. The fall of the king of Babylon: a most curious composition is here prepared. It gives us an account of the life and death of this mighty monarch, how he went down slain to the pit, though he had been the terror of the mighty in the land of the living, Ezek. xxxii. 27.

1. The prodigious height of wealth and power at which this monarch and monarchy arrived. Babylon was a golden city, v. 4. The king of Babylon, having so much wealth, by the help of that ruled the nations (v. 6), gave them law, and at his pleasure weakened the nations (v. 12), that they might not be able to make head against him. Such vast armies did he bring into the field, that he made the earth to tremble, and shook kingdoms (v. 16); all his neighbours were afraid of him, and were forced to submit to him.

2. The wretched abuse of all this wealth and power,

(1) Great oppression and cruelty. He is known by the name of the oppressor (v. 4); he has the sceptre of the rulers (v. 5), but it is the staff of the wicked. He smote the people, not in justice, for their correction and reformation, but in wrath (v. 6), with a continual stroke. He ruled them in anger, so that he who had the government of all about him had no government of himself. He made the world as a wilderness, v. 17. He was severe to his captives (v. 17). He opened not the house of his prisoners; he did not let them loose homeward (so the margin reads it); he kept them in close confinement, and never would suffer any to return to their own land. This refers especially to the people of the Jews. He was oppressive to his own subjects (v. 20): Thou hast destroyed thy land, and slain thy people.

(2) Great pride and haughtiness. Notice is here taken of his pomp, the extravagancy of his retinue, v. 11. But it was the temper of his mind that ripened him for ruin (v. 13, 14): Thou hast said in thy heart, like Lucifer, I will ascend into heaven. The king of Babylon here promises himself he shall surpass all his neighbours, and to be as far above those about him as the heaven is above the earth. He called for the vessels of the temple at Jerusalem, to profane them; see Dan. v. 2. In the same humour he here said, I will sit upon the mount of the congregation in the sides of the north; so Mount Zion is said to be situated, Ps. xlviii. 2. Perhaps Belshazzar was projecting an expedition to Jerusalem at the time when God cut him off. He would vie with the God of Israel, of whom he had heard that he had his residence above the heights of the clouds. "But thither," says he, "will I ascend, and be as great as he; I will be like him whom they call the Most High." Some of the first founders of the Assyrian monarchy were deified and stars had their names from them. "But," says he, "I will exalt my throne above them all."

3. The utter ruin that should be brought upon him. It is foretold his wealth and power should be broken. He has been long an oppressor, but he shall cease to be so, v. 4. Those that will not cease to sin God will make to cease. The Lord, the righteous God, has broken the staff of that wicked prince. He is persecuted (v. 6); violent hands are laid upon him. It is the common fate of tyrants to be deserted by their flatterers. Tiberius and Nero thus saw themselves abandoned. He should be slain, and be weak as the dead are, and like unto them, v. 10. His pomp is brought down to the grave (v. 11), that is, it perishes with him. This mighty prince, that used to lie on a bed of down, now shall have the worms spread under him and the worms covering him, which, though he fancied himself a god, proved him to be made of the same mould with other men. The kings of the nations lie in glory (v. 18), everyone in his own house, that is, his own burying-place. But this king of Babylon is cast out and has no grave (v. 19); his dead body is thrown, like that of a beast, into the ditch like an abominable branch of some noxious poisonous plant, which nobody will touch, or as the clothes of male-factors put to death and by the hand of justice thrust through with a sword, on whose dead bodies heaps of stones are raised. The king of Babylon's dead body shall be trodden under feet by the horses and soldiers and crushed to pieces. Thus he shall not be joined with his ancestors in burial, v. 20. Now that he is gone the whole earth is at rest and is quiet, for he was the great disturber of the peace; now they all break forth into singing; the fir-trees and cedars of Lebanon now think themselves safe; there is no danger now of their being cut down, to furnish him with timber. The neighbouring princes who are compared to fir-trees and cedars (Zech. xi. 2), may now be easy, and out of fear of being dispossessed of their rights. The dead will bid him welcome, especially those whom he had barbarously hastened thither (v. 9, 10): Hell from beneath is moved for thee, to meet thee at thy coming. The chief ones of the earth, who when they were alive were kept in awe by him shall scoffingly rise from their thrones and ask him if he will please to sit down in them, as he used to do in their thrones on earth? "Hast thou also become weak as we? Who would have thought it? Thou that didst rank thyself among the immortal gods, art thou come to take thy fate among us poor mortal men? How hast thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer! son of the morning! v. 11, 12. Has such a star become a clod of clay? Did ever any man fall from such a height of honour and power into such an abyss of shame and misery?" Those that see him shall narrowly look upon him, and consider him (v. 15, 16). "Never was death so great a change to any man as it is to him. Is it possible that a man, who a few hours ago looked so great, should now look so ghastly, so despicable, and neglected? Is this the man that made the earth to tremble and shook kingdoms? Who could have thought he should ever come to this?" Ps. lxxxii. 7.

4. Here is an inference drawn from all this (v. 20): The seed of evil-doers shall never be renowned. The princes of the Babylonian monarchy were evildoers, and therefore they had this infamy entailed upon them. There is no credit in a sinful way.

II. The utter ruin of the royal family is here fore-told, together with the royal city.

1. The royal family is to be wholly extirpated. The Medes and Persians, that are to be employed in this destroying work, are ordered, when they have slain Belshazzar, to prepare slaughter for his children (v. 21). Nebuchadnezzar had slain Zedekiah's sons (Jer. lii. 10), and, for that iniquity of his, his seed are paid in the same coin, that they may not rise up to possess the land and do as much mischief in their day as their fathers had done in theirs. The providence of God consults the welfare of nations more than we are aware of by cutting off some who, if they had lived, would have done mischief.

2. The royal city is to be demolished and deserted, v. 23. It shall be a possession for solitary frightful birds, particularly the bittern, joined with the cormorant and the owl, ch. xxxiv. 11.

Verses 24–32

It was almost 200 years from this prediction of Babylon's fall to the accomplishment of it. The people to whom Isaiah prophesied might ask, "What is this to us?" To the question he answers by a prediction of the ruin both of the Assyrians and of the Philistines, shortly. These would be a pledge of future deliverance.

I. Assurance given of the destruction of the Assyrians (v. 25): I will break the Assyrian in my land. Sennacherib brought a formidable army into the land of Judah, but there God broke it. "I will break the Assyrian; let me alone to do it." The breaking of the power of the Assyrian would be the breaking of the yoke from off the neck of God's people: His burden shall depart from off their shoulders, the burden of quartering that vast army and paying contribution. This prophecy is here ratified and confirmed by an oath (v. 24): The Lord of hosts hath sworn. What is here said of this particular intention is true of all God's purposes. The breaking of the Assyrian power is made a specimen of what God would do with all the nations engaged against him and his church (v. 26), not only upon the Assyrian empire which was then reckoned to be all the world, as afterwards the Roman empire was (Luke ii. 1) for with it many nations fell that had dependence upon it. It is still true, and will ever be so. God will be an enemy to his people's enemies, Exod. xxiii. 22. All the powers on earth are defied to change God's plan (v. 27): "The Lord of hosts has purposed to break the Assyrian's yoke, and who has power enough to turn it back or to stay the course of his judgments?"

II. Assurance is likewise given of the destruction of the Philistines and their power. This came in the year that king Ahaz died, which was the first year of Hezekiah's reign, v. 28. The Philistines are rebuked for triumphing in the death of king Uzziah. He had been as a serpent to them (v. 29), had brought them very low, 2 Chron. xxvi. 6. He warred against the Philistines, broke down their walls, and built cities among them. But when Uzziah abdicated, it was told with joy in Gath and published in the streets of Ashkelon. They made reprisals upon Ahaz, and took many cities of Judah (2 Chron. xxviii. 18), yet out of the root of Uzziah should come a cockatrice, a more formidable enemy than Uzziah, even Hezekiah, the fruit of whose government should be to them a fiery flying serpent, for he should fall upon them with incredible swiftness and fury. He smote the Philistines even to Gaza (2 Kings xviii. 8). "When the people of God, whom the Philistines had wasted, and distressed, and impoverished, shall enjoy plenty again, and the first-born of their poor shall feed (the poorest among them shall have food convenient), then, as for the Philistines, God will kill their root with famine" (v. 30). When the needy of God's people shall lie down in safety, delighting in the songs of peace, then every gate and every city of the Philistines shall be howling and crying (v. 31), and there shall be a total dissolution of their state; for from Judea, which lay north of the Philistines, there shall come a smoke (a vast army raising a great dust, the indication of a devouring fire at hand), and none of all that army shall be alone in his appointed times; none shall straggle or be missing when they are to engage.

III. The good use that should be made of all these events for the encouragement of the people of God (v. 32): What shall one then answer the messengers of the nations?

1. This implies that the great things God does for his people are noticed by their neighbours. Messengers will be sent to enquire concerning them. It concerns us always to be ready to give a reason of the hope that we have in the providence of God with meekness and fear, 1 Pet. iii. 15.

2. The answer which is to be given to the messengers: God is and will be a faithful friend to his church and people. Tell them that the Lord has founded Zion. God, in all the revolutions of states and kingdoms, is founding Zion; he is aiming at the advancement of his church's interests. The messengers of the nations, when they sent to enquire concerning Hezekiah's successes against the Philistines, expected to learn of politics, and arts of war, but they are told that these successes were not owing to anything of that nature, but to the care God took of his church. The poor of his people shall trust in it, his poor people who have lately been brought very low. The poor receive the gospel, Matt. xi. 5. They shall trust to this, to this great truth, that the Lord has founded Zion; on this they shall build their hopes, and not on an arm of flesh. However it may go with particular parties, the church, having God himself for its founder and Christ the rock for its foundation, cannot but stand firm. They will not fear what man can do unto them.

CHAP. XV

This chapter, and that which follows it, are the burden of Moab—a prophecy of some great desolation that was coming upon that country, which bordered upon this land of Israel, and had often been injurious and vexatious to it, though the Moabites were descended from Lot, Abraham's kinsman and companion, and though the Israelites, by the appointment of God, had spared them when they might both easily and justly have cut them off with their neighbours. In this chapter we have, I. Great lamentation made by the Moabites, and by the prophet himself for them, ver. 1–5. II. The great calamities which should occasion that lamentation and justify it, ver. 6–9.

Verses 1–5

The country of Moab was of small extent, but very fruitful. It bordered upon the lot of Reuben on the other side Jordan and upon the Dead Sea. Naomi went to sojourn there when there was a famine in Canaan. This is the country which (it is here foretold) should be wasted and grievously harassed. We find another prophecy of its ruin (Jer. xlviii), which was accomplished by Nebuchadnezzar. This prophecy here was to be fulfilled within three years (ch. xvi. 14), and therefore was fulfilled, either by the army of Shalmaneser, about the time of the taking of Samaria, in the fourth year of Hezekiah, or by the army of Sennacherib, which, ten years after, invaded Judah. The prophet delivered this prophecy to his own people to show them that there is a providence which governs the world and all the nations of it—and that to the God of Israel the worshippers of false gods were accountable. The accomplishment of this prophecy shortly (within three years) might be a confirmation of the prophet's mission and of the truth of all his other prophecies. Concerning Moab it is here foretold,

I. That their chief cities should be surprised and taken in a night by the enemy (v. 1): Therefore there shall be great grief, because in the night Ar of Moab is laid waste and Kir of Moab, the two principal cities of that kingdom. In the night that they were taken, or sacked, Moab was cut off. The seizing of them laid the whole country open, and made the wealth of it an easy prey. As the country feeds the cities, so the cities protect the country, and neither can say to the other, I have no need of thee.

II. That the Moabites should have recourse to their idols for relief (v. 2): He (that is, the king of Moab) has gone up to Bajith (or rather to the house or temple of Chemosh), and Dibon, the inhabitants of Dibon, have gone up to the high places, where they worshipped their idols, there to make their complaints.

III. That there should be universal grief all the country over. It is described here very affectingly. Moab shall be a vale of tears—a little map of this world, v. 2. The Moabites shall lament the loss of Nebo and Medeba, two considerable cities which, it is likely, were plundered and burnt. They shall tear their hair for grief to such a degree that on all their heads shall be baldness, and they shall cut off their beards, according to the customary expressions of mourning in those times and countries. In the streets they shall gird themselves with sackcloth (v. 3). They shall go up to the tops of their houses which were flat-roofed, and there they shall weep abundantly, shall howl, crying to their gods. They shall come down with weeping (so the margin reads it) from the tops of their houses weeping as much as they did when they went up.

IV. That the courage of their militia should fail them. Though they were bred soldiers, they shall cry out and shriek for fear, and every one of them shall have his life become grievous to him, v. 4.

V. That the outcry for these calamities should propagate grief to all the adjacent parts, v. 5. The prophet himself has impressions made upon his spirit by the prediction of it: My heart shall cry out for Moab; though they are enemies to Israel, they are our fellow-creatures. It becomes God's ministers to be of a tender spirit, to be like their master, who wept over Jerusalem even when he gave her up to ruin, like their God, who desires not the death of sinners. All the neighbouring cities shall echo to the lamentations of Moab. The fugitives, who are making the best of their way to shift for their own safety, shall carry the cry to Zoar, the city to which their ancestor Lot fled for shelter from Sodom's flames and which was spared for his sake. They shall make as great a noise with their cry as a heifer of three years old does when she goes lowing for her calf, as 1 Sam. vi. 12. They shall go up the hill of Luhith (as David went up the ascent of Mount Olivet, many a weary step and all in tears, 2 Sam. xv. 30), and in the way of Horonaim (a dual termination), the way that leads to the two Beth-horons, the upper and the nether, which we read of, Joshua xvi. 3, 5.

"By this time the cry has gone round about all the borders of Moab," v. 8. It has reached to Eglaim, a city at one end of the country, and to Beer-elim, a city as far the other way.

I. The waters of Nimrim are desolate (v. 6), that is, the country is plundered and impoverished. Famine is usually the sad effect of war. Look into the houses, and they are stripped too (v. 7): The abundance of wealth that they had gotten with a great deal of industry, and that which they had laid up with a great deal of care, shall they carry away to the brook of the willows. Either the owners shall carry it thither to hide it or the enemies shall pack it up and send it home, by water perhaps, to their own country.

II. The waters of Dimon are turned into blood (v. 9), that is, the inhabitants of the country are slain in great numbers. Dimon signifies bloody; the place shall answer to its name. I will bring additions upon Dimon (so the word is), additional plagues; I have yet more judgments in reserve for them. For all this, God's anger is not turned away. Some make their escape, others are overlooked, and are as a remnant of the land; but upon both God will bring lions, beasts of prey.

CHAP. XVI

This chapter continues and concludes the burden of Moab. In it, I. The prophet gives good counsel to the Moabites, to reform, and particularly to be kind to God's people, to prevent the judgments before threatened, ver. 1–5. II. Fearing they would not take this counsel, he goes on to foretell the devastation of their country within three years, ver. 6–14.

Verses 1–5

God has made it to appear that he delights not in the ruin of sinners by telling them what they may do to prevent the ruin; so he does here to Moab.

I. He advises them to be just to the house of David, and to pay the tribute they had formerly covenanted to pay (v. 1): Send you the lamb to the ruler of the land. David made the Moabites tributaries to him,

2 Sam. viii. 2. Afterwards they paid their tribute to the kings of Israel (2 Kings iii. 4), and paid it in lambs. Now the prophet requires them to pay it to Hezekiah. Let it be levied from all parts of the country, from Selah, a frontier city of Moab on the one side, to the wilderness, a boundary of the kingdom on the other side: and let it be sent to the mount of the daughter of Zion, the city of David. Some think it is spoken ironically. I rather take it as good advice seriously given, like that of Daniel to Nebuchadnezzar when he was reading him his doom, Dan. iv. 27. And it is applicable to the great gospel duty of submission to Christ, as the ruler of the land, and our ruler. When you come to God, the great ruler, come in the name of the Lamb, the Lamb of God. The daughters of Moab (the country villages, or the women of your country) shall flutter about the fords of Arnon, attempting that way to make their escape to some other land, like a wandering bird thrown out of the nest half-fledged.

II. He advises them to be kind to the seed of Israel (v. 3): Take counsel, reverse all the unrighteous decrees you have made, by which you have put hardships upon the people of God.

1. The prophet foresaw some storm coming upon the people of God, who, by the merciful providence of God, escaped the fury of the Assyrian army, but were put to the utmost extremity to shift for their own safety. The danger and trouble they were in were like the scorching heat at noon.

2. He bespeaks a shelter for them in the land of Moab, when their own land was made too hot for them. Thus kindly must they deal with the people of God. If they would continue in their habitations, let them now open their doors to the dispersed members of God's church, and be to them like a cool shade to those that bear the burden and heat of the day. "Betray not him that wandereth, nor deliver him up" (as the Edomites did, Obad. 13, 14), "but hide the outcasts." "Nay, do not only hide them for a time, but, if there be occasion, let them be naturalized: Let my outcasts dwell with thee, Moab (v. 4); find a lodging for them and be thou a covert to them." They are outcasts, but they are my outcasts. The Lord knows those that are his wherever he finds them, even where no one else knows them. He will himself be their dwelling-place if they have no other, and in him they shall be at home.

3. He assures them of the mercy God had in store for his people. They should not long need their kindness, or be troublesome to them: For the extortioner is almost at an end already, and the spoiler ceases. They should, ere long, be in a capacity to return their kindness (v. 5): "Though the throne of the ten tribes be overturned, yet the throne of David shall be established in mercy, and by the same methods may your throne be established if you please. Make Hezekiah your friend. He shall sit upon the throne in truth. Then he shall sit judging, and will then be a protector to those that have been a shelter to the people of God." And see in him the character of a good magistrate. He shall seek judgment; that is, he shall seek occasions of doing right to those that are wronged. He shall hasten righteousness, and not delay to do justice. Let the Moabites take example by this, and then assure themselves that their state shall be established.

Verses 6–14

I. The sins with which Moab is charged, v. 6. The prophet seems to check himself for going about to give good counsel to the Moabites. He would have healed them, but they would not be healed. Perhaps there are more precious souls ruined by pride than by any one lust whatsoever. The Moabites were notorious for this: "We have heard in both ears of the pride of Moab. They think themselves too wise to be advised; therefore they will not take example by Hezekiah to do justly and love mercy. We have heard of his wrath too (for those that are very proud are commonly very passionate), particularly his wrath against the people of God, whom he will rather persecute than protect. It is with his lies that he gains the gratifications of his pride and his passion; but his lies shall not be so; he shall not compass his proud and angry projects as he hoped he should."

II. The sorrows with which Moab is threatened (v. 7): Therefore shall Moab howl for Moab. For the foundations of Kir-hareseth shall you mourn. That great and strong city, which had held out against a mighty force (2 Kings iii. 25), should now be levelled with the ground. Moab was famous for its fields and vineyards; but those shall all be laid waste by the invading army, v. 8, 10. It was planted with choice and noble vines, with principal plants, which reached even to Jazer, and wound themselves along the ranges on which they were spread, even through the wilderness of Moab. There were vineyards there, stretched out, even to the sea, the Dead Sea. Many a time they had shouted for their summer fruits, and for their harvest. They had had joy and gladness in their fields and vineyards, singing and shouting at the treading of their grapes. Nothing is said of their praising God for their abundance, and giving him the glory of it. They made it the food and fuel of their lusts, therefore they should be stripped of all. "The fields shall languish. The soldiers, called here the lords of the heathen, shall break down all the plants, principal plants, the choicest that could be got. The joy of harvest has ceased; there is no more singing: the ruin of their country has marred their mirth." Destroy the vines and the fig-trees, and you make all the mirth of a carnal heart to cease, Hos. ii. 11, 12. But a gracious soul can rejoice in the Lord as the God of its salvation even when the fig-tree does not blossom and there is no fruit in the vine, Hab. iii. 17, 18. The concurrence of the prophet with them in this sorrow: "I will with weeping bewail Jazer, and the vine of Sibmah, and look with a compassionate concern upon the desolations of such a pleasant country. I will water thee with my tears, O Heshbon! and mingle them with thy tears;" nay (v. 11), it appears to be an inward grief: My bowels shall sound like a harp for Moab. The afflictions of the world, as well as those of the church, should be afflictions to us. See ch. xv. 5.

III. In the close of the chapter we see the insufficiency of the gods of Moab to help them, v. 12. "Moab shall be soon weary of the high place. He shall spend his spirits and strength in vain in praying to his idols; they cannot help him, and he shall be convinced that they cannot." But when he is weary of his high places, he will not go, as he should, to God's sanctuary, but to his sanctuary, to the temple of Chemosh, the principal idol of Moab (so it is generally understood); and he shall pray there to as little purpose. The thing itself was long since determined (v. 13): This is the word, this is the thing, that the Lord has spoken concerning Moab, since the time that he began to be so proud, and insolent, and abusive to God's people. The country was long ago doomed to ruin. Now it was made known when it should be done. The Lord has spoken that it shall be within three years, v. 14. God makes known his mind by degrees; the light of divine revelation shone more and more, and so does the light of divine grace in the heart. The glory of Moab shall be contemned, that is, it shall be contemptible, when all those things they have gloried in shall come to nothing. It was the glory of Moab that their country was very populous and their forces were courageous; but the little remnant that is left shall be very small and feeble. Within three years, as the years of a hireling, it shall be at the three years' end exactly, for a servant that is hired for a certain term keeps account to a day. Fair warning is given, and with it space to repent, which if they had improved, as Nineveh did, we have reason to think the judgments threatened would have been prevented.

CHAP. XVII

Syria and Ephraim were confederate against Judah (ch. vii. 1, 2), and, they being so closely linked together, this chapter, entitled "the burden of Damascus" (which was the head city of Syria), reads the doom of Israel too. I. The destruction of the strong cities both of Syria and Israel is here foretold, ver. 1–5 and again ver. 9–11. II. In the midst of judgment mercy is remembered to Israel, and a gracious promise made that a remnant should be preserved from the calamities and should get good by them, ver. 6–8. III. The overthrow of the Assyrian army before Jerusalem is pointed at ver. 12–14. In order of time this chapter should be placed next after ch. ix, for the destruction of Damascus, here foretold, happened in the reign of Ahaz, 2 Kings xvi. 9.

Verses 1–5

We have here the burden of Damascus; the Chaldee paraphrase reads it, The burden of the cup of the curse to drink to Damascus in; and, the ten tribes being in alliance they must expect to pledge Damascus in this cup of trembling. 1. Damascus itself, the head city of Syria, must be destroyed; the houses will be burnt, the walls, and gates, and fortifications demolished, and the inhabitants carried away captive, so that it is taken away from being a city, and is reduced to a ruinous heap, v. 1. The country towns are abandoned by their inhabitants. The cities of Aroer (a province of Syria so called) are forsaken (v. 2); so that the places which should be for men to live in are for flocks to lie down in. Stately houses are converted into sheep-cotes. The strongholds of Israel, the kingdom of the ten tribes, will be brought to ruin: The fortress shall cease from Ephraim (v. 3). The Syrians were the ring-leaders in that confederacy against Judah, and therefore they are punished first and sorest; and, now that Israel is weakened, The remnant of Syria shall be as the glory of the children of Israel; those few that remain of the Syrians shall be in as mean and despicable a condition as the children of Israel are. The glory of Jacob is wasted like a man in a consumption, v. 4. The glory of Jacob was their numbers, but this glory shall be made thin, when many are cut off, and few left. Israel died of a lingering disease; the kingdom of the ten tribes wasted gradually. It is all gathered and carried away by the Assyrian army, v. 5. And the victorious army, like the careful husbandmen in the valley of Rephaim, where the corn was extraordinary, would not, if they could help it, leave an ear behind.

Verses 6–8

Mercy is here reserved, in a parenthesis in the midst of judgment, for a remnant that should escape the common ruin of the kingdom of the ten tribes. The meek of the earth were hidden in the day of the Lord's anger, and had their lives made comfortable to them by their retirement to the land of Judah. 1. They shall be but a small remnant, who shall be marked for preservation (v. 6): Gleaning grapes shall be left in it. The body of the people were carried into captivity. Those that are left are but like the poor remains of an olive tree when it has been carefully shaken: if there be two or three berries in the top of the uppermost bough (out of the reach of those that shook it), that is all. They shall be a sanctified remnant, v. 7, 8. These had repented of their sins and returned their lives, and therefore were snatched thus as brands out of the burning. They shall look up to their Creator, shall acknowledge his hand in all the events concerning them, merciful and afflictive, and shall submit to his hand. They shall look from their idols, the creatures of their own fancy, shall no longer worship them, and expect relief from them. He that looks to his Maker must not look to the altars, the work of his hands, must not retain the least respect for that which his fingers have made, but break it to pieces.

Verses 9–11

Here the prophet returns to foretell the desolations that should be made in Israel by the army of the Assyrians. Even the strong cities, which should have protected the country, shall not be able to protect themselves: They shall be as a forsaken bough and an uppermost branch of an old tree, which has gone to decay, is bare, and dry, and dead. As the Canaanites fled before Israel, so Israel should now flee before the Assyrians. The country should be laid waste, v. 10, 11. "It is because thou hast forgotten the God of thy salvation and all the great salvations he has wrought for thee, and hast not been mindful of the rock of thy strength, who has been thy strength many a time, or thou wouldst have been broken long since." They had taken great care to improve their land and to make it more pleasant. It was like a garden and a vineyard; replenished with plants, the choicest of its own growth; and not content with them, they sent to all the neighbouring countries for strange slips. This instance seems to be put in general for their great industry in cultivating their ground; they doubt not but their plants will grow and flourish. But the harvest shall be a heap, all in confusion, in the day of grief and of desperate sorrow. The harvest had sometimes been a day of grief, if the crop was thin; and yet in that case there was hope that the next would be better. But this shall be desperate sorrow, for they shall see not only this year's products carried off, but the property of the ground altered and their conquerors lords of it.

Verses 12–14

These verses read the doom of those that rob the people of God. If the Assyrians and Israelites invade and plunder Judah, if the Assyrian army take God's people captive and lay their country waste, let them know that ruin will be their lot. The Assyrian army was made up out of divers nations: it was the multitude of many people (v. 12), by which weight they hoped to carry the cause. They were noisy, like the roaring of the seas, to frighten God's people from resisting them. Sennacherib and Rabshakeh, in their speeches and letters, made a mighty noise to strike terror upon Hezekiah and his people; the nations that followed them made a rushing like the rushing of many waters. They thought to carry their point by dint of noise; but (v. 12), he shall rebuke them, that is, God shall, and then they shall flee afar off. Sennacherib, and Rabshakeh, and the remains of their forces, shall be chased by their own terrors, as the chaff of the mountains which stand bleak before the wind, and like a rolling thing before the whirlwind, like thistle-down (so the margin). God will make them like a wheel or rolling thing, and make them afraid with his storm, Ps. lxxxiii. 13, 15. This shall be done suddenly (v. 14): At evening-tide they are very troublesome, and threaten trouble to the people of God; but before the morning they are not. At sleeping time they are cast into a deep sleep, Ps. lxxvi. 5, 6. It was in the night that the angel routed the Assyrian army.

CHAP. XVIII

Whatever country it is that is meant here by "the land shadowing with wings", God has, upon his people's account, a quarrel with it. I. They threaten God's people, ver. 1 2. II. All the neighbours are called to notice what will be the issue, ver. 3. III.

Though God seem unconcerned in the distress of his people for a time, he will at length appear against their enemies and cut them off, ver. 4–6.

Verses 1–7

Interpreters are very much at a loss where to find this land that lies beyond the rivers of Cush. Some take it to be Egypt, but against this it is objected that the next chapter is distinguished by the title of the burden of Egypt. Others take it to be Ethiopia, of which Tirhakah was king. He thought to protect the Jews, as it were, under the shadow of his wings, by giving a powerful diversion to the king of Assyria, when he was attacking Jerusalem, 2 Kings xix. 9. But though by his ambassadors he bade defiance to the king of Assyria, God will take another course to protect Jerusalem. But from a hint of Dr. Lightfoot's, in his Harmony of the Old Testament, I incline to understand this chapter as a prophecy against Assyria, and so a continuation of the last three verses of the foregoing chapter. That was against the army of the Assyrians which rushed in upon Judah; this is against the land of Assyria itself, which lay beyond the rivers Euphrates and Tigris.

I. The attempt made by this land (whatever it is) upon a nation scattered and peeled, v. 2. Whether this refer to the Ethiopians waging war with the Assyrians, or the Assyrians with Judah, it teaches us that a people which have been terrible from their beginning, and borne a mighty sway, may yet become scattered and peeled, and may be spoiled even by their own rivers, that should enrich both the husbandman and the merchant. "It is a nation that has been terrible, and is now a nation scattered and peeled, meted out and trodden down, and therefore an easy prey for us."

II. The alarm sounded to the nations about, by which they are summoned to take notice of what God is about to do, v. 3. He lifts up an ensign upon the mountains, and blows a trumpet, by which he proclaims war against the enemies of his church, and calls in all her friends. He is about to do some great work, as Lord of hosts.

III. The assurance God gives to his prophet, by him to be given to his people, that, though he might seem for a time to sit by as an unconcerned spectator, yet he would certainly appear for the comfort of his people and the confusion of his and their enemies (v. 4): So the Lord said unto me. He will take care of his people, and be a shelter to them. He will regard his dwelling-place; Zion is his rest for ever, and he will look after it (so some read it). He will be as a clear heat after rain (so the margin), like a dew and a cloud in the heat of harvest, which are very welcome, the dew to the ground and the cloud to the labourers. Great men have their winter-house and their summer-house (Amos iii. 15); but those that are at home with God have both in him. He will reckon with his and their enemies, v. 5, 6. When the Assyrian army promises itself a plentiful harvest in the taking of Jerusalem, God shall destroy that army as easily as the husbandman cuts off the sprigs of the vine with pruning hooks, or takes away and cuts down the branches. This seems to point at the dead bodies of the soldiers scattered like the branches of a wild vine, cut to pieces. And they shall be left to the fowls of the earth, to prey upon. In that time, when this shall be accomplished, shall the present be brought unto the Lord of hosts. Those that were a people scattered and peeled, meted out, and trodden down (v. 2), shall be a present to the Lord: and, though they seem useless and worthless, they shall be acceptable to him who judges men by the sincerity of their faith and love, not by the pomp and prosperity of their outward condition. It is prophesied (Ps. lxviii. 31) that Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God. Others understand it of the spoil of Sennacherib's army, out of which, presents were brought to the Lord of hosts.

CHAP. XIX

As Assyria was a rod to Judah, with which it was smitten, so Egypt was a broken reed, with which it was cheated; and therefore God had a quarrel with them both. Here we have the burden of Egypt, I. That it should be brought low, and should be as contemptible among the nations as now it was considerable, ver. 1–17. II. That at length God's holy religion should be brought into Egypt, in part by the Jews that should flee thither for refuge, but more fully by the preachers of the gospel of Christ, through whose ministry churches should be planted in Egypt in the days of the Messiah (ver. 18–25).

Verses 1–17

Though the land of Egypt had of old been a house of bondage to the people of God, the unbelieving Jews trusted to Egypt for help (ch. xxx. 2), and thither they fled, in disobedience to God's express command, when things were brought to the last extremity in their own country, Jer. xliii. 7. Rabshakeh upbraided Hezekiah with this, ch. xxxvi. 6. While they kept up an alliance with Egypt they stood not in awe of the judgments of God; they depended upon Egypt to protect them. To prevent all this mischief, Egypt must be mortified.

I. The gods of Egypt shall appear utterly unable to help them, v. 1. "The Lord rides upon a cloud, a swift cloud, and shall come into Egypt. As a judge goes in state to try and condemn the malefactors, so shall God come into Egypt with his judgments." In all this burden of Egypt there is no mention of any foreign enemy invading them; but God himself will come against them, and raise up the causes of their destruction from among themselves. When he comes the idols of Egypt shall be moved. Isis, Osiris, and Apis, idols of Egypt, being found unable to relieve their worshippers, shall be disowned and rejected by them. The Egyptians shall seek to the idols, when they are at their wits' end, and consult the charmers and wizards (v. 3); but all in vain.

II. The militia of Egypt, that had been famed for their valour, shall be disheartened. Their heroes, that used to be celebrated for courage, shall be posted for cowards: The heart of Egypt shall melt in the midst of it, like wax before the fire (v. 1); the spirit of Egypt shall fail, v. 3. They shall be like women (v. 16); they shall be frightened and put into confusion by the least alarm.

III. The Egyptians shall be embroiled in quarrels among themselves. There shall be no occasion to bring a foreign force upon them to destroy them; they shall destroy one another (v. 2): I will set the Egyptians against the Egyptians; they shall fight everyone against his brother and neighbour, city against city, and kingdom against kingdom. Egypt was then divided into twelve provinces, or dynasties; but Psammetichus, the governor of one of them, by setting them at variance with one another, at length made himself master of them all. A kingdom thus divided against itself would soon be brought to desolation.

IV. Their politics shall be turned into foolishness. When God will destroy the nation he will destroy the counsel thereof (v. 3). They make fools of one another, everyone betrays his own folly, and divine Providence makes fools of them all, v. 11. The nobles of Egypt boasted much of their antiquity, producing fabulous records of their succession for above 10,000 years. This humour prevailed much among them about this time, as appears by Herodotus, their common boast being that Egypt was some thousands of years more ancient than any other nation. "But where are thy wise men? v. 12. Let them with all their skill know what the Lord of hosts has purposed upon Egypt, and arm themselves accordingly. Nay, so far are they from doing this that they themselves are, in effect, contriving the ruin of Egypt, and, hastening it on, v. 13. The princes of Noph are not only deceived themselves, but they have seduced Egypt." It is sad with a people when those that undertake for their safety are helping forward their destruction; so here (v. 14): They have caused Egypt to err in every work thereof.

V. The rod of government shall be turned into the serpent of tyranny and oppression (v. 4): "The Egyptians will I give over into the hand of a cruel lord, not a foreigner, but one that shall rule over them by an hereditary right, but shall be a fierce king and rule them with rigour."

VI. Egypt was famous for its river Nile, which was its wealth, and strength, and is here threatened that the waters shall fail from the sea and the river shall be wasted and dried up, v. 5. The fruitfulness of the country depended wholly upon the overflowing of the river; if that be dried up, their fruitful land will soon be turned into barrenness and their harvests cease: Everything sown by the brooks will wither of course, will be driven away, and be no more, v. 7. If the paper-reeds at the very mouth wither, much more the corn, which lies at a greater distance. The drying up of their rivers is the destruction of their fortifications, for they are brooks of defence (v. 6). But these shall be emptied and dried up, not by an enemy, as Sennacherib with the sole of his foot dried up mighty rivers (ch. xxxvii. 25), but by the providence of God, which sometimes turns water-springs into dry ground, Ps. cvii. 33. The drying up of the rivers will kill the fish (Ps. cv. 29), and will thereby ruin those who make it their business to catch fish, whether by angling or nets (v. 8); they shall lament and languish, for their trade is at an end. There were those that made sluices and ponds for fish (v. 10), but they shall be broken in the purposes thereof; their business will fail for want of water to fill their ponds. The loss of these advantages by the river is their own doing (v. 6): They shall turn the rivers far away. Their kings and great men will drain water from the main river to their own houses, preferring their private convenience before the public good. Herodotus tells us that Pharaoh-Necho, projecting to cut a free passage by water from Nilus into the Red Sea, employed a vast number of men to make a channel for that purpose, impaired the river, lost 120,000 of his people, and yet left the work unaccomplished.

VII. Egypt was famous for the linen manufacture; but that trade shall be ruined. Solomon's merchants traded with Egypt for linen-yarn, 1 Kings x. 28. Their country produced the best flax and the best hands to work it; but those that work in fine flax shall be confounded (v. 9). The trade of Egypt must needs sink, for (v. 15) there shall not be any work for Egypt; and where there is nothing to be done there is nothing to be got. There shall be no work which either head or tail, branch or rush, may do; nothing for high or low, weak or strong, to do.

VIII. A general consternation shall seize the Egyptians; they shall be afraid and fear (v. 16), an evidence of decay and of ruin. When they hear of the desolations made in Judah by the army of Sennacherib (v. 17), they will conclude it must be their turn next to become a prey to that victorious army. They shall fear (v. 16) because of the shaking of the hand of the Lord of hosts, and (v. 17) because of the counsel of the Lord of hosts. From the shaking of his hand they shall conclude he has determined against Egypt as well as Judah. For, if judgment begin at the house of God, where will it end?

Out of the threatening clouds of the prophecy the sun here breaks forth, and it is the sun of righteousness. Still God has mercy in store for Egypt, and he will show it, by bringing the true religion among them, calling them to the worship of the one true God. The preaching (as is supposed) of Mark the Evangelist, led to the founding of Christian churches in Egypt. Many prophecies of this book point to the days of the Messiah; and why not this? It is no unusual thing to speak of gospel graces and ordinances in the language of the Old Testament institutions. And, in these prophecies, those words, in that day, perhaps have not always a reference to what goes immediately before, but have a peculiar significancy pointing at that day, when the day-spring from on high should visit this dark world. Yet it is not improbable that this prophecy was in part fulfilled when those Jews who fled from their own country to take shelter in Egypt, when Sennacherib invaded their land, brought their religion along with them. Josephus tells us that Onias the son of Onias the high priest, living an outlaw at Alexandria, obtained leave of Ptolemy Philometer, and Cleopatra his queen, to build a temple to the God of Israel, like that at Jerusalem, at Bubastis in Egypt, and pretended a warrant for doing it from this prophecy in Isaiah, that there shall be an altar to the Lord in the land of Egypt. The conversion of Egypt is here described.

I. They shall speak the language of Canaan, the holy language, the scripture language; they shall not only understand it, but use it (v. 18). Five cities in Egypt shall speak this language; so many Jews shall come to reside in Egypt, and shall soon replenish five cities, one of which shall be the city of Heliopolis, where the sun was worshipped, the most infamous of all the cities of Egypt for idolatry; even there shall be a wonderful reformation.

II. They shall swear to the Lord of hosts, not only swear by him, but shall by a solemn oath devote themselves to his honour and bind themselves to his service.

III. They shall set up the public worship of God in their land (v. 19): There shall be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt, an altar on which they shall do sacrifice and oblation (v. 21); this must be understood spiritually, for by the law of Moses there was to be no altar for sacrifice but that at Jerusalem. In Christ Jesus all distinction of nations is taken away; and a spiritual altar, a gospel church, in Egypt, is as acceptable to God as one in Israel.

IV. There shall be a face of religion upon the nation. Not only in the heart of the country, but even in the borders of it, there shall be a pillar, inscribed, To Jehovah, to his honour. Even in the land of Egypt he had some faithful worshippers, who made his name their strong tower.

V. Being in distress, they shall seek to God, and he shall be found of them; and this shall be a sign and a witness for the Lord of hosts that he is a prayer-hearing God to all flesh that come to him, v. 20, 22.

VI. They shall have an interest in the great Redeemer. Repenting Egyptians shall find the same favour with God that repenting Ninevites did. But all these deliverances wrought for them, as those for Israel, were but figures of gospel salvation.

VII. The knowledge of God shall prevail among them, v. 21. Perhaps this may in part refer to the translation of the Old Testament out of Hebrew into Greek by the LXX, which was done at Alexandria in Egypt. By the help of this (the Greeks having introduced their language into that country) the Lord was known to Egypt. It is promised that the Egyptians shall know the Lord.

VIII. They shall come into the communion of saints. Being joined to the Lord, they shall be added to the church. Enmities shall be slain. Mortal feuds there had been between Egypt and Assyria; but now there shall be a highway between Egypt and Assyria

(v. 23); they shall trade with one another, and everything that passes between them shall be friendly. The Egyptians shall serve with the Assyrians. Those who have communion with the same God, meeting at the same throne of grace, and serving with each other should put an end to all heats and animosities, and knit our hearts to each other in holy love. The Gentile nations shall not only unite with each other in the gospel fold under Christ the great shepherd, but they shall all be united with the Jews. When Egypt and Assyria become partners in serving God Israel shall make a third with them (v. 24); they shall become a three-fold cord, not easily broken. Thus united, they shall be a blessing in the midst of the land, whom the Lord of hosts shall bless, v. 24, 25. They shall all be a blessing to the world. Though Egypt was formerly a house of bondage, and Assyria an unjust invader, all this shall now be forgiven and forgotten, and they shall be as welcome to God as Israel. They are all alike his people whom he takes under his protection.

CHAP. XX

This chapter is a prediction of the carrying away of multitudes both of the Egyptians and the Ethiopians into captivity by the king of Assyria. Here is, I. The sign by which this was foretold, which was the prophet's going for some time barefoot and almost naked, like a poor captive, ver. 1–2. II. The explication of that sign, with application to Egypt and Ethiopia, ver 3–5. III. The good use which the people of God should make of this, which is never to trust in an arm of flesh, because thus it will deceive them, ver. 6.

Verses 1–6

God here, as King of nations, brings a sore calamity upon Egypt and Ethiopia, but, as King of saints, brings good to his people out of it.

I. The date of this prophecy. It was in the year that Ashdod, a strong city of the Philistines, was besieged and taken by an army of the Assyrians. It is uncertain what year of Hezekiah that was. He that was now king of Assyria is called Sargon. Tartan, who was general, or commander-in-chief, in this expedition, was one of Sennacherib's officers, sent by him to bid defiance to Hezekiah, in concurrence with Rabshakeh, 2 Kings xviii. 17.

II. The making of Isaiah a sign, by his unusual dress. He had been a sign to his own people of the melancholy times that had come and were coming upon them, by the sackcloth which he had worn. Sackcloth he wore as a prophet, to show himself mortified to the world. Elijah wore hair-cloth (2 Kings i. 8), and John Baptist (Matt. iii. 4), but Isaiah has orders to loose his sackcloth from his loins, not to exchange it for better clothing, but for none at all, and he must put off his shoes, and go barefoot. This was a great hardship upon the prophet and would expose him to contempt and ridicule, but God bade him do it, that he might give a proof of his obedience to God, and so shame the disobedience of his people. When we are in the way of our duty we may trust God both with our credit and with our safety.

III. The exposition of this sign, v. 3, 4. It was intended to signify that the Egyptians and the Ethiopians should be led away captive by the king of Assyria, thus stripped, as Isaiah was. God calls him his servant Isaiah, because in this matter he had approved himself God's willing, obedient servant; and for this very thing, God gloried in him. Isaiah is said to have walked naked and barefoot three years, whenever in that time he appeared as a prophet. Three campaigns successively shall the Assyrian army make, in spoiling the Egyptians and Ethiopians, and carrying them away captive, now stripped, and scarcely having rags to cover their nakedness. It is particularly said to be to the shame of Egypt (v. 4), because the Egyptians were a proud people.

IV. The use and application of this, v. 5, 6. Those countries that were in danger of being overrun by the Assyrians expected that Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, would put a stop to the progress of their victorious arms, and be a barrier to his neighbours; and that Egypt, a kingdom so famous for policy and prowess, would oblige them to raise the siege of Ashdod and retire. But, instead of this, by attempting to oppose the king of Assyria they did but make their country a prey to him. They were more afraid now than ever of the growing greatness of the king of Assyria, before whom Egypt and Ethiopia proved but as briers and thorns put to stop a consuming fire. The Jews in particular should be convinced of their folly in resting upon such broken reeds (v. 6): The inhabitants of this isle (the land of Judah, situated upon the sea, though not surrounded by it), everyone shall now have his eyes opened, and shall say, "Behold, such is our expectation! We have fled to the Egyptians and Ethiopians, and have hoped by them to be delivered from the king of Assyria; but, now that they are broken, how shall we escape, that are not able to bring such armies into the field as they did?"

CHAP. XXI

In this chapter we have a prophecy of sad times coming, and heavy burdens, I. Upon Babylon, here called "the desert of the sea", that it should be destroyed by the Medes and Persians, ver. 1–10. II. Upon Dumah, or Idumea, ver. 11, 12. III. Upon Arabia, or Kedar, ver. 13–17.

Verses 1–10

We had one burden of Babylon before (ch. xiii); here we have another prediction of its fall. Babylon sometimes pretended to be a friend to them (as ch. xxxix. 1), and God would hereby warn them not to trust to that friendship, and not to be afraid of their enmity. Babylon is marked for ruin; and all that believe God's prophets can see it tottering. Babylon is here called the desert or plain of the sea; for it was a flat country, and full of lakes, and was abundantly watered with the many streams of the river Euphrates. It did but lately begin to be famous, Nineveh having outshone it while the monarchy was in the Assyrian hands; but it became the lady of kingdoms; and, before Nebuchadnezzar's time, God by this prophet plainly foretold its fall, again and again, that his people might not be terrified at its rise, nor despair of relief when they were its prisoners, Job v. 3; Ps. xxxvii. 35, 36.

I. The powerful descent which the Medes and Persians should make upon Babylon (v. 1, 2): They will come from the desert, from a terrible land. The northern parts of Media and Persia were waste and mountainous, terrible to strangers. Elam (that is, Persia) is summoned to go up against Babylon, and, in conjunction with the forces of Media, to besiege it. These forces come as whirlwinds from the south. As is usual in such a case, some deserters will go over to them: The treacherous dealers will deal treacherously. Historians tell us of Gadatas and Gobryas, two great officers of the king of Babylon, that went over to Cyrus, and, being well acquainted with all the avenues of the city, led a party directly to the palace, where Belshazzar was slain. Thus with the help of the treacherous dealers the spoilers spoiled. The Persians shall pay the Babylonians in their own coin; those that by fraud, unrighteous wars and deceitful treaties, have made a prey of their neighbours, shall meet their match.

II. The different impressions made upon those in Babylon. To the poor captives it would be welcome news; for they had been told long ago that Babylon's destroyer would be their deliverer, and therefore, when they hear that Elam and Media are coming to besiege Babylon, all their sighing will be made to cease. To the proud oppressors it would be a grievous vision (v. 2), particularly to the king of Babylon, and it should seem that he it is who is here sadly lamenting his inevitable fate (v. 3, 4): Therefore are my loins filled with pain; pangs have taken hold upon me, &c., which was literally fulfilled in Belshazzar, for that very night in which his city was taken, and himself slain, upon the sight of a hand writing mystic characters upon the wall his countenance was changed and his thoughts troubled him, so that the joints of his loins were loosed and his knees smote one against another, Dan. v. 6. He was slain on that night when he was in the height of his mirth and jollity, with his cups and concubines about him and a thousand of his lords revelling with him.

III. Babylon should be found all in festival gaiety (v. 5): "Prepare the table with all manner of dainties. Set the guards; let them watch in the watch-tower while we make merry; and, if any alarm should be given, the princes shall arise and anoint the shield, and be in readiness to give the enemy a warm reception."

IV. The alarm which should be given to Babylon upon its being forced by Cyrus and Darius. The Lord showed the prophet the watchman set in his watch-tower, and, according to the duty of a watchman, let him declare what he sees, v. 6. This watchman here discovered a chariot with a couple of horsemen, in which the commander-in-chief rides. He saw another chariot drawn by mules, much in use among the Persians, and a chariot drawn by camels, much in use among the Medes; so that these two chariots signify the two nations combined against Babylon. And (v. 8) he cried, A lion; this word, coming out of a watchman's mouth, no doubt everybody knew the meaning of it. Or he cried as a lion, very loud, the occasion being very urgent. "I stand, my lord, continually upon the watch-tower, and, till just now, all seemed safe and quiet." He shouts again (v. 9): Here comes a chariot of men with a couple of horsemen.

V. A certain account is at length given of the overthrow of Babylon. He in the chariot answered and said (when he heard the watchman speak), Babylon has fallen, has fallen. All the graven images of her gods he has broken unto the ground.

VI. Notice is given to the people of God, who were then captives in Babylon, that this prophecy of the downfall of Babylon was particularly intended for their encouragement, v. 10.

1. The title the prophet gives them in God's name: O my threshing, and the corn of my floor! The prophet calls them his, because they were his countrymen, but he speaks it as from God. The church is God's floor. True believers are the corn of God's floor. Hypocrites are but as the chaff and straw. The corn of God's floor must expect to be threshed by afflictions and persecutions. Even then God owns it for his threshing; it is his still.

2. The assurance he gives them which they might build their hopes upon: That which I have heard of the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, have I declared unto you.

Verses 11–12

This prophecy concerning Dumah is very short, and hard to be understood. Some think that Dumah is a part of Arabia, and that the inhabitants descended from Dumah the sixth son of Ishmael. Others, because Mount Seir is here mentioned, by Dumah understand Idumea, the country of the Edomites. Some of Israel's neighbours are certainly meant, and their distress is foretold, not only for warning to them to prepare them for it, but for warning to Israel not to depend upon them, but upon God only. Someone called out of Seir, as the man of Macedonia, in a vision, desired Paul to come over and help them (Acts xvi. 9). The question is serious: What of the night? It is put to a proper person, the watchman. He repeats the question as one in earnest. God's prophets and ministers are appointed to be watchmen. They are as watchmen in the city in a time of peace, to see that all be safe, to knock at every door by personal enquiries ("Is it locked? Is the fire safe?"). They are as watchmen in the camp in time of war, Ezek. xxxiii. 7. They are to take notice of the enemy and give warning. It is our duty to ask again and again, What of the night? "Watchman, what o'clock is it? After a long dark night is there any hope of the day dawning?" What from the night? (so some); "what vision has the prophet had tonight? We are ready to receive it." Or, "What occurs tonight? What weather is it? What news?" The watchman was neither asleep nor dumb, though it was a man of Mount Seir that called to him. "The morning comes," he answers. "There comes first a morning of light and peace and opportunity; you will enjoy one day of comfort more; but afterwards comes a night of trouble and calamity." Improve the present morning in preparation for the night that is coming after it. "Enquire, return, come. Be inquisitive, be penitent, and obedient."

Verses 13–17

Arabia was a large country, eastward and southward of Canaan. The Dedanim (v. 13), were descended from Dedan, Abraham's son by Keturah; the inhabitants of Tema and Kedar descended from Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 3, 13, 15. The Arabians lived in tents, kept cattle, a hardy people, inured to labour; the Jews depended upon them as a wall between them and the more warlike eastern nations; and therefore, to alarm them, they shall hear the burden of Arabia.

I. A destroying army shall be brought upon them, with a sword, with a drawn sword, with a bow ready bent, and with all the grievousness of war, v. 15. It is probable that the king of Assyria took Arabia in his way, and made an easy prey of them.

II. The poor country people will be forced to flee for shelter; so that the travelling companies of Dedanim shall be obliged to lodge in the forest in Arabia (v. 13).

III. They shall need refreshment in their flight from the invading army: "O you inhabitants of the land of Tema!" (who probably were next neighbours to the companies of Dedanim) "bring you water" (so the margin reads it) "to him that is thirsty, and prevent with your bread those that flee, for they are objects of your compassion; they flee from the sword." Let us learn to look with compassion upon those that are in distress, and with all cheerfulness to relieve them. It is here remembered to the praise of the land of Tema that they relieved even those that were on the falling side.

IV. All the glory of Kedar shall vanish and fail. Their numerous herds and flocks shall all be driven away by the enemy. Their archers, instead of foiling the enemy, shall fall themselves; and the residue of their number shall be diminished (v. 17); their able-bodied men shall become very few; for they were most exposed, and fell first by the enemies' sword.

V. All this shall be done in a little time: "Within one year according to the years of a hireling (within one year precisely reckoned) this judgment shall come upon Kedar." This fixing of the time might be of great use to the Arabians, to awaken them to repentance, that, like the men of Nineveh, they might prevent the judgment when they were thus told it was just at the door.

VI. It is all ratified by the truth of God (v. 16): "Thus hath the Lord said to me." And again (v. 17): The Lord God of Israel hath spoken it.

CHAP. XXII

This chapter is "the burden of the valley of vision", Jerusalem; now let Jerusalem hear her own doom. This chapter concerns, I. The city of Jerusalem itself and the neighbourhood. 1. A prophecy of the grievous distress they should shortly be brought into by Sennacherib's invasion and siege, ver. 1–7. 2. A reproof given them for their misconduct in two things: (1) Not having an eye to God in the use of the means of their preservation, ver. 8–11. (2) Not humbling themselves under his mighty hand, ver. 12–14. II. The court of Hezekiah, and the officers of that court. 1. The displacing of Shebna, a bad man, and turning him out of the treasury, ver. 15–19, 25. 2. The preferring of Eliakim, who should do his country better service, ver. 20–24.

Verses 1–7

The title of this prophecy is the burden of the valley of vision, of Judah and Jerusalem. Jerusalem is called a valley, for the mountains were round about it, and the land of Judah abounded with valleys. It is called a valley of vision because there God was known and there the prophets were made acquainted with his mind by visions. Babylon, being a stranger to God, though rich and great, was called the desert of the sea; but Jerusalem, being trusted with his oracles, is a valley of vision.

Now the burden of the valley of vision here is that which will not quite ruin it, but only frighten it; for it refers not to the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, but to the attempt made upon it by Sennacherib, ch. x, and ch. xxxvi.

I. The consternation that the city should be in upon the approach of Sennacherib's army. It used to be a city of great trade, populous and noisy, a joyous revelling city. "But what ails thee now, that the shops are quitted, and thou hast wholly gone up to the house-tops (v. 1), to secure thyself from the enemy." But why is Jerusalem in such a fright? Her slain men are not slain with the sword (v. 2), but with famine (so some), or with fear. They were so disheartened that they seemed as effectually stabbed with fear as if they had been run through with a sword.

II. The inglorious flight of the rulers of Judah, who fled from all parts of the country, to Jerusalem (v. 3), and were found in Jerusalem, having left their respective cities to be a prey to the Assyrian army, which, meeting with no opposition, when it came up against all the defenced cities of Judah easily took them, ch. xxxvi. 1. These rulers were bound from the bow (so the word is); they not only quitted like cowards, but, when they came to Jerusalem, trembled, so that they could not draw a bow.

III. The great grief which this should occasion to all serious people, the prophet laying the thing to heart himself, v. 4, 5. He is not willing to proclaim his sorrow, and therefore bids those about him to look away from him; he will weep secretly. But what is the occasion of his grief? A poor prophet had little to lose, and had been inured to hardship, but it is for the spoiling of the daughter of his people. Our enemies tread us down, and our friends know not what course to take to do us a kindness. The enemies with their battering rams are breaking down the walls, and we are in vain crying to the mountains (to keep off the enemy, or to fall on us and cover us), or appealing to the mountains to hear our controversy (Mic. vi. 1) and to judge between us and our neighbours.

IV. The great strength of the enemy, that should besiege their city, v. 6, 7. Elam (that is, the Persians) come with their quiver full of arrows, and with chariots. Kir (that is, the Medes) get everything ready for battle, for the besieging of Jerusalem. Then the choice valleys about Jerusalem, that used to be clothed with flocks, shall be full of chariots of war, and at the gate of the city the horsemen shall set themselves in array, to cut off all provisions from going in.

Verses 8–14

What is meant by the covering of Judah, which in the beginning of this paragraph is said to be discovered, is not agreed. The fenced cities of Judah were a covering to the country; but these, being taken by the army of the Assyrians, ceased to be a shelter. The weakness of Judah now appeared; thus the covering of Judah was discovered. Its stores were now laid open for the public use. Dr. Lightfoot gives another sense of it, that by this distress into which Judah should be brought God would discover their covering (that is, unlock their hypocrisy), 2 Chron. xxxii. 31. Now they discovered both their carnal confidence (v. 9) and their carnal security, v. 13.

They were in a great fright, and in this fright they manifested:

I. A great contempt of God's goodness, and his power to help them. They made use of all the means they could think of for their own preservation; but, in doing this, they did not acknowledge God. When Sennacherib had made himself master of all the defenced cities of Judah it was resolved to stand upon their defence, and not tamely to surrender. They inspected the magazines and stores, to see if they were well stocked with arms: They looked to the armour of the house of the forest, which Solomon built in Jerusalem for an armoury (1 Kings x. 17). They viewed the fortifications, the breaches of the city of David; they walked round the walls, and observed where they had gone to decay for want of repairs. These breaches were many. By public distresses, we should be awakened by them to repair our breaches, and amend what is amiss. They made sure of water for the city: You gathered together the water of the lower pool. They numbered the houses of Jerusalem, that every house might send in its quota of men for the public service, or contribute in money, so much a house. Because private property ought to give way to the public safety, those houses in their way, when the wall was to be fortified, were broken down. They made a ditch between the outer and inner wall, for the greater security of the city; and they contrived to draw the water of the old pool to it, that they might have plenty of water themselves and might deprive the besiegers of it; lest the Assyrian army should come and find much water (2 Chron. xxxii. 4). How regardless they were of God in all these preparations: But you have not looked unto the Maker thereof (that is, of Jerusalem, the city you are so solicitous for the defence of) and of all the advantages which nature has furnished it with for its defence. It is God that made his Jerusalem, and fashioned it long ago, in his counsels. It is here charged upon them that they did not look to God. They fortified Jerusalem because it was a rich city and their own houses were in it, not because it was the holy city and God's house was in it. They did not depend upon him for a blessing upon their endeavours, but thought their own powers sufficient for them. Of Hezekiah himself it is said that he trusted in God (2 Kings xviii. 5), and particularly upon this occasion (2 Chron. xxxii. 8); but there were those about him, it seems, who were great statesmen and soldiers, but had little religion in them.

II. A great contempt of God's wrath and justice, v. 12–14. God's design in bringing this calamity upon them was to humble them, bring them to repentance. In that day of trouble the Lord did thereby call to weeping and mourning, and all the expressions of sorrow, even to baldness and girding with sackcloth; and this to lament their sins, to enforce their prayers, and to dispose themselves to a reformation of their lives. To this God called them by his prophet's explaining his providences. How contrary they walked to this design of God (v. 13). They were as secure and cheerful as if they had had no enemy or were in no danger. When they had taken precautions for their security, they set dangers at defiance, and resolved to be merry: Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we shall die. This was the language of the profane scoffers who mocked the messengers of the Lord and misused his prophets. They made a jest of dying. They ridiculed the doctrine of a future state on the other side death. A practical disbelief of another life after this is at the bottom of the carnal security and brutish sensuality which are the sin, and shame, and ruin of so great a part of mankind. God signified his resentment of it to the prophet, revealed it in his ears, to be by him proclaimed upon the house-top: Surely this iniquity shall not be purged from you till you die, v. 14. Those that walk contrary to God shall find that he will walk contrary to them; with the froward he will show himself froward.

We have here a prophecy concerning the displacing of Shebna, a great officer at court, and the preferring of Eliakim to the post of honour and trust. By the accomplishment of what was foretold concerning these particular persons God designed to confirm his word in the mouth of Isaiah concerning other and greater events. It is probable that this prophecy was delivered at the same time with that in the former part of the chapter, and began to be fulfilled before Sennacherib's invasion; for now Shebna was over the house, but then Eliakim was (ch. xxxvi. 3); and Shebna, coming down gradually, was only scribe.

I. The prophecy of Shebna's disgrace. He is called this treasurer, being entrusted with the management of the revenue; and he is likewise said to be over the house. The Jews say, "He kept up a traitorous correspondence with the king of Assyria, and was in treaty with him to deliver the city into his hands." His pride, vanity, and security (v. 16): "What hast thou here, and whom hast thou here? What a mighty noise and bustle dost thou make! Art thou not mean and obscure that comest we know not whence? What is the meaning of this then, that thou hast built thyself a fine house, hast graved thyself a habitation?" It seemed engraven in a rock, so firmly was it founded and so impregnable was it. "Nay, thou hast hewed thee out a sepulchre," as if he designed that his pomp should survive his funeral. A prophecy of his fall and the sullying of his glory (v. 19): I will drive thee from thy station. High places are slippery places; and those are justly deprived of their honour that are puffed up with it. To this v. 25 refers. "The nail that is now fastened in the sure place (that is, Shebna, who thinks himself immovably fixed in his office) shall be removed, and cut down, and fall." After a while he should not only be driven from his station, but driven from his country: The Lord will carry thee away with the captivity of a mighty man, v. 17, 18. Some think the Assyrians seized him, and took him away, or perhaps Hezekiah, finding out his treachery, banished him. Grotius thinks he was striken with a leprosy, which was a disease commonly supposed to come from God's displeasure, particularly for the punishment of the proud, and by reason of this disease he was tossed like a ball out of Jerusalem. Shebna thought his place too strait for him. God will therefore send him into a large country, where he shall have room to wander, but never find the way back again; there the chariots which had been the chariots of his glory, should but serve to upbraid him with his former grandeur, to the shame of his lord's house, of the court of Ahaz, who had advanced him.

II. The prophecy of Eliakim's advancement, v. 20, &c. He is God's servant, has approved himself faithfully so in other employments, and therefore God will call him to this high station. It is here foretold Eliakim should be put into Shebna's place of lord-chamberlain of the household, lord-treasurer, and prime-minister of state. The prophet must tell Shebna this, v. 21. "He shall have thy robe, the badge of honour, and thy girdle, the badge of power; for he shall have thy government." I will clothe him; and then it follows, I will strengthen him. Those that are called to places of trust and power should seek unto God for grace to enable them to do the duty of their places. Eliakim's advancement is further described by the laying of the key of the house of David upon his shoulders, v. 22. He had access to the house of the precious things, the silver, and the gold, and the spices; and to the house of the armour and the treasures (ch. xxxix. 2), and disposed of the stores there as he thought fit for the public service. He should be fixed and confirmed in that office. He shall have it for life (v. 23): I will fasten him as a nail in a sure place, not to be removed or cut down. He shall be a blessing to his country (v. 21): He shall be a father to the inhabitants of Jerusalem and to the house of Judah. He shall take care not only of the affairs of the king's household, but of all the public interests in Jerusalem and Judah. It is happy with a people when the court, the city, and the country, have no separate interests, but the courtiers are true patriots, and whom the court blesses the country has reason to bless too. He shall be a blessing to his family (v. 23, 24): He shall be for a glorious throne to his father's house. Eliakim is a nail in a sure place, and all his family are said to have a dependence upon him, as in a house the vessels that have handles to them are hung up upon nails and pins. It intimates likewise that he shall generously take care of them all, and bear the weight of that care: All the vessels, not only the flagons, but the cups, the vessels of small quantity, the meanest that belong to his family, shall be provided for by him. Our Lord Jesus, having the key of the house of David, is as a nail in a sure place, and all the glory of his father's house hangs upon him. That soul cannot perish, nor that concern fall to the ground, though ever so weighty, that is by faith hung upon Christ.

CHAP. XXIII

This chapter is concerning Tyre, an ancient wealthy city, situated upon the sea, celebrated for trade and merchandise. The lot of the tribe of Asher bordered upon it See Joshua xix. 29, where it is called "the strong city Tyre". We seldom find it a dangerous enemy to Israel, but sometimes their faithful ally, as in the reigns of David and Solomon; for trading cities maintain their grandeur, not by the conquest of their neighbours, but by commerce with them. In this chapter is foretold, I. The lamentable desolation of Tyre, by Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldean army, about the time they destroyed Jerusalem, ver. 1–14. II. The restoration of Tyre after seventy years, and the return of the Tyrians out of their captivity to their trade again, ver. 15–18.

Verses 1–14

Tyre being a sea-port town, this prophecy of its overthrow fitly begins and ends with, Howl, you ships of Tarshish; for all its business, wealth, and honour, depended upon its shipping; if that be ruined, they will be all undone.

I. Tyre flourishing. 1. The merchants of Zidon, who traded at sea, had at first replenished her, v. 2. Zidon was the more ancient city, situated upon the same sea-coast, a few leagues more to the north, and Tyre was at first only a colony of that; but the daughter had outgrown the mother. Egypt had helped very much to raise her, v. 3. Sihor was the river of Egypt: by that river, and the ocean into which it ran, the Egyptians traded with Tyre. Tyre became rich and great by industry, though she had no other ploughs going than those that plough the waters. She was a joyous city, noted for mirth and jollity, v. 7. This made them very loth to consider what warnings God gave them by his servants. Her antiquity likewise was of ancient days, and that helped to make her secure. She was a crowning city (v. 8), that crowned herself. Her merchants are princes, and her traffickers, whatever country they go to, are the honourable of the earth, respected by all.

II. Here is Tyre falling. It does not appear that she brought trouble upon herself by provoking her neighbours, but rather by tempting them with her wealth; but, if it was this that induced Nebuchadnezzar to fall upon Tyre, he was disappointed; for after it had stood out a siege of thirteen years, the inhabitants got away by sea, with their families and goods, and left Nebuchadnezzar nothing but the bare city. The destruction of Tyre is here foretold. The haven shall be spoiled, or at least neglected. There shall be no convenient harbour for the reception of the ships of Tarshish, but all laid waste (v. 1). Tyre is destroyed and laid waste; so that there is no more business there. The inhabitants are so overwhelmed with grief that they shall not be able to express it. The neighbours are amazed, and are in pain for them: Zidon is ashamed (v. 4), for the rolling waves of the sea brought to Zidon this news from Tyre; and there the strength of the sea, a high spring-tide, proclaimed saying, "I travail not, nor bring forth children now. I do not bring ship-loads of young people to Tyre, to be bred up there in trade and business," which was the thing that had made Tyre so rich and populous. Egypt indeed was a much larger and more considerable kingdom, and yet Tyre had so large a trade, that all the nations about shall be as much in pain, upon the report of the ruin of that one city, as they not long after were, upon the report of the ruin of all Egypt, v. 5. "You that have long been inhabitants of this isle, it is time to howl now, for you must pass over to Tarshish. The best course you can take is to make the best of your way to Tarshish, to the sea." Those that could not make their escape must expect no other than to be carried into captivity (v. 7): Her own feet shall carry her afar off to sojourn; they shall be hurried away on foot into captivity. Many of those that attempted to escape should fall into the hands of the enemy. Tyre shall pass through her land as a river (v. 10), running down into the abyss of misery. There is no more strength; they fall an easy prey into the hands of the enemy. And, as Tyre has no more strength, so her sister Zidon has no more comfort (v. 12): "Thou shalt no more rejoice, O oppressed virgin, daughter of Zidon, that art now ready to be overpowered by the victorious Chaldeans!" But whence shall all this trouble come? God will be the author of it; it is a destruction from the Almighty. It will be asked (v. 8): "Who has taken this counsel against Tyre?" God has designed it, who is infinitely wise and just. God did not bring those calamities upon Tyre to show an arbitrary power; but to punish the Tyrians for their pride. Many other sins, no doubt, reigned among them, but the sin of pride was the particular ground of God's controversy with Tyre. God tells the world what he meant. He designed to convince men of the vanity and uncertainty of all earthly glory, to show them what a withering thing it is even when it seems most substantial. Are men's learning and wealth, their pomp and power,their glory? Look upon the ruins of Tyre, and see all this glory stained, and sullied, and buried in the dust. He stretched out his hand over the sea. The Chaldeans shall be the instruments of it (v. 13): Behold the land of the Chaldeans; how easily they and their land were destroyed by the Assyrians. Though their own hands founded it, set up the towers of Babylon, and raised up its palaces, yet the Assyrians brought it to ruin, and so shall Tyre hereafter be brought to ruin by Nebuchadnezzar. If we looked more upon the falling of others, we should not be so confident as we commonly are of the continuance of our own standing.

Verses 15–18

I. The time fixed for the continuance of the desolations of Tyre, which were not to be perpetual desolations: Tyre shall be forgotten seventy years, v. 15. It was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar about the time that Jerusalem was, and lay as long in its ruins. He trampled on the pride of Tyre, and therein served God's purpose; but with greater pride, for which God soon after humbled him.

II. A prophecy of the restoration of Tyre to its glory again: After the end of seventy years, according to the years of one king, or one dynasty, that of Nebuchadnezzar. And we may presume that Cyrus at the same time when he released the Jews, and encouraged them to rebuild Jerusalem, released the Tyrians also, and encouraged them to rebuild Tyre. The Lord will visit Tyre in mercy; for he will not contend for ever. She shall use her best endeavours to recover her trade again. She shall sing as a harlot, that has been some time under correction for her lewdness; but, when she is set at liberty, she will use her old arts of temptation. The Tyrians having returned from their captivity, shall contrive how to force a trade, procure the best choice of goods, and be obliging to all customers; as a harlot that has been forgotten, when she comes to be spoken of again, recommends herself to company by singing and playing, takes a harp, goes about the city, serenading. Tyre shall by degrees come to be the mart of nations again; she shall return to her hire, to her traffic, and shall commit fornication (that is, she shall have dealings in trade, for the prophet carries on the similitude of a harlot) with all the kingdoms of the world that she had formerly traded with in her prosperity. The love of worldly wealth is a spiritual whoredom, and therefore covetous people are called adulterers and adulteresses (James iv. 4). Having recovered her trade again, she shall make a better use of it than formerly (v. 18): Her merchandise, and her hire, shall be holiness to the Lord. The trade of Tyre, and all the gains of her trade, shall be devoted to God, and employed in his service. It shall not be hoarded, but it shall be laid out in acts of piety and charity. What they can spare from the maintenance of themselves and their families shall be for those that dwell before the Lord, for the priests, the Lord's ministers. They and theirs may eat sufficiently, and may have durable clothing, strong and lasting. This supposes that religion should be set up in New Tyre, that they should come to the knowledge of the true God and into communion with the Israel of God. We find men of Tyre then dwelling in the land of Judah, Neh. xiii. 16. Tyre and Sidon were better disposed to religion in Christ's time than the cities of Israel; for, if Christ had gone among them, they would have repented, Matt. xi. 21. And we meet with Christians at Tyre (Acts xxi. 3, 4). Both the merchandise of the tradesmen and the hire of the day-labourers shall be devoted to God, must be holiness to the Lord, alluding to the motto engraven on the frontlet of the high priest (Exod. xxxix. 30), and to the separation of the tithe under the law, Lev. xxvii. 30. We must first give up ourselves to be holiness to the Lord before what we do, or have, or get, can be so. When we are liberal in relieving the poor, and supporting the ministry, and encouraging the gospel—then our merchandise and our hire are holiness to the Lord, if we sincerely look at his glory in them.

CHAP. XXIV

Here begins a new sermon, which is continued to the end of chap. xxvii. And in it the prophet does, in many precious promises, "say to the righteous, It shall be well with them"; and, in many dreadful threatenings, he says, "Woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with them" (ch. iii. 10, 11); and these illustrate each other. This chapter is mostly threatening. It is not the burden of any particular city or kingdom, as those before, but the burden of the whole earth. 1. Some think that it is a prophecy of the great havoc that Sennacherib and his Assyrian army should now shortly make. 2. Others make it to point at like devastations which, about 100 years afterwards, Nebuchadnezzar and his armies should make in the same countries. The promises that are mixed with the threatenings are intended of the comfort of the people of God in those calamitous times. The prophet designs here to represent in general the calamitous state of mankind. Prophecies were written and preserved even for our learning, and therefore ought not to be looked upon as of private interpretation. In this chapter we have, I. A threatening of desolating judgments for sin (ver. 1–12), to which is added an assurance that in the midst of them good people should be comforted, ver. 13–15. II. A further threatening of the like desolations (ver. 16–22), to which is added an assurance that in the midst of all God should be glorified.

It is a very dark and melancholy scene that this prophecy presents to our view.

I. The earth is stripped; it is made empty and waste (v. 1), as if it were reduced to its first chaos, Tohu and Bohu, confusion and emptiness again (Gen. i. 2), without form and void. Earth sometimes signifies the land, and the same word eretz is here translated (v. 3): The land shall be utterly emptied and utterly spoiled; but it might be as v. 1, translated the earth. Many countries are empty of all solid comfort and satisfaction; a little thing makes them waste. We often see plentiful estates, utterly emptied and spoiled, by one judgment or other. Sin has turned the earth upside down; the earth has become quite a different thing to man from what it was when God made it to be his habitation. Sin has also scattered abroad the inhabitants thereof. The rebellion at Babel was the occasion of the dispersion there. To the same purport is v. 4: The earth mourns, and fades away; it disappoints those that placed their happiness in it. The whole world languishes and fades away. It is like a flower, which withers in the hands of those that please themselves too much with it. And, as the earth itself grows old, so those that dwell therein are desolate; men carry crazy sickly bodies along with them, are often solitary, and confined by affliction, v. 6. The inhabitants of the earth are burned, or consumed, some by one disease, others by another, and there are but few men left.

II. It is God that brings all these calamities upon the earth. The Lord that made the earth, and made it fruitful and beautiful, for the service and comfort of man, now makes it empty and waste (v. 1), for its Creator is and will be its Judge. It is the Lord that has spoken this word, and he will do the work (v. 3).

III. Persons of all ranks and conditions shall share in these calamities (v. 2): It shall be as with the people, so with the priest, &c. The dignity of magistrates and ministers shall not secure them. The priests had been as wicked as the people; and, if their character served not to restrain them from sin, how can they expect it should serve to secure them from judgments? As with the servant, so with his master; as with the maid, so with her mistress. Those that have money beforehand will fare no better than those that are impoverished.

IV. It is sin that brings these calamities upon the earth. The earth is made empty, and fades away, because it is defiled under the inhabitants thereof (v. 5); and therefore it is made desolate by the judgments of God. They have transgressed the laws of their creation, and their obligations to the God of nature. They have changed the ordinances of revealed religion, neglected the ordinances (so some read it), and made no conscience of observing them. They have passed over the laws, in the commission of sin, and have passed by the ordinance, in the omission of duty. Herein they have broken the everlasting covenant, which is a perpetual bond and will be to those that keep it a perpetual blessing.

V. These judgments shall humble men's pride (v. 4): The haughty people of the earth do languish; for they have lost that which supported their pride. It is a great damp to men's jollity. This is enlarged upon much (v. 7–9): All the merry-hearted do sigh. Such is the nature of carnal mirth, it is but as the crackling of thorns under a pot, Eccles. vii. 6. Carnal joy is a noisy thing; but the noise of it will soon be at an end, and the end of it is heaviness. Two things excite and express vain mirth. (1) Drinking: The new wine mourns; it has grown sour for want of drinking. The vine languishes, and gives little hopes of a vintage, and therefore the merry-hearted do sigh; for if you destroy their vines and their fig-trees, you make all their mirth to cease, Hosea ii. 11, 12. (2) Music: The mirth of tabrets ceases, and the joy of the harp, which used to be at their feasts, ch. v. 12. In short, All joy is darkened; there is not a pleasant look to be seen, nor has anyone power to force a smile.

VI. The cities will feel these desolations (v. 10): The city of confusion is broken, is broken down (so we read it); it lies exposed to invading powers. Every house is shut up, perhaps by reason of the plague, so that there are few men left, v. 6. In the city, in Jerusalem itself, there shall be left nothing but desolation; grass shall grow in the streets, and the gate is smitten with destruction (v. 12); all that used to pass and repass through the gate are smitten.

Here is mercy remembered in the midst of wrath. In Judah and Jerusalem, and the neighbouring countries, when they are overrun by the enemy, Sennacherib or Nebuchadnezzar, there shall be a remnant preserved from the general ruin.

I. The small number of this remnant, v. 13. When all goes to ruin there shall be as the shaking of an olive tree, and the gleaning grapes, here and there one who shall escape the common calamity. These few are dispersed like the gleanings of the olive-tree; and they are hid under the leaves. The Lord knows those that are his; the world does not.

II. The great devotion of this remnant, having so narrowly escaped this great destruction (v. 14): They shall lift up their voice; they shall sing. Those that rejoice in the Lord can rejoice in tribulation. They shall sing not only for the mercy but for the majesty of the Lord. Their dispersion shall help to spread the knowledge of God, and they shall make even remote shores to ring with his praises.

III. Their holy zeal to excite others to the same devotion (v. 15), in the fires, in the furnace of affliction, those fires by which the inhabitants of the earth are burned, v. 6. Those who are in the isles of the sea, whither they are banished, or are forced to flee for shelter, went through fire and water (Ps. lxvi. 12); yet in both let them glorify the Lord.

Verses 16–23

I. Comfort to saints. They may be driven, by common calamities, into the uttermost parts of the earth, or perhaps they are forced thither for their religion; but there they are singing, not sighing. And this is their song, even glory to the righteous: the word is singular, and may refer to the righteous God, or the meaning may be, "These songs redound to the glory or beauty of the righteous that sing them."

II. Terror to sinners. The prophet returns to lament the miseries he saw breaking in upon the earth: "But I said, My leanness! my leanness! woe unto me! The very thought of it frets me, and makes me lean," v. 16. He foresees that iniquity should abound (v. 16): The treacherous dealers have dealt treacherously. Men are false to one another; there is universal dishonesty. Truth, that sacred bond of society, has departed, and there is nothing but treachery in men's dealings. They are all false to their God, all treacherous dealers, and have dealt very treacherously with their God, in departing from their allegiance to him. The inhabitants of the earth will be pursued from place to place, by one mischief or other (v. 17, 18): Fear, and the pit, and the snare (fear of the pit and the snare) are upon them wherever they are. It is a common instance of the calamitous state of human life that when we seek to avoid one mischief we fall into a worse. The earth itself will be shaken to pieces. It will be literally so at last, when all the works therein shall be burnt up; and it is often figuratively so before that period. This is expressed (v. 19, 20): The earth is utterly broken down; it is clean dissolved; it is moved exceedingly, moved out of its place. Those who lay up their treasure in the things of the earth place their confidence in that which will shortly be utterly broken down and dissolved. The earth shall reel to and fro like a drunkard. Worldly men dwell in it as in a castle, an impregnable tower; but it shall be removed like a cottage, so easily, so suddenly, and with so little loss to the great landlord. It shall fall, and not rise again; but there shall be new heavens and a new earth, in which shall dwell nothing but righteousness. But what is it that shakes the earth thus and sinks it? It is the transgression that shall be heavy upon it. Sin is a burden to the whole creation. Sin is the ruin of states, and kingdoms, and families. God will have a particular controversy with the kings and great men of the earth (v. 21): He will punish the host of the high ones. The high ones, that think themselves out of the reach of any danger, God will visit upon them all their pride and cruelty, and it shall return upon their own heads. Let those that are trampled upon by the high ones of the earth comfort themselves with this, that though they cannot resist them, yet there is a God that will call them to account. It is particularly foretold (v. 22) that they shall be gathered togeiher as prisoners, convicted condemned prisoners, gathered in the pit, or dungeon, and there they shall be shut up under close confinement. Let not the free man glory in his freedom, any more than the strong man in his strength, for he knows not what restraints he is reserved for. But after many days they shall be visited, either in wrath, or shall be reserved to the day of execution, to the judgment of the great day, Jude 6. Or they shall be visited in mercy, and be discharged from their imprisonment, and shall again obtain, if not their dignity, yet their liberty. Nebuchadnezzar made many kings and princes his captives, and kept them in the dungeon in Babylon, and, among the rest, Jehoiachin king of Judah; but after many days, when Nebuchadnezzar's head was laid, his son visited them, and with particular kindness to Jehoiachin set his throne above the throne of the rest of the kings that were with him, Jer. lii. 32. When the proud enemies of God's church are humbled it shall appear, beyond contradiction, that the Lord reigns. When the kings of the earth are punished for their tyranny, then it is proved to all the world that God is King of kings, that he reigns as Lord of hosts, of all hosts, of their hosts—that he reigns in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, in his church—that he reigns before his ancients. God's ancients, the old disciples, the experienced Christians, that have often, when they have been perplexed, gone into the sanctuary of God in Zion and Jerusalem, shall see more than others of God's dominion and sovereignty. Then it shall appear that he reigns gloriously, in such brightness and lustre that the moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed, as the smaller lights are eclipsed and extinguished by the greater. The glory of the Creator infinitely outshines the glory of the brightest creatures.

CHAP. XXV

I. Thankful praises for what God had done, which the prophet offers to God, ver. 1–5. II. Precious promises of what God would yet further do for his church, especially in the grace of the gospel, ver. 6–8. III. The church's triumph in God over her enemies, ver. 9–12. This chapter looks as pleasantly upon the church as the former looked dreadfully upon the world.

Verses 1–5

I. The prophet determines to praise God himself (v. 1): "O Lord! thou art my God, a God in covenant with me." When God is punishing the kings of the earth upon the earth, a poor prophet can go to him, and, with a humble boldness, say, O Lord! thou art my God, and therefore I will exalt thee, I will praise thy name.

II. He pleases himself with the thought that others also shall be brought to praise God, v. 3. "Therefore, because of the desolations thou hast made in the earth, and the just vengeance thou hast taken, shall the strong people glorify thee in concert, and the city (the metropolis) of the terrible nations shall fear thee." This may be understood, 1. Of those that have been enemies to God's kingdom. They shall either be converted, and glorify God by joining with his people in his service, or at least convinced, so as to own themselves conquered. Or, 2. Of those that shall be now made strong and terrible for God and by him, though before they were weak. God shall so visibly appear for and with those that fear him and glorify him that all shall stand in awe of them.

III. He observes what ought to be, the matter of this praise. We must exalt God and praise him; for, 1. He has done wonders, according to the counsel of his own will, v. 1. These wonderful things, which are new and surprising to us, are according to his counsels of old. 2. He has in particular humbled the pride, and broken the power, of the mighty ones of the earth (v. 2): "Thou hast made of a city a heap of rubbish. Of many a defenced city, that thought itself well guarded by nature and art, thou hast made a ruin. Many a city so richly built that it might be called a palace, and so much visited by persons from all parts that it might be called a palace of strangers, is levelled with the ground, and shall never be built again." Cities that flourished once have gone to decay and are scarcely known (except by urns or coins digged up out of the earth). How many of the cities of Israel have long since been heaps and ruins! 3. He has relieved his necessitous people (v. 4): Thou hast been a strength to the poor, a strength to the needy. He strengthens the weak that are humble and stay themselves upon him. He not only makes them strong, but he is himself their strength. He is a refuge from the storm of rain or hail, and a shadow from the scorching heat of the sun in summer; when the blast of the terrible ones is as a storm against the wall, which makes a great noise, but cannot overthrow the wall. The enemies of God's poor are terrible ones. Their rage is like a blast of wind, loud, and blustering, and furious; but, like the wind, it is under a divine check; for God holds the winds in his fist. A storm beating on a ship tosses it, but that which beats on a wall never stirs it, Ps. lxxvi. 10; cxxxviii. 7. Thou shalt, or thou dost, bring down the noise of strangers; thou shalt abate and still it, as the heat in a dry place is abated and moderated by the shadow of a cloud interposing. The oppressors of God's people are called strangers; for they forget that those they oppress are of the same blood with them. They are called terrible ones; they would rather be feared than loved. The branches, even the top branches, of the terrible ones, will be broken off. If the labourers in God's vineyard be called to bear the burden and heat of the day, he will refresh them, as with the shadow of a cloud.

Verses 6–8

If we suppose (as many do) that this refers to the great joy which there should be in Zion and Jerusalem when the army of the Assyrians was routed by an angel, or when the Jews were released out of their captivity in Babylon, yet we cannot avoid making it to look further, to the grace of the gospel and the glory which is the crown and consummation of that grace. We have here a prophecy of the salvation and the grace brought unto us by Jesus Christ, into which the prophets enquired and searched diligently, 1 Pet. i. 10.

I. That the grace of the gospel should be a royal feast for all people; not like that of Ahasuerus, intended only to show the grandeur of the master of the feast (Esther i. 4); for this is intended to gratify the guests. 1. God himself is the Master of the feast. 2. The guests invited are all people, Gentiles as well as Jews. Go preach the gospel to every creature. 3. The place is Mount Zion; the preachers must begin at Jerusalem. The gospel church is the Jerusalem that is above. It is a feast of fat things and full of marrow; so nourishing are the comforts of the gospel to all those that feast upon them. It is a feast of wines on the lees, the strongest-bodied wines, that have been kept long upon the lees, and then are well refined.

II. That the world should be freed from that darkness of ignorance and mistake in the mists of which it had been so long lost and buried (v. 7): He will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering (the covering of the face). Their faces are covered as those of men condemned, or dead. There is a veil spread over all nations, for they all sit in darkness; the Jews themselves, among whom God was known, had a veil upon their hearts, 2 Cor. iii. 15. But this veil the Lord will destroy, by the light of his gospel shining in the world, and the power of his Spirit opening men's eyes to receive it.

III. That death should be conquered, the power of it broken: He will swallow up death in victory, v. 8. 1. Christ will himself, in his resurrection, triumph over death. The grave seemed to swallow him up, but really he swallowed it up. 2. The happiness of the saints shall be out of the reach of death. 3. Believers may triumph over death, as a conquered enemy: O death! where is thy sting? It is the last enemy.

IV. That grief shall be banished, and there shall be endless joy: The Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces. In the covenant of grace there shall be that provided which is sufficient to counterbalance all the sorrows of this present time. God shall wipe away all tears, Rev. vii. 17; xxi. 4. And there shall be no more sorrow, because there shall be no more death. The hope of this should now wipe away all excessive tears, all the weeping that hinders sowing.

V. That all the reproach cast upon religion shall be for ever rolled away: The rebuke of his people the calumnies and misrepresentations by which they have been blackened, shall be taken away.

Verses 9–12

I. The welcome which the church shall give to these blessings (v. 9): It shall be said in that day, with humble exultation, Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him! With such a triumphant song as this will glorified saints enter into the joy of their Lord. It is an encouragement to hope for the perfection of this salvation: We have waited for him, and he will save us, will carry on what he has begun; for as for God, our God, his work is perfect.

II. A prospect of further blessings. In this mountain shall the hand of the Lord rest, v. 10. The church and people of God shall have continued proofs of God's presence among them. The power of their enemies shall be broken. Moab is here put for all the adversaries of God's people; they shall all be trodden down or threshed (for then they beat out the corn by treading it) and shall be thrown out as straw to the dunghill, being good for nothing else. God having caused his hand to rest upon this mountain, shall spread forth his hands, in the midst of his people, like one that swims, which intimates that he will employ and exert his power for them vigorously. On their behalf he will be continually active, for so the swimmer is. He shall bring down the pride of their enemies (and Moab was notoriously guilty of pride, ch. xvi. 6) by one humbling judgment after another. He shall bring down the spoils of their hands, shall take from them that which they have got by spoil and rapine. He shall ruin all their fortifications, v. 12. There is no fortress impregnable to Omnipotence. This destruction of Moab is typical of Christ's victory over death (spoken of v. 8), his spoiling principalities and powers in his cross (Col. ii. 15).

CHAP. XXVI

This chapter is a song of holy joy and praise, in which the great things God had engaged to do for his people are celebrated. it is to be sung when that prophecy should be accomplished; for we must meet God with our thanksgivings when he is coming towards us with his mercies. Now the people of God are here taught, I. To triumph in the holy security of the church in general and of every member of it, under the divine protection, ver. 1–4. II. To triumph over all opposing powers, ver. 5, 6. III. To walk with God, and wait for him, in the darkest times, ver. 7–9. IV. To lament the stupidity of those who regarded not the providence of God, ver. 10, 11. V. To encourage themselves with hopes that God would still continue to do them good (ver. 13, 14), and engage themselves to continue in his service, ver. 13. VI. To recollect the kind providences of God towards them, ver. 15–18. VII. To rejoice in hope of a glorious deliverance, which should be as a resurrection to them (ver. 19), and to retire in the expectation of it, ver. 20, 21.

Verses 1–4

To the prophecies of gospel grace very fitly is a song annexed: In that day this song shall be sung; it shall be sung in the land of Judah, which was a figure of the gospel church; for the gospel covenant is said to be made with the house of Judah, Heb. viii. 8.

I. The church of God is strongly fortified against those that are bad (v. 1): We have a strong city. It is a city incorporated by the charter of the everlasting covenant, fitted for the reception of all that are made free by that charter; it is a strong city, as Jerusalem was, while it was a city compact together, and had God himself a wall of fire round about it. The church is a strong city, for it has walls and bulwarks of God's own appointing; for he has, in his promise, appointed salvation itself to be its defence.

II. The inhabitants of Jerusalem, if they are such as they should be, are its strength, Zech. xii. 5. The gates are here ordered to be opened, that the righteous nation, which keeps the truth, may enter in, v. 2. They had been banished and driven out by the iniquity of the former times, but now they have liberty to enter in again.

III. All who belong to it are safe and easy, and have a security and serenity of mind in the assurance of God's favour. Thou wilt keep him in peace, in perfect peace, inward peace, outward peace, peace with God, peace of conscience, peace under all events. Those that trust in God must have their minds stayed upon him, and such as do so God will keep in perpetual peace, and that peace shall keep them (Ps. cxii. 7). Trust in him for ever, at all times, when you have nothing else to trust to. Whatever we trust to the world for is confined within the limits of time. But what we trust in God for will last as long as we shall last. For in the Lord Jehovah—Jah, Jehovah, in him who was, and is, and is to come, there is a rock of ages, a firm and lasting foundation for faith to build upon; and the house built on that rock will stand in a storm.

Verses 5–11

The prophet encourages us to trust in the word, for,

I. He will make humble souls that trust in him to triumph over their proud enemies, v. 5, 6. Even the lofty city Babylon itself, or Nineveh, he lays it low, ch. xxv. 12. He does not say, Great armies shall tread them down; but, When God will have it done, even the feet of the poor shall do it, Mal. iv. 3. See Ps. cxlvii. 6; Rom. xvi. 20.

II. He takes cognizance of the way of his people and has delight in it (v. 7): The way of the just is evenness (so it may be read): it is their endeavour to walk with God in steady obedience. Thou, most upright, dost level (or make even) the path of the just, by removing those things that would be stumbling-blocks. God weighs it (so we read it); he considers it, and will give them grace sufficient to help them over all difficulties.

III. It is our duty to wait for God in the darkest and most discouraging times, v. 8, 9. This has always been the practice of God's people: "In the way of thy judgments we have still waited for thee; when thou hast corrected us we have looked to no other hand than thine to relieve us." Our troubles must never turn us away from God; but still the desire of our soul must be to his name and to the remembrance of him. Our great concern must be for God's name: "Father, glorify thy name, and we are satisfied." The remembrance of God must be our great support and pleasure. Our desires towards God must be inward, fervent, and sincere (Ps. xlii. 1).

IV. It is God's design, in his judgments, to bring men to seek him: When thy judgments are upon the earth, laying all waste, we have reason to expect that not only God's people, but even the inhabitants of the world, will learn righteousness, have their mistakes rectified and their lives reformed.

V. Those are wicked indeed that will not be wrought upon by the methods God takes to reform them; and it is necessary that God should deal with them in a severe way by his judgments. Sinners walk contrary to God, v. 10. Favour is shown to them. They receive many mercies from God, and the design of this is that they may be won to love and serve God; and yet it is all in vain: they will not learn righteousness. They live in a land of uprightness, in a land of evenness, where there are not so many stumbling-blocks as in other places —in a land of correction, where vice and profaneness are punished; yet there they will deal unjustly, and go on frowardly in their evil ways. Those that do wickedly deal unjustly and may expect the judgments of God upon them. They will not behold the majesty of the Lord. Even when we receive of the mercy of the Lord we must still behold the majesty of the Lord and his goodness. They will not see, and none so blind as those who will not see, who ascribe to chance, or common fate, a divine rebuke. They will not see, but they shall see, shall be made to see, whether they will or no, that God is angry with them. Atheists, scorners, and the secure, will shortly feel that it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God. They shall see that they have done God's people a great deal of wrong, and shall be ashamed of their enmity and ill usage of such as deserved better treatment. Their doom therefore is that, since they slighted the happiness of God's friends, the fire of his enemies shall devour them.

Verses 12–19

The prophet in these verses looks back and then looks forward.

I. His reviews and reflections are mixed. When he looks back upon the state of the church he finds God in many instances had done great things for them (v. 12): Thou hast wrought all our works in us, or for us. Whatever good work is done by us, it is owing to a good work wrought by the grace of God in us. In particular (v. 15): "Thou hast increased the nation, O Lord! so that a little one has become a thousand (in Egypt they multiplied exceedingly, and afterwards in Canaan, so that they filled the land); and in this thou art glorified, as faithful to the covenant with Abraham." The neighbouring nations had sometimes tyrannized over them (v. 13): "O Lord our God! thou who hast the sole right to rule us, whose subjects and servants we are, to thee we complain that other lords besides thee have had dominion over us." When they had been careless in the service of God, God suffered their enemies to have dominion over them, that they might know the difference between his service and the service of the kingdoms of the countries. It may be understood as a confession of sin, their serving other gods, by which other lords (for they called their idols baals, lords) had dominion over them, besides God. But now they promise that it shall be so no more: "Henceforth by thee only will we make mention of thy name; we will worship thee only, and in that way only which thou hast instituted and appointed." The same may be our penitent reflection: Other lords, besides God, have had dominion over us; every lust has been our lord, and we have thus wronged both God and ourselves. They had sometimes been carried into captivity before their enemies (v. 15): "The nation which at first thou didst increase, thou hast now diminished, and removed to all the ends of the earth, driven out to the utmost parts of heaven," as is threatened, Deut. xxx. 4; xxviii. 64. The prophet remembers that when they were thus oppressed and carried captive they cried unto God, which was evidence that they neither had quite forsaken him nor were quite forsaken of him, and that there were merciful intentions in the judgments they were under (v. 16): Lord, in trouble have they visited thee. Afflictions bring us to God, quicken us to our duty, and show us our dependence upon him. Afflictions bring us to secret prayer, in which we may be more free and particular in our addresses to him than we can be in public. He complains that their struggles for their liberty had been painful and perilous, but that they had not been successful, v. 17, 18. "We have been like a woman in labour, that cries out in her pangs; we have with a great deal of anxiety and toil endeavoured to help ourselves, and our troubles have been increased by those attempts." Whenever they came to present themselves before the Lord with their complaints and petitions they were in agonies like those of a woman in travail. "We have been with child; we have had great expectation of a happy deliverance. But, alas! we have as it were brought forth wind; it has proved a false conception; our expectations have been frustrated. All our efforts have proved abortive: We have not wrought any deliverance in the earth, for ourselves or for our friends, neither have the inhabitants of the world fallen before us, but they are still as high and arrogant as ever."

II. His prospects and hopes are very pleasant. In general, "Thou wilt ordain peace for us" (v. 12). What trouble soever may for a time be appointed to the people of God, peace will at length be ordained for them; for the end of those men is peace. "Thou hast heard the desire of the humble, and therefore we will give the glory of it to thee only, will depend upon thy grace only to enable us to do so." They are dead, those other lords that have had dominion over us; their power is broken. He has made all their memory to perish. Though the church rejoices not in the birth of the man-child, of which she travailed in pain, but has as it were brought forth wind (v. 18), yet Thy dead men shall live. A spirit of life from God shall enter into the slain witnesses, Rev. xi. 11. The dry bones shall live, and become an exceedingly great army, Ezek. xxxvii. 10. Together with my dead body shall they arise. When God's time shall have come, Jerusalem, the city of God, now lying like a dead body, shall arise, shall be rebuilt, and flourish again. And therefore let the poor, desolate, melancholy inhabitants, that dwell as in dust, awake and sing. The dew of God's favour shall be to it as the evening dew to the herbs that were parched with the heat of the sun all day, shall revive and refresh them. And as the spring-dews, that water the earth, and make the herbs that lay buried in it to put forth and bud, so shall they flourish again. "The Gentiles shall live; with my body shall they arise; that is, they shall be called in after Christ's resurrection, shall rise with him, and sit with him in heavenly places; nay, they shall arise my body (says Dr. Lightfoot); they shall become the mystical body of Christ, and shall arise as part of him."

These two verses are supposed not to belong to the song which takes up the rest of the chapter, but to begin a new matter, and to be rather an introduction to the following chapter than the conclusion of this.

I. God invites the people (v. 20): "Come, my people, come to me, come with me, let the storm that disperses others bring you nearer together. Come, and enter into thy chambers; stay not abroad, lest you be caught in the storm." We must by faith find a way into these chambers, and there hide ourselves; with serenity of mind, we must put ourselves under the divine protection. Come, as Noah into the ark, for he shut the doors about him. When dangers are threatening it is good to retire, and lie hid, as Elijah did by the brook Cherith. Enter into thy chamber, to examine thyself, and commune with thy own heart, to pray, and humble thyself before God.

II. He assures them that the trouble would be over in a very short time: "Hide thyself for a moment, the smallest part of time we can conceive. When it is over it will seem as nothing to you." When Athanasius was banished from Alexandria by an edict of Julian, and his friends greatly lamented it, he bade them be of good cheer. Nubecula est quæ cito pertransibit—It is a little cloud, that will soon blow over.

III. He assures them that their enemies should be reckoned with for all the mischief they had done them by the sword, v. 21. The Lord comes out of his place, to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity. God comes out of his place to punish. Some observe that God's place is the mercy-seat; there he delights to be; when he punishes he comes out of his place, for he has no pleasure in the death of sinners. The criminals shall be convicted: The earth shall disclose her blood; the innocent blood of the saints and martyrs, which has been shed shall now be brought to light, Gen. iv. 10, 11; Job xx. 27.

CHAP. XXVII

In this chapter the prophet goes on to show, what great things God would do for his church and people in the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib and the destruction of the Assyrian army; but it is expressed generally, for the encouragement of the church in after ages. 1. That proud oppressors should be reckoned with, ver. 1. 2. That care should be taken of the church, as of God's vineyard, ver. 2, 3. 3. That God would let fall his controversy with the people, upon their return to him, ver. 4, 5. 4. That he would greatly multiply and increase them, ver. 6. 5. That, as to their afflictions, the property of them should be altered (ver. 7), they should be mitigated and moderated (ver. 8), and sanctified, ver. 9. 6. That though the church might be laid waste, and made desolate, for a time (ver. 10, 11), yet it should be restored, and the scattered members should be gathered together again, ver. 12, 13.

The prophet is here singing of judgment and mercy,

I. Of judgment upon the enemies of God's church (v. 1). When the Lord comes out of his place, to punish the inhabitants of the earth (ch. xxvi. 21), he will be sure to punish leviathan, the dragon that is in the sea, every proud oppressing tyrant, that is the terror of the mighty, and, like the leviathan, is so fierce that none dares stir him up, Job xli. 10, 24, 25. So Sennacherib was in his day, and Nebuchadnezzar in his, and Antiochus in his; so Pharaoh had been formerly, and is called leviathan and the dragon, ch. li. 9; Ps. lxxiv. 13, 14; Ezek. xxix. 3. The New Testament church has had its leviathans; we read of a great red dragon ready to devour it, Rev. xii. 3. Those malignant persecuting powers are here compared to the leviathan for bulk, and strength—to dragons for their rage and fury,—to serpents, piercing serpents, penetrating in their counsels,—to crooked serpents, subtle and insinuating, but perverse and mischievous. Great princes, if they oppose the people of God, are in God's account as dragons and serpents, the plagues of mankind. They are too big for men to deal with and call to an account, and therefore the great God will take the matter into his own hands. He has a sore, and great, and strong sword, when the measure of their iniquity is full and their day has come to fall. In that day he will punish, his day which is coming, Ps. xxxvii. 13. This is applicable to the spiritual victories obtained by our Lord Jesus over the powers of darkness. He not only disarmed the prince of this world, but with his strong sword, the virtue of his death and the preaching of his gospel, he does and will destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, that great leviathan, that old serpent, the dragon (Rev. xx. 2, 3).

II. Of mercy to the church.

1. She is God's vineyard, and is under his particular care, v. 2, 3. She is, in God's eye, a vineyard of red wine. The world is as a worthless wilderness; but the church is enclosed as a vineyard, from which precious fruits are gathered, wherewith they honour God and man. It is a vineyard of red wine, yielding the best and choicest grapes, intimating the reformation of the church, whereas before it brought forth wild grapes, ch. v. 4. I the Lord do keep it. He has undertaken to be the keeper of Israel. Those that bring forth fruit to God are under his protection. God's vineyard in this world lies much exposed to injury; there are many that would hurt it (Ps. lxxx. 13); but God will suffer no real hurt to be done, but what he will bring good out of. God will keep it in the night of affliction and persecution, and in the day of peace and prosperity, the temptations of which are no less dangerous. This vineyard shall be well fenced. I will water it every moment, and yet it shall not be overwatered. The still and silent dews of God's grace and blessing shall continually descend upon it. God waters his vineyard by the ministry of the word by his servants the prophets. Paul plants, and Apollos waters, but God gives the increase.

2. Though sometimes he contends with his people, yet, upon their submission, he will be reconciled to them, v. 4, 5. Fury is not in him towards his vineyard. It is true if he find in it briers and thorns instead of vines, he will tread them down and burn them; but otherwise, "If I am angry with my people, let them humble themselves, and pray, and seek my face, and so take hold of my strength with a sincere desire to make their peace with me, and I will be reconciled to them, and all shall be well." Here is a quarrel supposed between God and man. It is an old quarrel, ever since sin first entered. Here is a gracious invitation given us to make up this quarrel. Pardoning mercy is called the power of our Lord; let him take hold of that. Christ is the arm of the Lord, ch. liii. 1. Christ crucified is the power of God (1 Cor. i. 24); let him by a lively faith take hold of him. God is willing to be reconciled to us if we be but willing to be reconciled to him.

3. The church of God in the world shall be a growing body (v. 6): In times to come (so some read it), in after-times, when these calamities are overpast, or in the days of the gospel, he shall cause Jacob to take root, deeper root than ever. Many shall be brought into the church, proselytes shall be numerous, some out of all the nations about, and the converts shall be fruitful in the fruits of righteousness. The preaching of the gospel brought forth fruit in all the world (Col. i. 6), fruit that remains, John xv. 16.

Here is the prophet singing of mercy and judgment to the church, and mercy mixed with that judgment.

I. Here is judgment threatened even to Jacob and Israel. They shall blossom and bud (v. 6), but some shall be smitten and slain (v. 7). Judgment shall begin at the house of God. Jerusalem, their defenced city, shall be desolate, v. 10, 11. "God having tried methods with them for their reformation, which as to many, have proved ineffectual, he will for a time lay their country waste," which was accomplished when Jerusalem was destroyed by the Chaldeans; then that habitation was for a long time forsaken. Jerusalem had been a defenced city, not so much by art or nature as by grace and the divine protection; but, when God was provoked to withdraw, she was left like a wilderness. "And in the pleasant gardens of Jerusalem cattle shall feed, shall lie down there, and there shall be none to drive them away; and they shall eat the tender branches of the fruit-trees," which perhaps further signifies that the people should become an easy prey to their enemies. "When the boughs thereof are withered as they grow upon the tree, blasted by winds and frosts and not pruned, they shall be broken off for fuel, and the women and children shall come and set them on fire. There shall be a total destruction, for the very trees shall be destroyed." And this is a figure of the deplorable state of the vineyards. Our Saviour seems to refer to this when he says of the branches of the vine which abide not in him that they are cast forth and withered, and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burned (John xv. 6). It is a people of no understanding, that have no relish or savour of divine things, like a withered branch that has no sap in it; and this is at the bottom of all sins. Wicked people in their greatest concerns are of no understanding. He that formed them into a people, to show forth his praise, seeing they do not answer the end of their formation, but hate to be reformed, to be new-formed, will reject them, and show them no favour. If he that made us by his power do not make us happy in his favour, we had better never have been made.

II. Here is great mercy mixed with this judgment; for there are good people mixed with those that are corrupt and degenerate, on whom God will have mercy. Though they shall be smitten and slain, yet not to that degree, and in that manner, in which their enemies shall be smitten and slain, v. 7. God's people and God's enemies are here represented struggling with each other. In this contest there are slain on both sides. God makes use of wicked men to slay his people; for they are his sword, Ps. xvii. 13. But, when the cup of trembling comes to be put into their hand, it will be much worse with them than ever it was with God's people in their greatest straits. The seed of the woman has only his heel bruised, but the serpent has his head crushed and broken. There is really a vast difference between the afflictions and deaths of good people and the afflictions and deaths of wicked people. The affliction shall be mitigated, moderated, and proportioned to their strength, not to their deserts, v. 8. Thus God orders the troubles of his people, not suffering them to be tempted above what they are able, 1 Cor. x. 13. He considers what we can bear when he begins to correct; and when it is the day of his east-wind, not only blustering and noisy, but blasting and noxious, he stays his rough wind, checks it, and sets bounds to it. When he is winnowing his corn, it is with a gentle gale, that shall only blow away the chaff, but not the good corn. Though God will afflict them, yet he will make their afflictions to work for the good of their souls, and correct them as the father does the child, to drive out the foolishness that is in their hearts (v. 9): By this therefore shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged. Therefore, because the affliction is moderated, and the rough wind stayed, we may conclude that he designs their reformation, not their destruction. The particular sin which the affliction was intended to cure was the sin of idolatry. But by the captivity in Babylon they were not only weaned from this sin, but set against it. Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols? Jacob has his sin taken away when he makes all the stones of the altar, of his idolatrous altar, the stones of which were precious and sacred to him, as chalkstones that are beaten asunder; he not only has them in contempt, and values them no more than chalkstones, but in a holy revenge, beats them asunder as easily as chalkstones are broken to pieces. The groves and the images shall not stand before this penitent, but they shall be thrown down too, never to be set up again. This was according to the law for the demolishing and destroying of all the monuments of idolatry (Deut. vii. 5); and since the captivity in Babylon, no people in the world have such a rooted aversion to idols and idolatry as the people of the Jews. Jerusalem shall be desolate and forsaken, for a time, yet there will come a day when its scattered friends shall resort to it again out of all the countries whither they were dispersed (v. 12, 13). These scattered Israelites shall be fetched: The Lord shall beat them off as fruit from the tree, or beat them out as corn out of the ear. He shall separate them from those among whom they dwelt, from the channel of the river Euphrates north-east, unto Nile, the stream of Egypt, which lay south-west—those that were driven into the land of Assyria, and were captives there in the land of their enemies, and those that were outcasts in the land of Egypt, whither many left behind, after the captivity in Babylon, went, contrary to God's express command (Jer. xliii. 6, 7), and there lived as outcasts: God has mercy in store for them all. Though they are cast out, they are not cast off. "You shall be gathered one by one, silently, and as it were by stealth, dropping in, first one, and then another." The great trumpet shall be blown, and then they shall come. Cyrus's proclamation of liberty to the captives is this great trumpet, which awakened the Jews that were asleep in their thraldom to bestir themselves. They shall be gathered together: To worship the Lord in the holy mount at Jerusalem. When the captives rallied again, and returned to their own land, the chief thing they applied themselves to, was the worship of God. The holy temple was in ruins, but they had the holy mount, the place of the altar, Gen. xiii. 4. Liberty to worship God is the most valuable and desirable liberty.

CHAP. XXVIII

In this chapter, I. The Ephraimites are reproved and threatened for their pride and sensuality, ver. 1–8. But, in the midst of this, here is a gracious promise of God's favour to the remnant of his people, ver. 5–6. II. They are likewise reproved and threatened for their dulness and stupidity, and unaptness to profit by the instructions which the prophets gave them in God's name, ver. 9–13. III. The rulers of Jerusalem are reproved and threatened for their insolent contempt of God's judgments, and setting them at defiance; and, after a gracious promise of Christ and his grace, they are made to know that the vain hopes of escaping the judgments of God with which they flattered themselves would certainly deceive them, ver. 14–22. IV. All this is confirmed by a comparison borrowed from the method which the husbandman takes with his ground and grain, according to which they must expect God would proceed with his people, whom he had lately called his threshing and the corn of his floor (ch. xxi. 10) ver. 23–29. This is written for our admonition, and is profitable for reproof and warning to us.

Verses 1–8

I. The prophet warns the ten tribes of the judgments coming for their sins when the king of Assyria laid their country waste, and carried the people into captivity. Ephraim had his name from fruitfulness, and had a great many fat valleys (v. 1, 4), and Samaria, which was situated on a hill, was on the head of the fat valleys. Their country was the glory of Canaan, their valleys were covered over with corn and vines.

1. What an ill use they made of their plenty! The goodness with which God crowned their years was to them a crown of pride. Pride was a sin that prevailed among them, and therefore the prophet boldly proclaims a woe to the crown of pride. They indulged themselves in sensuality. Ephraim was notorious for drunkenness, and Samaria, the head of the fat valleys, was full of those that were overcome with wine, were broken with it, so the margin. Drunkards make fools and brutes of themselves; the sin overcomes them, and brings them into bondage (2 Pet. ii. 19). Their constitution is broken by it, and their health ruined. They are brought to ruin by it. Their peace with God is broken and all this for the gratification of a base lust. Woe to these drunkards of Ephraim! There is a particular woe to the drunkards of Ephraim, for they are of God's professing people. Some make the crown of pride to belong to the drunkards, and to mean the garlands with which those were crowned that got the victory in their wicked drinking matches and drank down the rest of the company.

2. The justice of God in taking away their plenty from them, which they thus abused. Their glorious beauty, the plenty they were proud of, is but a fading flower. God can easily take away their corn in the season thereof (Hosea ii. 9), and recover those goods of his which they prepared for Baal. God has an officer ready to make a seizure for him, a mighty and strong one, even the king of Assyria, who shall cast down to the earth with the hand all that of which they are proud, v. 2. Then the crown of pride, and the drunkards of Ephraim, shall be trodden under foot (v. 3). Drunkards, in their folly, are apt to talk proudly; but they thereby render themselves ridiculous. The beauty of their valleys will wither of itself, and has in itself the principles of its own corruption. The hasty fruit, as soon as it is discovered, is plucked and eaten up; so the wealth of this world, besides that it is apt to decay of itself, is subject to be devoured by others as greedily as the first-ripe fruit.

II. He next turns to the kingdom of Judah, whom he calls the residue of his people (v. 5), for they were but two tribes to the other ten.

1. He promises them God's favours, and that they shall be taken under his guidance and protection when the beauty of Ephraim shall be left exposed to be trodden down and eaten up, v. 5, 6. In that day, when the Assyrian army is laying Israel waste, God will be to the residue of his people all they need and can desire; not only to the kingdom of Judah, but to those of Israel who had kept their integrity. When the Assyrian is in Israel as a tempest of hail, noisy and battering, as a destroying storm, and as a flood of mighty waters overflowing the country (v. 2), then in that day will the Lord of hosts distinguish by peculiar favours his people who have distinguished themselves by a steady adherence to him. He will be to them for a crown of glory and for a diadem of beauty. He will so appear in them as to make it evident that they have his image renewed on them, and that shall be to them a diadem of beauty. He will give them all the wisdom and grace necessary. He will himself be a spirit of judgment to those that sit in judgment; the counsellors shall be guided by wisdom and discretion and the judges shall govern by justice and equity. He will give them all the courage requisite to carry them through difficulties. He will be for strength to those that turn the battle to the gate, to the gates of the cities they besiege, or to their own gates, when they sally out upon the enemies that besiege them. Where God gives these he is to that people a crown of glory. This may well be supposed to refer to Christ, and so the Chaldee understands it: In that day shall the Messiah be a crown of glory.

2. He complains of the many corrupt ones (v. 7): But they also, many of those of Judah, have erred through wine. There are drunkards of Jerusalem, as well as drunkards of Ephraim. Ephraim's sins are found in Judah, and yet not Ephraim's ruins. They have erred through wine. Their drinking to excess is itself a practical error; they ruin their judgment, and they think to preserve their health by it and help digestion, but they spoil their constitution and hasten diseases and deaths. Their understanding is clouded and their conscience debauched by it; and therefore they espouse corrupt notions, and form their minds in favour of their lusts. Three things are aggravations of this sin: (1) That those were guilty of it who ought to have set a better example: The priest and the prophet are swallowed up of wine; their office is drowned and lost in it. The priests, as sacrificers, were obliged by a particular law to be temperate (Lev. x. 9). The prophets were a kind of Nazarite (as appears by Amos ii. 11), and were concerned to keep at the utmost distance from the sins they reproved in others; yet there were many of them ensnared in this sin. (2) That the consequences of it were very pernicious, not only by the ill influence of their example, but the prophet, when he was drunk, erred in vision. The priest stumbled in judgment and forgot the law (Prov. xxxi. 5); he reeled and staggered as much in the operations of his mind as in the motions of his body. (3) That the disease was epidemic: All tables are full of vomit, v. 8. It is rude and ill-mannered enough to sicken the beholders, for the tables where they eat their meat are filthily stained.

The prophet here complains of the wretched stupidity of this people, that they were unteachable.

I. Their prophets and ministers designed to teach knowledge, the knowledge of God and his will, and to make them understand doctrine, v. 9. This is God's way of dealing with men, to enlighten men's minds first with the knowledge of his truth, and thus to gain their affections, and bring their wills into a compliance with his laws.

II. They left no means untried to do them good, but taught them as little children that are beginning to learn, that are taken from the breast to the book (v. 9), for among the Jews it was common for mothers to nurse their children till they were three years old, and almost ready for school. They teach them, as they are capable, the good knowledge of the Lord, and to instruct them even when they are but newly weaned from the milk. They have been taught, as children are taught to read, by precept upon precept, and taught to write by line upon line, a little here and a little there, a little of one thing and a little of another, that instructions might be pleasing—a little at one time and a little at another, that they might not have their memories overcharged—a little from one prophet and a little from another. It is requisite that we have precept upon precept and line upon line. The precept of justice must be upon the precept of piety, and the precept of charity upon that of justice. The same precept and the same line should be often repeated. Teachers should accommodate themselves to the capacity of the learners, give them what they most need, and a little at a time, Deut. vi. 6, 7. They courted and persuaded them to learn, v. 12. God, by his prophets, said to them, "This way that we are directing you, is the rest, wherewith you may cause the weary to rest; and this will be the refreshing of your own souls, and will bring rest to your country from the wars with which it has been long harassed."

III. They were as unapt to learn as young children (v. 9). They would not hear (v. 12) that which would be rest and refreshing to them. They kept up the old custom of attending upon the prophet's preaching and it was continually beating upon them, but it beat nothing into them.

IV. How severely God would reckon with them for this. He would deprive them of the privilege of plain preaching, and speak to them with stammering lips and another tongue, v. 11. Those that will not hear the comfortable voice of God's word shall be made to hear the dreadful voice of his rod. By their profane contempt of God and his word they are but hastening on their own ruin, and ripening themselves for it; it is that they may go and fall backward, and proceed from one sin to another, till they be quite broken, and snared, and taken, and ruined, v. 13.

The prophet, having reproved those that made a jest of the word of God, here goes on to reprove those that made a jest of the judgments of God. He addresses himself to the scornful men who ruled in Jerusalem, the magistrates of the city, v. 14.

I. These scornful men challenged God Almighty to do his worst (v. 15): You have said, We have made a covenant with death and the grave. They thought themselves sure of their lives, even when judgments were abroad, as if they had made a bargain with death not to take them away by violence but by old age. If we be at peace with God we have in effect made a covenant with death that, whenever it comes, it shall be no terror to us, nor do us any real damage (1 Cor. iii. 22, 23): but to think of making death our friend while by sin we are making God our enemy, is the greatest absurdity. It was a fond conceit which these scorners had, When the overflowing scourge shall pass through our country, and others shall fall under it, yet it shall not come to us. But what is the ground of their confidence? We have made lies our refuge. Those things which should be lies and falsehood to the enemy, who was flagellum Dei—the scourge of God, the overflowing scourge, would secure them by imposing upon the enemy their stratagems of war, or their feigned submissions in treaties of peace. The rulers of Jerusalem think themselves greater politicians than those of the country towns; they will compliment the king of Assyria with a promise to surrender their city, or to become tributaries to him, with a purpose to shake off his yoke as soon as the danger is over. Those that pursue their designs by trick and fraud may perhaps compass them, but cannot expect comfort in them.

II. God, by the prophet, shows them the folly of their security. He does not disturb their false confidences, till he has first shown them a firm bottom on which they may repose themselves (v. 16): Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone. The foundation is made up of (a) The promises of God in general—his covenant with Abraham is a foundation of stone, firm and lasting, for faith to build upon; it is a tried stone, for all the saints have stayed themselves upon it and it never failed them. (b) The promise of Christ in particular; for to him this is expressly applied in the New Testament, 1 Pet. ii. 6–8. He is that stone which has become the head of the corner. Jesus Christ is a foundation of God's laying. He is a tried stone, a corner-stone, in whom the sides of the building are united, the head-stone of the corner. And he that believes these promises, and rests upon them, shall not make haste, but with a fixed heart shall quietly wait the event, saying, Welcome the will of God. The grounds which they now built on could not be safe (v. 17): Judgment will I lay to the line, and righteousness to the plummet. This denotes,

1 The building up of his church; having laid the foundation (v. 16), he will raise the structure, as builders do, by line and plummet, Zech. iv. 10. Righteousness shall be the line and judgment the plummet. The church, being founded on Christ, shall be formed and reformed by the scripture. Or,

2 The punishing of the church's enemies, against whom he will proceed by an exact rule. These scornful men will be made ashamed of the vain hopes with which they had deluded themselves. Those that make lies their refuge build upon the sand, and the building will fall when the storm comes, and bury the builder in the ruins of it. They fancied that when the overflowing scourge should pass through the land it should not come near them; but the prophet tells them (v. 19), that they shall be the first that shall fall by it: "From the time it goes forth it shall take you, as if it came on purpose to seize you. Morning by morning shall it pass over; you shall never be safe; there shall be a pestilence walking in darkness and a destruction wasting at noonday." The very report of it at a distance will be a terror to you. Evil tidings are a terror to scorners, but he whose heart is fixed, trusting in God, is not afraid of them; whereas, when the overflowing scourge comes, then all the comforts and confidences of scorners fail them, v. 20. The bed is shorter than that a man can stretch himself upon it, so that he is forced to cramp and contract himself. That in which they thought to shelter themselves proves insufficient: The covering is narrower than that a man can wrap himself in. When God comes to contend with these scorners, He will do his work, and bring to pass his act, as the righteous Judge of the earth. He will do it now against his people, as formerly he did it against their enemies; he will now rise up against Jerusalem as, in David's time, against the Philistines in Mount Perazim (2 Sam. v. 20), and as, in Joshua's time, against the Canaanites in the valley of Gibeon. If those that profess themselves members of God's church by their pride and scornfulness make themselves like Philistines and Canaanites, they must expect to be dealt with as such. This will be his strange work, his strange act. It is work that he is not used to as to his own people. It is a strange work indeed if he turn to be their enemy and fight against them, ch. lxiii. 10. The use and application of all this (v. 22): "Therefore be you not mockers; dare not to ridicule either the reproofs of God's word or his judgments. Be you not mockers, lest your bands be made strong, both the bands by which you are bound under the dominion of sin, and the bands by which you are bound over to the judgments of God." Let not these mockers make light of divine threatenings, for the prophet assures them that the Lord God of hosts has determined a consumption upon the whole earth; and can they think to escape?

Verses 23–29

This parable, which (like many of our Saviour's parables) is borrowed from the husbandman's calling, is ushered in with a solemn preface, He that has ears to hear, let him hear, v. 23.

I. The parable here is plain enough, that the husbandman applies himself to the business of his calling with pains and prudence, and observes a method and order in his work. 1. In his ploughing and sowing: Does the ploughman plough all day to sow? Yes, he ploughs in hope and sows in hope, 1 Cor. ix. 10. Does he open and break the clods? Yes, that the land may be fit to receive the seed. And when he has thus made plain the face thereof does he not sow seed suitable to the soil? For the husbandman knows what grain is fit for clay ground and what for sandy ground, and, accordingly, he sows each in its place—wheat in the principal place (so the margin reads it), for it was a staple commodity of Canaan (Ezek. xxvii. 17), and barley in the appointed place. 2. In his threshing, v. 27, 28. This also he proportions to the grain that is to be threshed out. The fitches and the cummin, being easily got out of their husk or ear, are only threshed with a staff and a rod; but the bread-corn requires more force, and therefore that must be bruised with a threshing instrument, a sledge shod with iron, that was drawn to and fro over it, to beat out the corn; and yet he will not be ever threshing it, nor any longer than is necessary to loosen the corn from the chaff; he will not break it, or crush it with the wheel of his cart, nor bruise it to pieces with his horsemen; the grinding of it is reserved for another operation. What pains are to be taken, not only for the earning, but for the preparing of our necessary food; and yet, after all, it is meat that perishes! Shall we then grudge to labour much more for the meat which endures to everlasting life? Bread-corn is bruised. Christ was so; it pleased the Lord to bruise him, that he might be the bread of life to us.

II. Most interpreters make the parable a further answer to those who set the judgments of God at defiance: "As the husbandman will not be always ploughing, but will at length sow his seed, so God will not be always threatening, but will at length bring upon sinners the judgments they have deserved; but in wisdom, that they may be reformed and brought to repentance." But we may give this parable a greater latitude. 1. It is God that instructs the husbandman to discretion, as his God, v. 26. Husbandmen have need of discretion wherewith to order their affairs. The advancing of the art of husbandry is a common service to mankind more than the cultivating of most other arts. The skill of the husbandman is from God. This takes off somewhat of the weight of the sentence passed on man for sin, that when God, in execution of it, sent man to till the ground, he taught him how to do it most to his advantage. It is he that gives men capacity for this business, an inclination to it, and a delight in it, and to him husbandmen must seek for direction for they, above other men, have an immediate dependence upon the divine Providence. As to the other instance of the husbandman's conduct in threshing his corn, it is said, This also comes forth from the Lord of hosts, v. 29. And, if it is from him that men do things wisely, we must needs acknowledge him to be wise in counsel and excellent in working. 2. God's church is his husbandry, 1 Cor. iii. 9. If Christ is the true vine, his Father is the husbandman (John xv. 1), and he is continually by his word and ordinances cultivating it. Does not God by his ministers break up the fallow ground? God sows his word by the hand of his ministers (Matt. xiii. 19). Whatever the soil of the heart is, there is some seed or other in the word proper for it. And, as the word of God, so the rod of God is thus wisely used. Afflictions are God's threshing-instruments, designed to loosen us from the world, to separate between us and our chaff, but he will proportion them to our strength. If the rod and the staff will answer the end, he will not make use of his cart-wheel and his horsemen.

CHAP. XXIX

This woe to Ariel, which we have in this chapter, is the same with the "burden of the valley of vision" (ch. xxii. 1), and (it is very probable) points at the same event—the besieging of Jerusalem by the Assyrian army, which was cut off there by an angel; yet it is applicable to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, and its last desolations by the Romans. I. The event itself foretold, that Jerusalem should be greatly distressed (ver. 1–4, 6), but that their enemies should be defeated, ver. 5, 7, 8. II. A reproof to three sorts of sinners: 1. Those that were regardless of warnings, ver. 9–12. 2. Those that were formal and hypocritical in their religious performances, ver. 13–14. 3. Those politicians that profanely despised God's providence, ver. 15, 16. III. Precious promises of grace and mercy to a remnant whom God would sanctify, ver. 17–24.

Verses 1–8

That it is Jerusalem which is here called Ariel is agreed, for that was the city where David dwelt; that part of it which was called Zion was in a particular manner the city of David, in which both the temple and the palace were. But why it is so called is uncertain. Cities, as well as persons, get surnames and nicknames. Ariel signifies the lion of God, or the strong lion: as the lion is king among beasts, so was Jerusalem among the cities. Jerusalem, while she was a righteous city, was bold as a lion. Some make Ariel to signify the altar of burnt-offerings, which devoured the beasts offered in sacrifice as the lion does his prey. I rather take it as a woe to Jerusalem, Jerusalem; it is repeated here, as it is Matt. xxiii. 37, that it might be the more awakening.

I. The distress of Jerusalem foretold. Though Jerusalem be a strong city, yet, if iniquity be found there, woe be to it. 1. Let Jerusalem know that her external performance of religious services will not serve as an exception from the judgments of God (v. 1): "Add year to year; go on in your annual feasts, let all your males appear there three times a year before the Lord, and none empty, and let them never miss any of these solemnities: let them kill the sacrifices, as they used to do; but, as long as their lives are unreformed and their hearts unhumbled, let them not think thus to pacify an offended God and to turn away his wrath." 2. Let her know that she shall be visited of the Lord of hosts (v. 6); her sins shall be punished with alarms like thunder and earthquakes, storms and tempests, and devouring fire. (1) Jerusalem shall be besieged. He does not say, I will destroy Ariel, but I will distress Ariel; and she is therefore brought into distress, that being awakened to repent, she may not be brought to destruction. I will (v. 3) encamp against thee round about. It was the enemy's army that encamped against it. When men fight against us we must, in them, see God contending with us. (2) She shall be in grief to see the country laid waste. "There shall be heaviness and sorrow (v. 2); they shall repent, and reform, and return to God, and then it shall be to me as Ariel. Jerusalem shall be like itself, shall become to me a Jerusalem again, a holy city," ch. i. 26. (3) She shall be humbled, and mortified (v. 4): "Thou shalt be brought down from the height of arrogancy, and now thou shalt speak out of the ground, out of the dust, as one that has a familiar spirit, whispering out of the dust. They should be faint and feeble, as those who are sick, their speech low and interrupted, being afraid lest their enemies should overhear them.

II. The destruction of Jerusalem's enemies is foretold (v. 5, 7): "Thou shalt be brought down (v. 4), to speak out of the dust; so low thou shalt be reduced. But" (so it may be rendered) "the multitude of thy strangers and the terrible ones, the numerous armies of the enemy, shall themselves be like small dust, not able to speak at all, or so much as whisper, but as chaff that passes away. Thou shalt be abased, but they shall be quite dispersed and slain (ch. xxvii. 7). Yea, it shall be in an instant, suddenly: the enemy shall be surprised with the destruction, and you with the salvation." The army of the Assyrians was by an angel laid dead upon the spot, in an instant, suddenly. The multitude of the nations that fight against Zion shall be as a hungry man who dreams that he eats, but still is hungry. Whereas they hoped to make a prey of Jerusalem, and to enrich themselves with plunder, their hopes shall prove vain dreams. They themselves, and all their pomp, and power, and prosperity, shall vanish like a dream.

Verses 9–16

I. The prophet stands amazed at the stupidity of the greatest part of the Jewish nation. They had Levites, who taught the good knowledge of the Lord. They had prophets, who brought them messages immediately from God. Surely this great nation, that has all the advantages of divine revelation, will be a wise and understanding people, Deut. iv. 6. But, alas! it was quite otherwise, v. 9. The prophet addresses himself to the sober thinking part of them. "The rest sport themselves with their own deceivings; they riot and revel; but do you cry out, lament their folly, cry to God by prayer for them." They were drunk with the love of pleasures, with prejudices against religion, and with the corrupt principles they had imbibed. Like drunken men, they are not sensible of the divine rebukes they are under. They have beaten me, and I felt it not, says the drunkard, Prov. xxiii. 35. There is such a thing as spiritual drunkenness. God himself poured out upon them a spirit of deep sleep, and closed their eyes (v. 10) in righteous judgment, to punish them for their loving darkness rather than light, their loving sleep. They said, Yet a little sleep, a little slumber; and therefore he gave them up to strong delusions, and said, Sleep on now. This is applied to the unbelieving Jews, who rejected the gospel of Christ, and were justly hardened in their infidelity, till wrath came upon them to the uttermost. Rom. xi. 8, God has given them the spirit of slumber. This was fulfilled when, in the latter days of the Jewish church, the chief priests, and the scribes, and the elders of the people, were the great opposers of Christ and his gospel, and brought themselves under a judicial infatuation. Every vision, particularly that this prophet had seen, and published, had become unintelligible; they had it among them, but were never the wiser for it, any more than a man (though a good scholar) is for a book delivered to him sealed up. He sees it is a book, and that is all. So they knew that what Isaiah said was a vision and prophecy, but the meaning of it was hidden from them. But the same vision which to you is a savour of death unto death to others is and shall be a savour of life unto life. Knowledge is easy to him that understands.

II. The prophet, in God's name, threatens those that were formal and hypocritical in their devotion, v. 13, 14.

1. Their sin is dissembling with God in their religious performances, v. 13. He that knows the heart cannot be imposed upon with shows and pretences. If the heart be full of his love and fear, out of the abundance of that the mouth will speak. But there are many whose religion is lip-labour only. It is only from the teeth outward. They do not apply their minds to the service. They do not make the word of God the rule of their worship, nor his will their reason: Their fear towards me is taught by the precept of men. The tradition of the elders was of more value than the laws which God commanded Moses. This our Saviour applies to the Jews in his time, who were formal in their devotions, Matt. xv. 8, 9.

2. It is a spiritual judgment with which God threatens to punish them for their spiritual wickedness (v. 14): I will proceed to do a marvellous work. They removed all sincerity from their hearts. Now God will remove all sagacity from their heads. The wisdom of their wise men shall perish. They played the hypocrite, and thought to put a cheat upon God, and now they are left to themselves to play the fool, to be easily cheated by all about them. This is a marvellous work; that wise men should of a sudden lose their wisdom and be given up to strong delusions.

III. He shows the folly of those that thought to act separately and secretly from God. Their politics described (v. 15): They seek deep to hide their counsel from the Lord, that he may not know either what they do or what they design. The absurdity of their politics demonstrated (v. 16): Surely your turning of things upside down—your inverting the order of things, and thinking to make God's providence give attendance to your projects, turning things upside down and beginning at the wrong end—shall be esteemed as the potter's clay. God will turn and manage you, and all your counsels, with as much ease as the potter fashions his clay.

God here tells them that he will turn things upside down. They disbelieve Providence: "Wait awhile," says God, "and you shall be convinced that there is a God who governs the world." The wonderful revolution here foretold may refer primarily to the happy settlement of the affairs of Judah and Jerusalem after the defeat of Sennacherib's attempt. But it may look further, to the rejection of the Jews at the first planting of the gospel.

I. A great change is here foretold, v. 17. Lebanon, that was a forest, shall be turned into a fruitful field; and Carmel, that was a fruitful field shall become a forest. It was a sign of the defeat of Sennacherib that the ground should be more than ordinarily fruitful (ch. xxxvii. 30): You shall eat this year such as grows of itself; food for man shall be (as food for beasts is) the spontaneous product of the soil. Then Lebanon became so fruitful that that which used to be reckoned a fruitful field in comparison with it was looked upon but as a forest. When a great harvest of souls was gathered in to Christ from among the Gentiles then the wilderness was turned into a fruitful field, ch. liv. 1.

II. Those that were ignorant shall become intelligent, v. 18. Those that understood not this prophecy shall, when it is accomplished, understand it, and shall acknowledge, not only the hand of God in the event, but the voice of God in the prediction of it: The deaf shall then hear the words of the book. The poor Gentiles shall then have divine revelation brought among them; and those that sat in darkness shall see a great light, for the gospel was sent to them to open their eyes, Acts xxvi. 18. Those that were erroneous shall become orthodox (v. 24): Those that erred in spirit shall come to a right understanding of things; the Spirit of truth shall lead them into all truth. Those that murmured at the truths of God as hard sayings, shall learn the true meaning and will be better reconciled to them. Those that erred concerning the providence of God and murmured shall see the issue of things and be aware of what God was designing in all, Hos. xiv. 9. Those that were melancholy shall become cheerful and pleasant (v. 19): The meek also shall increase their joy in the Lord. This intimates that even in their distress they kept up their joy in the Lord, but now they increased it. The grace of meekness will contribute very much to the increase of our holy joy. Sennacherib, that terrible one, and his great army, shall be brought to nought (v. 20). The power of Satan, that terrible one indeed, shall be broken by the prevalency of Christ's gospel, Heb. ii. 14. The persecutors shall be quieted. To complete the repose of God's people, the scorners at home shall be consumed and cut off by Hezekiah's reformation. They had been persecutors of God's people and prophets, probably of the prophet Isaiah. And this is very applicable to the chief priests and Pharisees, who persecuted Christ and his apostles, and for that sin were cut off and consumed. They lay in wait for an occasion against them. By their spies they watch for iniquity, to see if they can lay hold of anything that is said or done that may be called an iniquity. They made a man, though he were ever so wise and good, an offender for a word, a word mischosen or misplaced, when they could not but know that it was well meant, v. 21. Those that reprove in the gates, who were bound as prophets, as judges, and magistrates, to show people their transgressions, hated these and laid snares for them, as the Pharisees' emissaries, who were sent to watch our Saviour that they might entangle him in his talk (Matt. xxii. 15). They turn aside the just for a thing of nought. They run a man down, and misrepresent him, by all the little arts and tricks they can devise, as they did our Saviour.

Jacob made to blush by the reproaches of his enemies, shall now be relieved by the rolling away of those reproaches (v. 22): Thus saith the Lord who redeemed Abraham out of his troubles and will redeem all that are by faith his genuine seed out of theirs. He that began his care of his church in the redemption of Abraham will appear for the house of Jacob, and they shall not be ashamed, nor shall their faces now wax pale; but they shall gather courage. Jacob, who thought his family would be extinct, shall see his children, multitudes of believers and he shall not be ashamed (v. 22), but shall speak with his enemy in the gate, Ps. cxxvii. 5. It is some comfort to parents to think that their children are God's creatures, the work of the hands of his providence. But it will be much more a comfort to them to see their children his new creatures, the work of the hands of his grace.

CHAP. XXX

This chapter seems to relate to the approaching danger of Sennacherib's invasion. I. A just reproof to those who were all in a hurry to fetch succours from Egypt, ver. 1–7. II. A terrible threatening against those who slighted the good advice which God by his prophets gave them, ver. 8–17. III. A gracious promise to those who trusted in God, that they should see happy days, times of joy and reformation, outward good things and increasing joys and triumphs (ver. 18–26), and many of these promises are applicable to gospel grace. IV. A prophecy of the total rout of the Assyrian army, which should be an introduction to those happy times, ver. 27–33.

Verses 1–7

It was often the fault and folly of the people of the Jews that, when they were insulted by their neighbours on one side, they sought for succour from their neighbours on the other side, instead of looking up to God and putting their confidence in him. Against the Israelites they sought to the Syrians, 2 Chron. xvi. 2, 3. Against the Syrians they sought to the Assyrians, 2 Kings xvi. 7. Against the Assyrians they here sought to the Egyptians, 2 Kings xviii. 21.

I. This sin of theirs is described. They would not consult God. "They take counsel among themselves, and one from another; but they do not ask counsel, much less will they take counsel, of me. They cover with a covering but not of my Spirit, and therefore it will prove too short a covering, and a refuge of lies." They strengthened themselves in the strength of Pharaoh. The shadow of Egypt (and it was but a shadow) was the covering in which they wrapped themselves.

II. The evil of this sin. They were, in profession, God's children; but, not trusting in him, they were justly stigmatized as rebellious. They added sin to sin. They took so much pains to secure the Egyptians for their allies: They walk to go down to Egypt, travel up and down to find an advantageous road thither; but they have not asked at my mouth, never considered whether God would approve of it. They were at a vast expense to do it, v. 6. They load the beasts of the south (horses fetched from Egypt, which lay south from Judæa) with their riches, fancying, as is common with people in a fright, that they were safer anywhere than where they were. Or they sent their riches thither as bribes to Pharaoh's courtiers. God would have helped them gratis; but, if they will have help from the Egyptians, they must pay dearly for it. They carried their effects to Egypt through a land (so it may be read) of trouble and anguish, that vast howling wilderness, which lay between Canaan and Egypt, whence come the lion and fiery serpent, Deut. viii. 15.

III. The consequence of it. The Egyptians would receive their ambassadors, and be willing to treat with them (v. 4): His princes were at Zoan, and the king encouraged them to depend upon the succours he would send them. But they would not answer their expectation: They could not profit them, v. 5. God says, They shall not profit them (v. 6). The forces they were to furnish them with could not be raised in time; or the Egyptians would secretly incline to the Assyrians. The Egyptians shall help in vain, and to no purpose, v. 7. The strength of Pharaoh, which was your pride, shall be your shame; and you will upbraid yourselves, with your folly in trusting to it. And the shadow of Egypt, that land shadowing with wings (ch. xviii. 1), which was your confidence, shall be your confusion. The princes of Israel, who were so forward to court an alliance shall all be ashamed of a people that could not be a help or profit to them, but a shame and reproach, v. 5. Those that put confidence in any creature will sooner or later find it a reproach to them. The Creator is a rock of ages, the creature a broken reed. We cannot expect too little from man nor too much from God. "Therefore have I cried concerning this matter. Their strength is to sit still, in a humble dependence upon God and not to wander about to seek help from this and the other creature."

Verses 8–17

I. The preface is very awful. The prophet must write it (v. 8), write it in a table, in a book, to be preserved for posterity, for a standing testimony against this wicked generation. Let it be written to shame the men of the present age: their children may profit by it, though they will not. People will be tempted to think God was too hard upon them unless they know how bad they were, and what fair means God tried with them before he brought it to this extremity. It is designed for admonition to those of the remotest place and age.

II. The character given of the profane and wicked Jews. This is a rebellious people, v. 9. "They are lying children, that will not stand to what they say, that promise fair, but perform nothing." They rebelled against the divine authority: "They are children that will not hear the law of the Lord, nor heed it."

III. The sentence passed upon them is dreadful.

1. They forbade the prophets to speak to them in God's name. They did in effect say to the seers, See not. The prophets told them of their faults, and warned them of their danger by reason of sin, and they could not bear that. They must speak to them smooth things. Let a thing be ever so right and true, if it be not smooth, they will not hear it. Those deserve to be deceived that desire to be so. The prophets stopped them in their sinful pursuits, and stood in their way like the angel in Balaam's road, with the sword of God's wrath drawn in their hand. When they went on frowardly in the way of their hearts they said to the prophets, "Get you out of the way, turn aside out of the paths." The prophets were continually telling them of the Holy One of Israel, and how severely he will reckon with sinners; and this they could not endure. If the prophets will speak to them, they will make it their bargain that they shall not call God the Holy One of Israel; for God's holiness is that attribute which wicked people most of all dread. The doom passed upon them for this, v. 12, 13. Thus saith the Holy One of Israel. We must tell men that God is the Holy One of Israel. The ground of the judgment is: Because they despise this word—either, in general, every word that the prophets said to them, or this word in particular, which declares God to be the Holy One of Israel. They trust in oppression and perverseness, in the wealth they have got by fraud and violence, or in the sinful methods they have taken for their own security. On these they lean, and therefore it is just that they should fall. Judgment is passed upon them: "This iniquity shall be to you as a breach ready to fall. This confidence of yours will be like a house built upon the sand. Your contempt of that word of God which you might build upon will make everything else you trust to like a wall that bulges out, which, if any weight be laid upon it, often sinks with its own weight." The breaking shall come suddenly, at an instant. "You and all your confidences shall be not only weak as the potter's clay (ch. xxix. 16), but broken to pieces as the potter's vessel. But, when once it is broken so as to be unfit for use, let it be dashed, let it be crushed all to pieces, so that there may not remain one shred big enough to take up a little fire or water—two things we have daily need of, and which poor people commonly fetch in a piece of a broken pitcher.

2. They slighted the gracious directions God gave them; they would take their own way, v. 15–17. The God that knew them, and desired their welfare, gave them this prescription; and it is recommended to us all. Would we be saved from the evil of every calamity. It must be in returning and rest, in returning to God and reposing in him as our rest. Let us return from our evil ways, and settle in the way of God and duty, and that is the way to be saved. "Return from this project of going down to Egypt. In returning (in the thorough reformation of your hearts and lives) and in rest (in an entire submission of your souls to God) you shall be saved." Would we be strengthened to do what is required of us? It must be in quietness and in confidence. We must rely upon God with a holy confidence that he can do what he will and will do what is best for his people. And this will be our strength. They would not take God's counsel, though it was so much for their own good. And justly will those die of their disease that will not take God for their physician. They would not so much as try the method prescribed: "But you said, No (v. 16), we will not compose ourselves, for we will flee upon horses and we will ride upon the swift; we will hurry hither and thither to fetch in foreign aids." When Sennacherib took all the fenced cities of Judah, those rebellious children would not be persuaded patiently to expect God's appearing for them, as he did wonderfully at last. Their sin shall be their punishment: "You will flee, and therefore you shall flee; you will be upon the full speed, and therefore so shall those be that pursue you." The dogs are most apt to run barking after him that rides fast. The conquerors protected those that sat still, but pursued those that made their escape. It is foretold, v. 17, that they should be easily cut off; one of the enemy should defeat a thousand of them, and five put an army to flight. Only here and there one should escape alone in a solitary place, and be left as a beacon upon the top of a mountain, a warning to others.

Verses 18–26

The closing words of the foregoing paragraph (You shall be left as a beacon upon a mountain) some understand as a promise that a remnant of them should be reserved as monuments of mercy. The first words in this paragraph may be read by way of antithesis, Notwithstanding this, yet will the Lord wait that he may be gracious.

I. God will be gracious to them and will have mercy on them. "He will wait to be gracious (v. 18); he will wait till you return to him and seek his face, and then he will be ready to meet you with mercy. He will stir up himself to deliver you, will be exalted, will be raised up out of his holy habitation (Zech. ii. 13), and thus he will be exalted, that is, he will glorify his name." "He will be gracious to thee, at the voice of thy cry, the cry of thy necessity, when that is most urgent—the cry of thy prayer, when that is most fervent. When he shall hear it, there needs no more; at the first word he will answer thee, and say, Here I am." Those who were disturbed in the possession of their estates shall again enjoy them quietly. When the danger is over the people shall dwell in Zion, at Jerusalem, as they used to do; they shall dwell safely, free from the fear of evil. Those who dwell in Zion, the holy city, will find enough there to wipe away tears from their eyes. This is grounded upon two great truths: (1) That the Lord is a God of judgment; he is both wise and just in all the disposals of his providence, true to his word and tender of his people. (2) That therefore all those are blessed who wait for him, who not only wait on him with their prayers, but wait for him with their hopes.

II. They shall not again know the want of the means of grace, v. 20, 21. It was promised (v. 19), that they should weep no more and that God would be gracious to them; and yet here it is taken for granted that God may give them the bread of adversity and the water of affliction. It is promised that their eyes should see their teachers, that is, that they should have faithful teachers among them, and should have hearts to regard them and not slight them as they had done; and then they might the better be reconciled to the bread of adversity and the water of affliction. It was a common saying among the old Puritans, Brown bread and the gospel are good fare. It seems that their teachers had been removed into corners. But God will find a time to call the teachers out of their corners again, and to replace them in their solemn assemblies. It is promised that they shall have the benefit, not only of the public ministry, but of private admonition and advice (v. 21): "Thy ears shall hear a word behind thee, calling after thee as a man calls after a traveller that he sees going out of his road." This word shall come—from behind thee, from someone whom thou dost not see, but who sees thee. "Thy eyes see thy teachers; but this is a teacher out of sight, it is thy own conscience, which shall now by the grace of God be awakened to do its office." The word shall be: This is the way, walk you in it. This word shall come when you turn to the right hand or to the left. There are right-hand and left-hand errors, extremes on each side virtue; the tempter is busy courting us into the by-paths. It is happy then if by the particular counsels of a faithful minister or friend, or the checks of conscience and the strivings of God's Spirit, we be set right and prevented from going wrong. "It shall not only be spoken, but thy ears shall hear it; whereas God has formerly spoken once, yea, twice, and thou hast not perceived it (Job xxxiii. 14), now thou shalt listen attentively to these secret whispers, and hear them with an obedient ear."

III. They shall be cured of their idolatry, shall fall out with their idols, and never be reconciled to them again, v. 22. They shall break off from their best-beloved sin. How mad they had formerly been in the day of their apostasy. They had graven images of silver, and molten images of gold, and, though gold needs no painting, they had coverings and ornaments on these; they spared no cost in doing honour to their idols. What a holy indignation they conceived against them in the day of their repentance. They not only degraded their images, but defaced them, in a pious fury threw away the gold and silver they were made of. Probably this was fulfilled in many persons, who, by the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib's army, were convinced of the folly of their idolatry and forsook it. It was fulfilled in the Jewish nation at their return from captivity in Babylon, for they abhorred idols ever after; and it is accomplished daily in the conversion of souls, by the power of divine grace, from spiritual idolatry to the fear and love of God.

IV. God will then give them plenty of all good things. When he gives them their teachers, and they give him their hearts, then all other things shall be added to them, Matt. vi. 33. And when the people are brought to praise God then shall the earth yield her increase, and with it God, even our own God, shall bless us, Ps. lxvii. 5, 6. So it follows here: "When you shall have abandoned your idols, then shall God give the rain of your seed," v. 23. God will give you rain to water the seed you sow. Thou shalt sow the ground, that is thy part, and then God will give the rain of thy seed, that is his part. It is so in spiritual fruit. The increase of the earth shall be fat and fat, very fat and very good, fat and plenteous (so we read it), good and enough of it. The cattle shall feed in large pastures, shall eat clean provender. The corn shall not be given them in the chaff to make it go the further, but they shall have good clean corn, winnowed with the fan. Even the tops of the mountains shall be so well watered with the rain that there shall be rivers and streams running down to the valleys (v. 25), and this in the day of the great slaughter made by the angel in the camp of the Assyrians, when the towers they had erected for the siege of Jerusalem, should fall.

V. The effect of all this should be comfort and joy to the people of God, v. 26. Light shall increase; that is, knowledge shall increase (when the prophecies are accomplished they shall be fully understood). The light of the moon shall become as bright and as strong as that of the sun, and that of the sun shall increase proportionably and be as the light of seven days—when the Lord binds up the breach of his people, heals the wounds that have been given them by this invasion and makes up all their losses. The light which the gospel brought into the world to those that sat in darkness as far exceeded the Old Testament light as that of the sun does that of the moon.

This terrible prediction of the ruin of the Assyrian army, is part of the promise to the Israel of God, that God would deter them from doing the like again.

I. God Almighty is here introduced in all the power and all the terror of his wrath, v. 27. The name of Jehovah, which the Assyrians disdain, behold, it comes from far. He is a messenger of wrath, burning with his anger. God's lips are full of indignation at the blasphemy of Rabshakeh, who compared the God of Israel with the gods of the heathen; his tongue is as a devouring fire. He does not stifle his resentments, but shall cause his glorious voice to be heard, v. 30. He shall display the indignation of his anger as the flame of a devouring fire, with lightning and with tempest and hailstones.

II. The execution done by this anger of the Lord. God will show the lighting down of his arm, v. 30. Those that would not see the lifting up of his arm (ch. xxvi. 11) shall feel the lighting down of it, and find to their cost, that the burden thereof is heavy (v. 27). Five things are here for the execution: 1. Here is an overflowing stream, that shall reach to the midst of the neck. The Assyrian army had been to Judah as an overflowing stream, reaching even to the neck (ch. viii. 7, 8), and now the breath of God's wrath will be so to it. 2. Here is a sieve of vanity, with which God would sift those nations of which the Assyrian army was composed, v. 28. He will sift them so as to shake them one against another, put them into great consternation, and shake them all away at last; for it is a sieve of vanity. 3. Here is a bridle to restrain them from doing mischief, and to force them to serve God's purposes against their own will, ch. x. 7. 4. Here is a rod and a staff, even the voice of the Lord, giving orders with which the Assyrian shall be beaten down, v. 31. There is no escaping it. In every place where an Assyrian is found, the Lord shall lay it upon him, and cause it to rest, v. 32. 5. Here is Tophet ordained and prepared for them, v. 33. The valley of the son of Hinnom, adjoining to Jerusalem, was called Tophet. In that valley, it is supposed, many of the Assyrian regiments lay encamped, and were there slain by the destroying angel.

III. The Assyrian's fall in Jerusalem's triumph (v. 29): You shall have a song as in the night, a psalm of praise such as those sing who by night stand in the house of the Lord, and sing to his glory who gives songs in the night.

CHAP. XXXI

This chapter is an abridgment of the foregoing chapter. I. A woe to those who, when the Assyrian army invaded them, trusted to the Egyptians, and not to God, for succour, ver. 1 3. II Assurance given of the care God would take of Jerusalem in that time of danger, ver. 4, 5. III A call to repentance and reformation, ver. 6, 7. IV. A prediction of the fall of the Assyrian army, ver. 8, 9.

Verses 1–5

I. The sin here reproved, v. 1. They go down to Egypt for help in every exigence, as if the worshippers of false gods were more likely to have success on earth than the servants of the living and true God. The Egyptians had many chariots and horses and horsemen, and, if they could get forces thence into their service, they would think themselves able to deal with the king of Assyria. Slighting the God of Israel: They look not to the Holy One of Israel.

II. The absurdity of this sin. They do not seek the Lord, yet he also is wise, v. 2. Would not infinite wisdom, engaged on their side, stand them in more stead than all the policies of Egypt? They are at the pains of going down to Egypt, a tedious journey, when they might have had better help by looking up to heaven. But, if they will not court God's wisdom he will arise against the house of the evil-doers, this cabal of them that go down to Egypt. They trusted to those who were unable to help them and would soon appear to be so, v. 3. Let them know that the Egyptians, whom they depend so much upon, are men and not God. Everyone knows this, that the Egyptians are not God and their horses are not spirit; but those that seek to them for help do not consider it, else they would not put such confidence in them. The Egyptians were shortly to be reckoned with, as appears by the burden of Egypt (ch. xix), and then those who fled to them for shelter and succour should fall with them. They took God's work out of his hands. They pretended a great deal of care to preserve Jerusalem, in advising to an alliance with Egypt. Now the prophet here tells them that Jerusalem should be preserved without aid from Egypt and that those who tarried there should be safe when those who fled to Egypt should be ruined. God would appear against Jerusalem's enemies with the boldness of a lion over his prey, v. 4. When the lion comes out to seize his prey a multitude of shepherds come out against him. These shepherds dare not come near the lion; all they can do is to make a noise, and with that they think to frighten him. But does he regard it? No; he will not be afraid of their voice. Thus will the Lord of hosts come down to fight for Mount Zion, will as easily and irresistibly destroy the Assyrian army as a lion tears a lamb in pieces. Whoever appear against God, they are but like a multitude of poor simple shepherds shouting at a lion. God would appear for Jerusalem's friends with the tenderness of a bird over her young, v. 5. As birds flying to their nests with all possible speed, when they see them attacked, hovering over their young ones to protect them drive away the assailants, with such compassion and affection will the Lord of hosts defend Jerusalem. Defending, he will deliver it. Passing over he will preserve it; the word for passing over is used in this sense only here and Exod. xii. 12, 13, 27, concerning the destroying angel's passing over the houses of the Israelites when he slew all the first-born of the Egyptians. The Assyrian army was to be routed by a destroying angel who should pass over Jerusalem. They shall be slain by the pestilence, but none of the besieged shall take the infection. Thus he will again pass over the houses of his people and secure them.

Verses 6–9

I. Jerusalem, reformed, shall be delivered from her enemies, v. 6, 7. This was the Lord's voice crying in the city, and the voice of the prophets interpreting the judgment: "Turn you from your evil ways, unto God, return to your allegiance to him from whom you, O children of Israel! have revolted." He reminds them of their birth and parentage. They have been backsliding children, yet children; therefore let them return, and their backslidings shall be healed. A gracious promise (v. 7): In that day every man shall cast away his idols, in obedience to Hezekiah's orders, which, till they were alarmed by the Assyrian invasion, many refused to do. That is a happy fright which frightens us from our sins. It shall be a general reformation: every man shall cast away his own idols. It shall be a reformation upon a principle of piety, not of politics. They shall cast away their idols, because they have been unto them for a sin, an occasion of sin.

II. Jerusalem's besiegers shall be routed. When they have cast away their idols, then shall the Assyrian fall, v. 8, 9. 1. The army of the Assyrians shall be laid dead upon the spot, by the sword of the Lord in the hand of an angel. The king of Assyria shall flee from that invisible sword to some stronghold of his own. His princes that accompany him shall be afraid of the ensign, of every ensign they see, suspecting it is a party of the Jews pursuing them. But who will do this? It is the Lord, whose fire is in Zion and his furnace in Jerusalem. God there keeps house, as a man does where his fire and his oven are. Let not the Assyrians think to turn him out of the possession of his own house. He is himself a wall of fire round about Jerusalem, so that whoever assaults her does so at his peril.

CHAP. XXXII

Here is, I. A prophecy of that good work of reformation with which Hezekiah should begin his reign, ver. 1–8. II. A prophecy of the great disturbance that would be given to the kingdom in the middle of his reign by the Assyrian invasion, ver. 9–14. III. A promise of better times afterwards (ver. 15–20), which promise may be supposed to look as far forward as the days of the Messiah.

Verses 1–8

The description of a flourishing kingdom. It may be taken as a directory both to magistrates and subjects, what both ought to do, or as a panegyric to Hezekiah.

I. That magistrates should do their duty in their places, and the powers answer the great ends for which they were ordained, v. 1, 2. The princes must have a king, a monarch over them as supreme, in whom they may unite; and the king must have princes under him as officers, by whom he may act, 1 Pet. ii. 13, 14. They shall use their power according to law, and not against it. They shall reign in righteousness with wisdom and equity. Christ himself reigns by rule. Thus they shall be great blessings to the people (v. 2): A man, that king that reigns in righteousness, shall be as a hiding-place. When princes are as they should be people are as they would be. This good magistrate is a covert to the subject from the tempest of injury and violence; he defends the poor and fatherless. He is as rivers of water in a dry place, cooling the earth and making it fruitful, and as the shadow of a great rock, under which a poor traveller may shelter from the scorching heat. All this, and much more, the man Christ Jesus is to all the willing faithful subjects of his kingdom. In him we find rivers of water for those that hunger and thirst after righteousness, all the refreshment that a needy soul can desire, and the shadow of a rock, of a great rock, for the shelter of the traveller. As the covert, and the hiding-place, and the rock, do themselves receive the battering of the wind and storm, to save those that take shelter in them, so Christ bore the storm himself to keep it off from us.

II. That subjects should do their duty in their places. They shall be willing to be taught, and shall lay aside their prejudices against their rulers and teachers, and submit to the light and power of truth, v. 3. When this blessed work of reformation is set on foot, and men do their parts towards it, the eyes of those that see, of the prophets, the seers, shall not be dim; but God will bless them with visions, to be by them communicated to the people. Then the ears of those that hear the word preached shall hearken. There shall be a wonderful change wrought in them, v. 4. The heart of those that were hasty and rash, shall now be cured of their precipitation, and shall understand knowledge; for the Spirit of God will open their understanding. This blessed work Christ wrought in his disciples after his resurrection (Luke xxiv. 45, 1 John v. 20.) The tongue of the stammerers, that used to blunder whenever they spoke of the things of God, shall now be ready to speak plainly, as those that understand, believe, and therefore speak. The differences between good and evil shall be no more confounded by those who put darkness for light and light for darkness (v. 5): The vile shall no more be called liberal. Vile persons, when they are advanced, are called liberal and bountiful benefactors (Luke xxii. 25): but when the world grows wiser, men shall be preferred according to their merit. Bad men shall be no more had in reputation among the people. In short, it is well with a people when men are valued by their virtue, and usefulness, and beneficence to mankind, and not by their wealth or titles of honour. To enforce this rule, here is a description both of the vile person and of the liberal. A vile person and a churl will do mischief the more if he have power in his hand; his honours will make him worse, v. 6, 7. These base ill-conditioned men are always plotting some unjust thing. There appears not in them the least spark of generosity. The more there is of plot and management in a sin the more there is of Satan in it. They speak villainy. When they are in a passion you will see what they are by the base ill language they give to those about them. They utter error against the Lord, and therein they practise profaneness; for so the word which we translate hypocrisy signifies. Nothing can be more impudently done against God than to use his name to patronise wickedness. Instead of supplying the wants of the poor, they impoverish them, they make empty the souls of the hungry; either taking away the food they have or denying the supply which they have to give. And they cause the drink of the thirsty to fail; they cut off the relief they used to have, though they need it as much as ever. These churls and vile persons have always bad instruments about them, that are ready to serve their villainous purposes: All their servants are wicked. One that is truly liberal, and deserves the honour of being called so, makes it his business to do good to everybody according as his sphere is, v. 8. He devises liberal things. Charity must be directed by wisdom, that it may not be charity misplaced. By liberal things he shall stand. The providence of God will reward him with a settled prosperity and an established reputation. The grace of God will give him peace in his own bosom.

In these verses we have God rising up to judgment against the vile persons, but returning in mercy to the liberal, to reward them for their liberality.

I. When there was so great a corruption of manners bad times might well be expected. The alarm is sounded to the women that were at ease (v. 9) and the careless daughters, to feed whose pride and luxury, their husbands and fathers were tempted to starve the poor. "Rise up, and hear with reverence and attention."

1. God was about to bring wasting desolating judgments upon the land in which they lived in pleasure and were wanton. This seems to refer primarily to the desolations made by Sennacherib's army when he seized all the fenced cities of Judah: but those words, many days and years, must be rendered (as the margin reads them) days above a year, that is, something above a year shall this havoc be in the making: so long it was from the first entrance of that army into the land of Judah to the overthrow of it. You shall be troubled, you careless women. The prophet here tells them the country whence they had their rents and dainties should shortly be laid waste: "The vintage shall fail; and then what will you do for wine to make merry with? The gathering of fruit shall not come, for there shall be none to be gathered, v. 10. You will want the teats, the good milk from the cows, the pleasant fields and their productions." The cities of Judah, where they lived at ease should be laid waste (v. 13, 14): Briers and thorns, the fruits of sin and the curse, shall come up, not only upon the land of my people, but upon all the houses of joy in the joyous cities. Then the stately houses shall be for dens for ever, which had been as forts and towers for strength and magnificence.

2. In the foresight of this let them tremble and be troubled, strip themselves, and gird sackcloth upon their loins, v. 11. This intimates not only that God's judgments would strip them, but that the best prevention of the trouble would be to repent and humble themselves before God in true remorse and godly sorrow. The best preparation for the trouble would be to deny themselves and to sit loose to all the delights of sense.

II. While there was still a remnant that kept their integrity they had reason to hope for good times at length. Such times they saw in the latter end of the reign of Hezekiah; but the prophecy may well be supposed to look further, to the days of the Messiah, who is King of righteousness and King of peace. Those blessed times shall be introduced—by the pouring out of the Spirit from on high (v. 15), which speaks not only of the good-will of God towards us, but the good work of God in us. God's giving his Holy Spirit to those that ask him is in effect his giving them all good things, as appears by comparing Luke xi. 13 with Matt. vii. 11. This is the great thing that God's people comfort themselves with the hopes of, that the Spirit shall be poured out upon them. When God designs favours for his church he pours out his Spirit to qualify those whom he designs to employ as instruments of his favour. (The kingdom of the Messiah was brought in, and set up, by the pouring out of the Spirit (Acts ii), and so it will be to the end.) That which was a wilderness, dry and barren, shall become a fruitful field. Then shall the earth yield her increase. It is promised that in the days of the Messiah the fruit of the earth shall shake like Lebanon, Ps. lxxii. 16. Some apply this to the admission of the Gentiles into the gospel church. When the Spirit is poured out upon a land, then judgment shall dwell in the wilderness and turn it into a fruitful field, and righteousness shall remain in the fruitful field and make it yet more fruitful. Ministers shall expound the law and magistrates execute it, so judiciously and faithfully that the bad shall be made good and the good made better. Among all sorts of people, the poor and low and unlearned, that are neglected as the wilderness, and the rich and great and learned, that are valued as the fruitful field, there shall be right thoughts of things. Inward peace, v. 17, follows upon the indwelling of righteousness, v. 16. It is itself peace, and the effect of it is quietness and assurance for ever, that is, a holy serenity and security of mind. Those are the quiet and peaceable lives that are spent in all godliness and honesty, 1 Tim. ii. 2. Even the work of righteousness shall be peace. In the doing of our duty we shall find true pleasure. Though the work of righteousness may be toilsome and expose us to contempt, yet it is peace. The effect of righteousness shall be quietness and assurance, to the endless ages of eternity. When the terror of Sennacherib's invasion was over, the people were more sensible than ever of the mercy of a quiet habitation, not disturbed with the alarms of war. Let every family keep itself quiet from strifes and jars within the house, and put itself under God's protection. Jerusalem shall be a peaceable habitation; compare ch. xxxiii. 20. Even when it shall hail, and there shall be a violent battering storm coming down on the forest that lies bleak, then shall Jerusalem be a quiet resting-place, for the city shall be low in a low place, under the wind, not exposed to the fury of the storm, but sheltered by the mountains that are round about Jerusalem, Ps. cxxv. 2. There shall be good crops gathered in everywhere, and every year. God will give the increase, but the husbandman must be industrious, and sow beside all waters; and, if he do this, the corn shall come up so thick that he shall turn in his cattle, even the ox and the ass, to eat the tops of it and keep it under. Some think it points at the ministry of the apostles, who, as husbandmen, went forth to sow their seed (Matt. xiii. 3) beside all waters. When God sends these happy times blessed are those that improve them in doing good with what they have, that sow beside all waters.

CHAP. XXXIII

This chapter relates to the same events as the foregoing chapter, the distress of Judah and Jerusalem by Sennacherib's invasion and their deliverance by the destruction of the Assyrian army. I. The great distress that Judah and Jerusalem should then be brought into, ver. 7–9. II. The particular frights which the sinners in Zion should then be in, ver. 13, 14. III. The prayers of good people to God in this distress, ver. 2. IV. The holy security which they should enjoy in the midst of this trouble, ver. 15, 16. V. The destruction of the army of the Assyrians, ver. 1–3. VI. The enriching of the Jews with the spoil of the Assyrian camp, ver. 4, 23, 24. VII. The happy settlement of Jerusalem, and the Jewish state. Religion shall be uppermost, ver. 6, and their civil state shall flourish, ver. 17–22.

I. The proud and false Assyrian, for all his fraud and violence, laid under a woe, v. 1. He had spoiled the people of God, and broken his treaty of peace with them, and dealt treacherously. He spoiled those that had never done him any injury, and that he had no pretence to quarrel with, and dealt treacherously with those that had always dealt faithfully with him. He that spoiled the cities of Judah shall have his own army destroyed by an angel. The Chaldeans shall deal treacherously with the Assyrians and revolt from them. Two of Sennacherib's own sons shall deal treacherously with him and basely murder him at his devotions. When he shall have done his worst, when he shall have gone as far as God would permit him to go, then the cup of trembling shall be put into his hand.

II. The praying people of God, earnest at the throne of grace for mercy for the land now in its distress (v. 2): "O Lord! be merciful to us." They prayed, 1. For those that were employed in military services for them: "Be thou their arm every morning. Hezekiah, and his princes, and all the men of war, need continual supplies of strength and courage from thee. Every morning, when they go forth and perhaps have new work to do and new difficulties to encounter, let them be invigorated, and, as the day, so let the strength be." 2. For the body of the people: "Be thou our salvation also in the time of trouble, ours who sit still, and do not venture into the high places of the field." They depend upon God not only as their Saviour, to work deliverance for them, but as their salvation itself.

III. The Assyrian army ruined and their camp made a rich but easy prey to Judah and Jerusalem. No sooner is the prayer made (v. 2) than it is answered (v. 3), it is outdone. They prayed that God would save them from their enemies; but he did more than that; he gave them victory over their enemies. The strength of the Assyrian camp was broken (v. 3) when the destroying angel slew so many thousands of them: At the noise of the tumult the rest of the people fled. The spoil of the Assyrian camp is seized, by way of reprisal, for all the desolations of the defenced cities of Judah (v. 4): Your spoil shall be gathered by the inhabitants of Jerusalem, like the gathering of the caterpillar, and as the running to and fro of locusts, that is, the spoilers shall as easily and as quickly make themselves masters of the riches of the Assyrians as a host of caterpillars, or locusts make a field, or a tree, bare.

IV. The spoil of the enemy is thus gathered (v. 5): The Lord is exalted. His people will have the blessing of it. When God lifts up himself to scatter the nations in confederacy against Jerusalem (v. 3), he has filled Zion with judgment and righteousness, a sense of justice. It shall again be called, The city of righteousness, ch. i. 26. Hezekiah and his people are encouraged (v. 6) with an assurance that God would stand by them in their distress. Wisdom and knowledge shall be the stability of thy times, and strength of salvation. Here is a desirable end, that is the stability of our times, that things be not disturbed at home, and the strength of salvation, deliverance from enemies abroad. Here is also pious maxim of state for Hezekiah and his people to govern themselves by: The fear of the Lord is his treasure. True religion is the true treasure of any prince or people; it denominates them rich.

V. The great distress that Jerusalem was brought into described. It is here foretold, 1. That the enemy would be very insolent and there would be no dealing with him, either by treaties of peace (for he has broken the covenant as if it were below him to be a servant to his word), or by the preparations of war, for he has despised the cities; he scorns their petitions for mercy. He meets with so little resistance, that he despises them, and has no relentings when he puts all to the sword. He neither fears God nor regards man. 2. That therefore he would not be brought to any terms of reconciliation. The ambassadors sent by Hezekiah to treat of peace, finding him so unmanageable, shall weep bitterly for vexation like children, as despairing to find out any expedient to pacify him. 3. That the country should be made quite desolate for a time by his army. No man durst travel the roads; so that a stop was put to trade and commerce: The highways lie waste. The traveller ceases. No man had any profit from the grounds, v. 9. The desolation is universal. That part of the country which belonged to the ten tribes was already laid waste: "Lebanon famed for cedars, Sharon for roses, Bashan for cattle, Carmel for corn, all very fruitful, have now become like wildernesses, are ashamed to be called by their own names, they are so unlike what they were. They shake off their fruits before their time into the hand of the spoiler."

VI. God appearing, at length, against this proud invader, v. 10–12. He had seemed to sit by as an unconcerned spectator. He will not only demonstrate that there is a God that judges, but that he is God over all. When all other helpers fail, then is God's time to help. He will bring down the Assyrian. O Assyrians! You shall conceive chaff, and bring forth stubble, which is worthless and combustible, proper fuel for the fire, which it cannot escape, when your own breath as fire shall devour you. The threatenings and slaughter you breathe out against the people of God, this shall devour you. God would make their own breath to blow the fire that should consume them; and then no wonder that the people are as the burnings of lime in a lime-kiln, and as thorns cut up, which are withered, and therefore are soon burnt up. Such was the destruction of the Assyrian army.

What has God done in which we must acknowledge his might?

I. He has struck a terror upon the sinners in Zion (v. 14): Fearfulness has surprised the hypocrites. There are sinners that enjoy Zion's privileges and services, but their hearts are not right in the sight of God. Now those sinners in Zion, though always subject to secret rights and terrors, were struck with a more than ordinary consternation from the convictions of their own consciences. When they saw the Assyrian army besieging Jerusalem, and ready to set fire to it, they could not make their escape to Egypt, and distrusting the promises God had made by his prophets, they were at their wits' end, crying: "Who among us shall dwell with devouring fire? Let us therefore abandon the city, and shift for ourselves elsewhere." Or, it may mean that they saw the Assyrian army destroyed; for the destruction of that is the fire spoken of immediately before, v. 11, 12. When the sinners in Zion saw what dreadful execution the wrath of God made they were in a great fright, being conscious that they had provoked this God by secretly worshipping other gods.

II. He has graciously provided for the security of his people that trust in him: Hear this, and acknowledge his power in making those that walk righteously, and speak uprightly, to dwell on high, v. 15, 16. We have here,

1. The good man's character even in times of common iniquity: He walks righteously. He acts by rules of equity, rendering to all their due, to God his due, as well as to men theirs. He speaks uprightly, uprightness (so the word is); he speaks with an honest intention. He thinks it a mean and sordid thing to enrich himself by any hardship put upon his neighbour. If he have a bribe at any time thrust into his hand, to prevent justice, he shakes his hands from holding it, taking it as an affront to have it offered him. He stops his ears from hearing anything that tends to cruelty, or any suggestions stirring him up to revenge, Job xxxi. 31. He shuts his eyes from seeing evil. He has such an abhorrence of sin that he cannot bear to see others commit it. Those that would preserve the purity of their souls must stop their ears to temptations, and turn away their eyes from beholding vanity.

2. The good man's comfort, which he may preserve even in times of common calamity, v. 16. He shall be safe; shall have communion with that God who is a devouring fire, but shall be to him a rejoicing light. And, as to present troubles, he shall dwell on high; he shall not be really harmed by them. The floods of great waters shall not come nigh him; or, if they should attack him, his place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks, fortified by nature as well as art. God, the rock of ages, will be his high tower. He shall want nothing that is necessary for him: Bread shall be given him, even when the siege is straitest; and his waters shall be sure. Those that fear the Lord shall not want anything that is good for them.

III. He will protect Jerusalem, and deliver it out of the hands of the invaders. Hezekiah shall put off his sackcloth and shall appear publicly in his beauty, in his royal robes (v. 17), to the great joy of all his loving subjects. Those that walk uprightly shall with an eye of faith see the King of kings in his beauty, the beauty of holiness, and that beauty shall be upon them. The siege being raised, they shall now be at liberty to go abroad without danger of falling into the enemies' hand: They shall behold the land that is very far off; they shall visit the utmost corners of the nation. Thus believers behold the heavenly Canaan, that land that is very far off, and comfort themselves with the prospect of it in evil times. The remembrance of the fright they were in shall add to the pleasure of their deliverance (v. 18): Thy heart shall meditate terror with pleasure when it is over. Thou shalt think thou still hearest the alarm in thy ears, "Arm, arm, arm! every man to his post. Where is the scribe or secretary of war? Let him appear to draw up the muster-roll. Where is the receiver and pay-master of the army? Let him see what he has in bank, to defray the charge of a defence. Where is he that counted the towers? That care may be taken to put a competent number of men in each." They shall no more be terrified with the sight of the Assyrians, who were a fierce people, and were of a strange language, that could understand neither their petitions nor their complaints, and therefore had a pretence for being deaf to them, nor could themselves be understood: They are of a deeper speech than thou canst perceive, v. 19. "Look upon Zion, the city of our solemnities, the city where our solemn sacred feasts are kept, where we used to meet to worship God in religious assemblies." The good people were most in pain for Zion upon this account, that the conquerors would burn their temple. Two things are here promised to Jerusalem: 1. A well-grounded security. It shall be a quiet habitation for the people of God; they shall not be disturbed, as they have been, by the alarms of war or persecution, ch. xxix. 20. "Thou shalt see the good of Jerusalem, and peace upon Israel; thou shalt live to see it and share in it." 2. An unmoved stability. Jerusalem, the city of our solemnities, is indeed but a tabernacle, in comparison with the New Jerusalem. The present manifestations of the divine glory and grace are nothing in comparison with those that are reserved for the future state. But it is such a tabernacle as shall not be taken down. After this trouble is over Jerusalem shall long enjoy a confirmed peace; and her sacred privileges, which are the stakes and cords of her tabernacle, shall not be removed from her. God's church on earth is a tabernacle, which, though it may be shifted from one place to another, shall not be taken down while the world stands; for in every age Christ will have a seed to serve him. The promises of the covenant are its stakes, and the ordinances and institutions of the gospel are its cords, which shall never be broken. God himself will be their protector and Saviour, v. 21, 22. This is the principal ground of their confidence. God will be the Saviour of Jerusalem and her glorious Lord. He will be a place of broad rivers and streams. Jerusalem had no considerable river running by it, so wanted one of the best natural fortifications, as well as one of the greatest advantages for trade and commerce; but the presence and power of God are sufficient at any time to make up to us the deficiencies. If there be broad rivers and streams about Jerusalem, these are rivers and streams in which shall go no galley with oars. "For the Lord is our Judge, by whose judgment we abide. He is our lawgiver; and to him every thought is brought into obedience. He is our King, to whom we pay homage and therefore he will save us." The enemies shall be broken, like a ship at sea that cannot ride out the storm, but having her tackle torn, her masts split, and nothing wherewith to repair them, is given up for a wreck, v. 23. They thought themselves sure of Jerusalem; but when they were just entering the port as it were, and thought all was their own, they could not spread their sail. The wealth of their camp shall be a rich booty for the Jews: Then is the prey of a great spoil divided. They left their tents as they were, so that all the treasure in them fell into the hands of the besieged; and even the lame take the prey. Thus God brought good out of evil, and not only delivered Jerusalem, but enriched it. Both sickness and sin shall be taken away. The inhabitant shall not say, I am sick. As the lame shall take the prey, so shall the sick. There shall be such a universal transport of joy that even the sick shall forget their sickness and join in rejoicings; the deliverance of their city shall be their cure. Or those that are sick shall bear their sickness without complaining as long as they see it goes well with Jerusalem. The people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity. Sin is the sickness of the soul. When God pardons the sin he heals the disease.

CHAP. XXXIV

In this chapter we have the fatal doom of all the nations that are enemies to God's church and people. It is probable that this prophecy had its accomplishment in the great desolations made by the Assyrian army first, or rather by Nebuchadnezzar's army some time after, among those nations that were neighbours to Israel and had been in some way or other injurious to them. That mighty conqueror took a pride in shedding blood, and laying countries waste, and therein, quite beyond his design, he was fulfilling what God here threatened against his and his people's enemies. Here is, I. A demand of universal attention, ver. 1. II. A direful scene of blood and confusion presented, ver. 2–7. III. The reason given for these judgments, ver. 8. IV. The continuance of this desolation (ver. 9–15). V. The solemn ratification of all this, ver. 16, 17.

Verses 1–8

I. The war proclaimed, v. 1. All nations must hear and hearken because they are all concerned in it; God is angry with them; his indignation is upon all nations.

II. The manifesto published, setting forth,

1. Whom he makes war against (v. 2): The indignation of the Lord is upon all nations; they are all in confederacy against God and religion, all in the interests of the devil. As they have all had the benefit of his patience, so they must all expect now to feel his resentments. His fury is in a special manner upon all their armies. With them they have done mischief to the people of God. With them they hope to make their part good against the justice and power of God; and therefore on them, in the first place, God's fury will come.

2. Whom he makes war for, and what are the grounds and reasons of the war (v. 8): It is the day of the Lord's vengeance. As there is a day of the Lord's patience, so there will be a day of his vengeance; for, though he bear long, he will not bear always. It is the year of recompences for the controversy of Zion. Zion is the holy city, a type and figure of the church of God in the world. Zion has a just quarrel with her neighbours for the wrongs they have done her. She has left it to God to plead her cause, and he will do so when the time shall have come.

III. The operations of the war. The sword of the Lord is bathed in heaven, v. 5. It may allude to some custom they had of bathing their swords in some liquor or other, to harden them or brighten them, Ezek. xxi. 9–11. God's sword is bathed in heaven, in his counsel and decree, in his justice and power. It shall come down upon Idumea, the people of God's curse, the people that lie under his curse. God's sword of war is always a sword of justice. Pursuant to the sentence, a terrible slaughter shall be made among them (v. 6). When the day of God's abused mercy and patience is over the sword of his justice gives no quarter. Men have by sin lost the honour of the human nature and made themselves like the beasts that perish; they are therefore killed as beasts, and no more is made of slaying an army of men than of butchering a flock of lambs or goats and feeding on the fat of the kidneys of rams. Nay, the sword of the Lord shall not only dispatch the lambs and goats, the poor common soldiers, but (v. 7) the unicorns too shall be made to come down with them, and the bullocks with the bulls—the great men, and the mighty men, and the chief captains, make as easy a prey as the lambs and the goats. The greatest of men are nothing before the wrath of the great God. Even the mountains, which are hard and rocky, shall be melted with their blood, v. 3. These expressions are hyperbolical and are made use of because they sound very dreadful to sense. This great slaughter will be a great sacrifice to the justice of God (v. 6). Sacrifices were intended for the honour of God, to make it appear that he hates sin and demands satisfaction for it, and that nothing but blood will make atonement. And thus would the whole earth have been soaked with the blood of sinners if Jesus Christ, the great propitiation, had not shed his blood for us. These slain shall be detestable to mankind (v. 3). The effect shall be universal confusion and desolation, as if the whole frame of nature were dissolved and melted down (v. 4). The heavens themselves shall be rolled together as a scroll of parchment when we have done with it, and when it is shrivelled up by the heat of the fire. The stars shall fall as the leaves in autumn; all the beauty, joy, and comfort, of the vanquished nation shall be lost and done away, magistracy and government shall be abolished.

Verses 9–17

This prophecy describes the melancholy changes that are often made by the divine Providence, in countries, cities, palaces, and families. Places that have flourished go to decay. We know not where to find the places where many great towns, celebrated in history, once stood. It describes the judgments which are the just punishment which God will inflict when the year of the redeemed has come, and the year of recompenses for the controversy of Zion. Those that aim to ruin the church can never do that, but will infallibly ruin themselves.

I. The country shall become like the lake of Sodom, v. 9, 10. The streams thereof, that watered the land and refreshed the inhabitants, shall now be turned into pitch, shall be congealed. The dust thereof shall be turned into brimstone; so combustible has sin made their land that it shall take fire at the first spark of God's wrath. It shall burn continually, and shall not be quenched night nor day. The torment of those in hell, or that have a hell within them in their own consciences, is without interruption. As long as there are provoking sinners on earth, from one generation to another, it will be found, how light soever men make of it, that it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

II. The cities shall become like old decayed houses, deserted, being commonly possessed by beasts of prey or birds of ill omen. God shall mark them for ruin and destruction. He shall stretch out upon Bozrah the line of confusion with the stones or plummets of emptiness, v. 11. The confusion and emptiness that shall overspread the face of the whole country shall be like that of the whole earth when it was Tohu and Bohu (the very words here used)—without form and void. Gen. i. 2. Sin will soon turn a paradise into a chaos, and sully the beauty of the whole creation. When there is confusion there will soon be emptiness. Their great men shall be all cut off, and none of them shall dare to appear (v. 12): They shall call the nobles of the kingdom to take care of the arduous affairs which lie before them, but none shall be there.

III. Even the houses of state shall become as wildernesses (v. 13); thorns shall come up, in her palaces, nettles and brambles in the fortresses thereof.

IV. They shall become the residence and rendezvous of fearful beasts and birds. This desolation is much enlarged upon, v. 11. The cormorant shall possess it, or the pelican, which affects to be solitary (Ps. cii. 6); and the bittern, which makes a hideous noise, the owl, a melancholy bird, the raven, a bird of prey, invited by the dead carcases, shall dwell there, all the unclean birds, not for the service of man, v. 13. That which was a court for princes shall now be for owls or ostriches, v. 14. The wild beasts of the desert shall meet with the wild beasts of the island, the wet marshy country. The satyr shall cry to his fellow to go with him to this desert place. There shall the screech-owl rest. The great owl shall there make her nest (v. 15) and lay and hatch. The vultures, which feast on carcases, shall be gathered there, every one with his mate. What a dismal change sin makes; it turns a fruitful land into barrenness, a frequented city into a wilderness.

V. Here is an assurance given of the accomplishment of this prediction (v. 16, 17): Seek you out of the book of the Lord and read. What God's word has appointed his Spirit will effect and bring about, for no word of God shall fall to the ground. There is an exact order and proportion observed: He has cast the lot for these birds and beasts, so that each one shall know his place. They shall not break their ranks, neither shall one thrust another. Jerusalem of old recovered itself out of its ruins, till it gave place to the gospel Jerusalem, which may be brought low, but shall be rebuilt, and shall continue till it give place to the heavenly Jerusalem.

CHAP. XXXV

As after a prediction of God's judgments upon the world (ch. xxiv) followr a promise of great mercy for his church (chap. xxv), so here after a black scene of confusion we have a bright and pleasant one, which, though it foretell the flourishing estate of Hezekiah's kingdom in the latter part of his reign, yet surely looks as far beyond that as the prophecy in the foregoing chapter does beyond the destruction of the Edomites; both were typical of the kingdom of Christ and the kingdom of heaven. The gospel church shall be set up and made to flourish. I. The Gentiles shall be brought into it, ver. 1, 2, 7. II. The wellwishers to it, who were weak and timorous, shall be encouraged, ver. 3, 4. III. Miracles shall be wrought both on the souls and on the bodies of men, ver. 5, 6. IV. The gospel church shall be conducted in the way of holiness, ver. 8, 9. V. It shall be brought at last to endless joys, ver. 10. Thus do we find more of Christ and heaven in this chapter than one would have expected in the Old Testament.

Verses 1–4

I. Here we have a wilderness turned into a good land. When the land of Judah was freed from the Assyrian army the country that had been made a wilderness began to recover and to blossom as the rose. When the Gentile nations, that had been long as a wilderness, bringing forth no fruit to God, received the gospel, joy came with it to them, Ps. lxvii. 3, 4; xcvi. 11, 12. When Christ was preached in Samaria there was great joy in that city (Acts viii. 8). Converting grace makes the soul that was a wilderness to rejoice with joy and singing, and to blossom abundantly. Whatever is valuable in any institution is brought into the gospel. All the beauty of the Jewish church was admitted into the Christian church as the apostle shows in his epistle to the Hebrews. Whatever was desirable in the Mosaic economy is translated into the evangelical institutes.

II. The glory of God shining forth: They shall see the glory of the Lord. God will manifest himself more than ever in his grace and love to mankind. This is that which will make the desert blossom. The more we see by faith of the glory of the Lord the more joyful and the more fruitful shall we be.

III. The feeble and faint-hearted encouraged, v. 3, 4. God's prophets and ministers are charged, by virtue of their office, to strengthen the weak hands, to comfort those who could not yet recover the fright they had been put into by the Assyrian army with an assurance that God would now return in mercy to them. This is the design of the gospel, 1. To strengthen those that are weak and to confirm them. Among true Christians there are many that have weak hands and feeble knees, that are yet but babes in Christ; but it is our duty (Luke xxii. 32), not only to bear with the weak, but to do what we can to confirm them, Rom. xv. 1; 1 Thess. v. 14. It is our duty also to strengthen ourselves (Heb. xii. 12), improving the strength God has given us. 2. To animate those that are timorous and discouraged: Say to those that are of a fearful heart, that are hasty (so the word is), that are for betaking themselves to flight upon the first alarm, that say, in their haste, "We are cut off and undone" (Ps. xxxi. 22), there is enough in the gospel to silence these fears. He that says to us Be strong has laid help for us upon one that is mighty.

IV. Assurance given of the approach of a Saviour: "Your God will come with vengeance. God will appear for you against your enemies, will recompense both their injuries and your losses." Those whose hearts tremble for the ark of God, and who are under a concern for his church in the world, may silence their fears with this, God will take the work into his own hands.

Verses 5–10

"Then, when your God shall come, even Christ, look for great things."

I. Wonders shall be wrought in the kingdoms both of nature and grace. 1. Wonders shall be wrought on men's bodies (v. 5, 6): The eyes of the blind shall be opened; this was often done by our Lord Jesus when he was here upon earth, Matt. ix. 27; xii. 22; xx. 30; John ix. 6. By his power the ears of the deaf also were unstopped, with one word, Ephphatha—Be opened, Mark vii. 34. Many that were lame had the use of their limbs restored, Acts iii. 8. The dumb also were enabled to speak, Matt. ix. 32, 33. These miracles Christ wrought to prove that he was sent of God (John iii. 2), nay, he was God, the same who at first made man's mouth, the hearing ear, and the seeing eye. 2. Wonders, greater wonders, shall be wrought on men's souls. By the word and Spirit of Christ those that were spiritually blind were enlightened (Acts xxvi. 18), those that were deaf to the calls of God were made to hear them readily, as Lydia, whose heart the Lord opened, so that she attended, Acts xvi. 14. Those also that were dumb, and knew not how to speak of God or to God, having their understandings opened to know him, shall thereby have their lips opened to show forth his praise.

II. The Spirit shall be poured out from on high. There shall be waters and streams (v. 6), in the wilderness, where one would least expect it, shall waters break out. This was fulfilled when the Holy Ghost fell upon the Gentiles that heard the word (Acts x. 44). These waters are said to break out, a surprise to the Gentiles, such as brought them, as it were, into a new world. The blessed effect of this shall be that the parched ground shall become a pool, v. 7. In the thirsty land, where no water was, no ordinances (Ps. lxiii. 1), there shall be springs of water, a gospel ministry, the river that makes glad the city of our God, Ps. xlvi. 4. In the habitation of dragons, who chose to dwell in the parched scorched ground (ch. xxxiv. 9, 13), these waters shall flow, and dispossess them, so that, where each lay shall be grass with reeds and rushes. Thus it was when Christian churches were planted, and flourished greatly, in the cities of the Gentiles, which, for many ages, had been habitations of dragons, or devils rather, when they were converted to Christianity, then the habitations of dragons became fruitful fields.

III. The way of religion and godliness is here called the way of holiness (v. 8). "When our God shall come to save us he shall chalk out to us this way by his gospel, so as it had never been before described." It shall be an appointed way; a highway. It is the King's highway, the King of king's highway, in which, though we may be waylaid, we cannot be stopped. The way of holiness is the way of God's commandments; it is the good old way, Jer. vi. 16. The unclean shall not pass over it, either to defile it or to disturb those that walk in it. It shall be for those whom the Lord has set apart for himself (Ps. iv. 3), shall be reserved for them: The redeemed shall walk there out of the reach of molestation from an evil world. The wayfaring men, who choose to travel in it, though fools, of weak capacity in other things, shall have such plain directions from the word and Spirit of God in this way that they shall not err therein; they shall get well to their journey's end. Those that are in the narrow way, though some may fall into one path and others into another, not all equally right, yet all meet at last in the same end. The Spirit of truth shall lead them into all truth that is necessary for them. The way to heaven is a plain way, and easy to hit. It shall be a safe way: No lion shall be there, nor any ravenous beast (v. 9), none to hurt or destroy. Those that keep close to this way keep out of the reach of Satan the roaring lion. Those that walk in the way of holiness may proceed with serenity of mind, knowing that nothing can do them any real hurt. Those that walk in the way of holiness must separate themselves from the unclean and save themselves from an untoward generation. Let them walk with the redeemed who shall walk there.

IV. The end of this way shall be everlasting joy, v. 10. Here is good news for the citizens of Zion. The ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion. God will open to them a door of escape out of their captivity. They shall join themselves to the gospel church, that Mount Zion that city of the living God, Heb. xii. 22. Those that by faith are made citizens of the gospel Zion may go on their way rejoicing (Acts viii. 39). They rejoice in Christ Jesus, and they that mourn are blessed, for they shall be comforted. When God's people returned out of Babylon to Zion they came weeping (Jer. l. 4); but they shall come to heaven singing a new song, which no man can learn, Rev. xiv. 3. Their joy shall be visible, and no longer a secret thing, as it is here in this world; it shall be proclaimed, to the glory of God. Our joyful hopes and prospects of eternal life should swallow up both all the sorrows and all the joys of this present time.

CHAP. XXXVI

The prophet Isaiah is, in this and the three following chapters, an historian. Many of the prophecies of the foregoing chapters had their accomplishment in Sennacherib's invading Judah and besieging Jerusalem, and the miraculous defeat he met with there; and therefore the story is here inserted for the confirmation of the prophecy. The key of prophecy is to be found in history; and here, that we might have the readier entrance, it is, as it were, hung at the door. The exact fulfilling of this prophecy might serve to confirm the faith of God's people in the other prophecies at a greater distance. Whether this story was taken from the book of the Kings and added here, or whether it was first written by Isaiah here and hence taken into the book of Kings, is not material. But the story is the same almost verbatim; 2 Kings xviii and xix, and here, and an abridgment of it likewise, 2 Chron. xxxii. In this chapter we have, I. The descent which the king of Assyria made upon Judah, ver. 1. II. The conference he desired to have with Hezekiah, ver. 2, 3. III. Rabshakeh's blasphemous speech, with which he designed to frighten Hezekiah into submission, ver. 4–10. IV. His appeal to the people, to desert Hezekiah, and so force him to surrender, ver. 11–20. V. The report of this made to Hezekiah by his agents, ver. 21, 22.

Verses 1–10

1. A people may be in the way of their duty and yet meet with trouble and distress. We must not wonder if, when we are doing well, God sends afflictions to quicken us to do better, to do our best, and to press forward towards perfection. The enemies of God's people endeavour to conquer them by frightening them, especially by frightening them from their confidence in God. Thus Rabshakeh here, with noise and banter, runs down Hezekiah as utterly unable to cope with his master. It concerns us therefore, that we may keep our ground against the enemies of our souls, to keep up our spirits by keeping up our hope in God. Those who forsake God's service forfeit his protection. It is an easy thing, and very common, for those that persecute the church and people of God to pretend a commission from him for so doing. Rabshakeh could say, Have I now come up without the Lord? when really he had come up against the Lord, ch. xxxvii. 28.

Verses 11–22

While princes and counsellors have public matters under debate, it is not fair to appeal to the people. It is therefore an unfair practice to incense subjects against their rulers by base insinuations. Proud scorners, the fairer they are spoken to, speak the fouler. Nothing could be said more mildly and respectfully than that which Hezekiah's agents said to Rabshakeh. Speak, we pray thee; but this made him the more spiteful and imperious. When Satan would tempt men from trusting in God, he does so by insinuating that in yielding to him they may better their condition. When the world and the flesh say to us, "Make an agreement with us and come out to us, submit to our dominion and come into our interests, and you shall eat every one of his own vine," they do but deceive us, promising liberty when they would lead us into the basest captivity and slavery. Therefore, when they speak fair, believe them not. Nothing can be more absurd in itself, nor a greater affront to the true and living God, than to compare him with the gods of the heathen. They are nothing; he is the great I AM: they are the creatures of men's fancy and the works of men's hands; he is the Creator of all things. Presumptuous sinners are ready to think that, because they have been too hard for their fellow-creatures, they are therefore a match for their Creator. This and the other nation they have subdued, and therefore the Lord himself shall not deliver Jerusalem out of their hand. But, though the potsherds may strive with the potsherds of the earth, let them not strive with the potter. It is sometimes prudent not to answer a fool according to his folly. Hezekiah's command was, "Answer him not; leave it to God to stop his mouth, for you cannot." Though they answered him not a word, yet they rent their clothes, in zeal for the glory of God's name and indignation at the contempt put upon it.

CHAP. XXXVII

In this chapter we have a further repetition of the story which we had before in the book of Kings concerning Sennacherib. In the foregoing chapter we had him conquering and threatening to conquer. In this chapter we have him falling, and at last fallen, in answer to prayer, and in fulfilment of many of the prophecies which we have met with in the foregoing chapters. I. Hezekiah's pious reception of Rabshakeh's impious discourse, ver. 1. II. The gracious message he sent to Isaiah to desire his prayers, ver. 2–5. III. The encouraging answer which Isaiah sent to him from God, assuring him that God would plead his cause against the king of Assyria, ver. 6, 7. IV. An abusive letter which the king of Assyria sent to Hezekiah, to the same purport with Rabshakeh's speech, ver. 8–13. V. Hezekiah's humble prayer to God upon the receipt of this letter, ver. 14–20. VI. The answer which God sent him by Isaiah, promising him that his affairs should shortly take a happy turn, ver. 21–35. VII. The immediate accomplishment of this prophecy in the ruin of Sennacherib's army (ver. 36) and the murder of himself, ver. 37, 38 (2 Kings xix).

Verses 1–7

The best way to baffle the malicious designs of our enemies against us is to be driven by them to God and to our duty. Rabshakeh intended to frighten Hezekiah from the Lord, but it proves that he frightens him to the Lord. The wind, instead of forcing the traveller's coat from him, makes him wrap it the closer about him. The more Rabshakeh reproaches God the more Hezekiah studies to honour him. Hezekiah sent messengers to Isaiah, to desire his prayers, remembering how much his prophecies had looked towards the events of the present day. This is a day of trouble, therefore let it be a day of prayer. Now that the children are brought to the birth, but there is not strength to bring forth, now let prayer come. When pains are most strong let prayers be most lively. Prayer is the midwife of mercy, that helps to bring it forth. It may be the Lord thy God will hear; who knows but he will return and repent? Rabshakeh has blasphemed God, and therefore let not Hezekiah be afraid of him, v. 6. Judgment will certainly be given against him. Sinners' fears are but prefaces to their falls. He shall hear the rumour of the slaughter of his army, which shall oblige him to retire to his own land, and there he shall be slain, v. 7.

Verses 8–20

God, in his promise, may confirm us in our silently bearing reproaches. God answered Hezekiah, but it does not appear that he sent any answer to Rabshakeh; but quietly left the matter with him. So Rabshakeh returned to the king his master for fresh instructions. Sennacherib, without provocation given to him or warning given by him, went to war against Judah; and now with as little ceremony the king of Ethiopia goes to war against him, v. 9. Those that are quarrelsome may expect to be quarrelled with. It is bad to talk proudly and profanely, but it is worse to write so, for this argues more deliberation and design, and what is written spreads further, lasts longer, and does the more mischief. Great successes often harden sinners' hearts and make them the more daring. The kings of Assyria doubt not but to destroy God's land, because the idolatrous kings of Hamath and Arphad became an easy prey to them therefore the religious reforming king of Judah must needs be so too. Hezekiah took Sennacherib's letter, and spread it before the Lord, not designing to make any complaints against him but those grounded upon his own handwriting. Let the thing speak itself; here it is in black and white: Open thy eyes, O Lord! and see. He encouraged himself with this, that the God of Israel is the Lord of hosts, that he is God alone, the God of all the kingdoms of the earth, for he made heaven and earth, and therefore both can do anything and does everything. When we are afraid of men that are great destroyers we may with humble boldness appeal to God as the great Saviour.

Verses 21–38

Those who receive messages of terror from men with patience, and send messages of faith to God by prayer, may expect messages of grace and peace from God for their comfort. Isaiah sent a long answer to Hezekiah's prayer in God's name by way of return to his prayer: "Whereas thou hast prayed to me, know, for thy comfort, that thy prayer is heard." Those who abuse the people of God affront God himself. Whom hast thou reproached? Even the Holy One of Israel. And it aggravated the indignity Sennacherib did to God that he set his servants on to do the same: By thy servants, the abjects, thou hast reproached me. Those who boast of their own achievements reflect upon God and his providence: "Thou hast said, I have digged, and drunk water; and wilt not own that I have done it," v. 24–26. The most active men are no more than God makes them: "What I have formed of ancient times, in an eternal counsel, now have I brought to pass, that thou shouldst be to lay waste defenced cities; it is therefore intolerable arrogance to make it thy own doing." Sennacherib was active and quick, here, and there, and everywhere, but God knew his going out and coming in, v. 28. And though he was very headstrong and unruly, he could and would turn him back by the way which he came, v. 29. Hitherto he shall come and no further. God had signed Sennacherib's commission against Judah (ch. x. 6); here he supersedes it. Jerusalem shall be defended (v. 35), the siegers shall not come into it, but thall be routed before they begin the siege, v. 33. But this is not all: God will return in mercy to his people. Their land shall be more than ordinarily fruitful, so that their losses shall be abundantly repaired. And let them not think that the desolations of their country would excuse them from observing the sabbatical year, though they had not now their usual stock beforehand for that year, yet they must religiously observe it, and depend upon God to provide for them. There is no standing before the judgments of God when they come with commission. One angel shall, in one night, lay a vast army of men dead upon the spot, when God commissions him so to do, v. 36. The greatest men cannot stand before them: The great king, the king of Assyria, looks very little when he is forced to return with terror and fear, lest the angel that had destroyed his army should destroy him; yet he is made to look less when his own sons, who should have guarded him, sacrificed him to his idol, whose protection he sought, v. 37, 38. He that has delivered does and will deliver.

CHAP. XXXVIII

This chapter proceeds in the history of Hezekiah. I. His sickness, and the sentence of death he received within himself, ver. 1. II. His prayer in his sickness, ver. 2, 3. III. The answer of peace which God gave to that prayer, a sign to confirm his faith herein, the sun should go back ten degrees, ver. 4–8. And this we read before, 2 Kings xx 1 &c. But, IV. Here is Hezekiah's thanksgiving for his recovery, which we had not before, ver. 9–20. To which are added the means used, ver. 21, 22. This is a chapter which will encourage those that are confined by sickness.

Verses 1–8

Neither men's greatness nor their goodness will exempt them from the arrests of sickness and death. Hezekiah, a potentate on earth and a favourite of Heaven, is struck with a disease, which, without a miracle, will certainly be mortal; and this in the midst of his days and usefulness. This sickness seized him in the midst of his triumphs over the ruined army of the Assyrians. Our being ready for death will make it come never the sooner, but much the easier; and those that are fit to die are most fit to live. Is any afflicted with sickness? Let him pray, James v. 13. Prayer is a salve for every sore, personal or public. Afflictions bring us to our Bibles and to our knees. When Hezekiah was in health he went up to the house of the Lord to pray. When he was sick in bed he turned his face towards the wall, probably towards the temple. The testimony of our consciences that by the grace of God we have walked closely and humbly with God, will be a great comfort to us when we come to look death in the face. And though we may not depend upon it as our righteousness, by which to be justified before God, yet we may humbly plead it as an evidence of our interest in the righteousness of the Mediator. Hezekiah does not demand a reward from God for his good services, but modestly begs that God would remember how he had approved himself to God with a single eye and an honest heart: I have walked before thee in truth and sincerity, and with a perfect, that is, an upright, heart; for uprightness is our gospel perfection. The same prophet that was sent to Hezekiah with warning to prepare for death is sent to him with a promise that he shall not only recover, but be restored to a confirmed state of health and live fifteen years yet. When we pray in our sickness, though God send not to us such an answer, as he here sent to Hezekiah, yet, if by his Spirit he bids us be of good cheer, assures us that our sins are forgiven us, that his grace shall be sufficient for us, and that, whether we live or die, we shall be his, we have no reason to say that we pray in vain. God answers us if he strengthens us with strength in our souls, though not with bodily strength, Ps. cxxxviii. 3. God, knowing what lay near Hezekiah's heart, promised him not only that he should live, but that he should see the good of Jerusalem all the days of his life (Ps. cxxviii. 5). Jerusalem, now delivered, shall still be defended from the Assyrians. God had given Hezekiah repeated assurances of his favour; and yet, as if all were thought too little, a sign is given him. The sign was the going back of the shadow upon the sundial. The sun is a faithful measurer of time, and he that set that clock going can set it back when he pleases, for the Father of all lights is the director of them.

Verses 9–22

Hezekiah's thanksgiving-song, which he penned, by divine direction, after his recovery. He might have taken some of the psalms of his father David, but the occasion was extraordinary, and, his heart being full of devout affections, he would offer up his affections in his own words. It is good to write a memorial of the affliction, and of the frame of our hearts under it,—to keep a record of the thoughts we had of things when we were sick, a thanksgiving to God. It is an excellent writing which Hezekiah here left, upon his recovery; and yet we find (2 Chron. xxxii. 25) that he rendered not again according to the benefit done to him. The impressions, one would think, should never have worn off, and yet, it seems, they did. Thanksgiving is good, but thanksliving is better. Now in this writing, when his disease prevailed, and his despair of recovery, v. 10–13:

I. He tells us what his thoughts were of himself when he gave up himself for gone. We ought not to make the worst of our case, nor to think that every sick man must needs be a dead man presently. He that brings low can raise up. Thus David sometimes, when he was delivered out of trouble, reflected upon the black and melancholy conclusions he had made upon his own case when he was in trouble, and what he had then said in his haste, as Ps. xxxi. 22; lxxvii. 7–9. Hezekiah was now about thirty-nine years of age, with a fair prospect of many years and happy ones. This distemper that suddenly seized him he concluded would be the cutting off of his days, that he should now be deprived of the residue of his years, and with them he should be deprived not only of the comforts of life, but of all the opportunities he had of serving God and his generation. To the same purport (v. 12), "My age has departed and gone, and is removed from me as a shepherd's tent, out of which I am forcibly dislodged by the pulling of it down in an instant." Our present residence is but like that of a shepherd in his tent, a poor, mean, and cold lodging, which will easily be taken down. But it is only the removal of it to another world, where the tents of Kedar that are taken down, coarse, black, and weather-beaten, shall be set up again in the New Jerusalem, comely as the curtains of Solomon. He adds another similitude: I have cut off, like a weaver, my life. Not that he did by any act of his own cut off the thread of his life; but, being told that he must needs die, he was forced to cut off all his projects, his purposes were broken off, even the thoughts of his heart, as Job's were, ch. xvii. 11. Our days are compared to the weaver's shuttle (Job. vii. 6), passing and repassing very swiftly, every throw leaving a thread behind it; and, when they are finished, the thread is cut off, and the piece taken out of the loom, and shown to our Master, to be judged of whether it be well woven or no, that we may receive according to the things done in the body. But as the weaver, when he has cut off his threads, has done his work, so a good man, when his life is cut off, his cares are cut off with it, and he rests from his labours. "But did I say, I have cut off my life? No, my times are not in my own hand; they are in God's hand, and it is he that will cut me off from the thrum (so the margin reads it); he has appointed what shall be the length of the piece, and, when it comes to that length, he will cut it off." He reckoned that he should go to the gates of the grave—the gates of which are always open; for it is still crying, Give, give. He reckoned that he was deprived of worshipping God and doing good in the world (v. 11): "I said, I shall not see the Lord, as he manifests himself in his temple, even the Lord here in the land of the living." "I shall see man no more." He shall see his subjects no more, whom he may relieve, shall see his friends no more. He reckoned that the agonies of death would be very sharp and severe: "He will cut me off with pining sickness, which will waste me, and wear me off, quickly." He concluded that God, whose servants all diseases are, would by them, as a lion, break all his bones with grinding pain, v. 13. He thought that next morning was the utmost he could expect to live in such pain and misery. From day even to night wilt thou make an end of me. When we are sick we are very apt to be thus calculating our time, but after all, we are still at uncertainty. It should be more our care how we shall get safely to another world than how long we are likely to live in this world.

II. The complaints he made in this condition (v. 14): "Like a crane, or swallow, so did I chatter; I made a noise as those birds do when they are frightened." What a change sickness makes in a little time. Some think he refers to his praying in his affliction; it was so interrupted with groanings that it was more like the chattering of a crane or a swallow. Such mean thoughts had he of his own prayers, which yet were acceptable to God. He mourned like a dove, sadly, but silently and patiently. He had found God so ready to answer his prayers at other times, but now his eyes failed, and therefore he prays, "I am oppressed, and ready to sink; Lord, undertake for me. Come between me and the gates of the grave, to which I am ready to be hurried." When we receive the sentence of death within ourselves, we are undone if the divine grace do not undertake to carry us through the valley of the shadow of death, to the heavenly kingdom on the other side of it—if Christ do not do all we need, and cannot do for ourselves.

III. The grateful acknowledgment he makes of God's goodness to him in his recovery. "What shall I say? He has spoken unto me; he has sent his prophet to tell me that I shall recover and live fifteen years yet; and he himself has done it: it is as sure to be done as if it were done already, for no word of his shall fall to the ground." God having spoken it, he is sure of it (v. 16): Thou wilt restore me, and make me to live. I will go softly all my years in the bitterness of my soul, as one in sorrow for my murmurings under my affliction. When God has delivered me I will walk cheerfully with him, as having tasted that he is gracious. He will encourage himself and others with the experiences he had had of the goodness of God (v. 16): "By these things which thou hast done for me they live; by the same power and goodness that have restored me all men have their souls held in life. In all these things is the life of my spirit, maintained by what God has done for the preservation of my natural life." He was raised up from great extremity (v. 17): Behold, for peace I had great bitterness. Upon the defeat of Sennacherib, he was suddenly seized with sickness, which embittered him, and it seemed to be the bitterness of death itself—bitterness, bitterness, nothing but gall and wormwood. This was his condition when God sent him relief. It came from the love of God, from love to his soul. He delivered me because he delighted in me (Ps. xviii. 19); and the word here signifies a very affectionate love: Thou hast loved my soul from the pit of corruption; so it runs in the original. This is applicable to our redemption by Christ: In his love and in his pity he redeemed us. And the preservation of our bodies is doubly comfortable when it is in love to our souls—when God repairs the house because he has a kindness for the inhabitant. It was the effect of the pardon of sin: "For thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back, and thereby hast delivered my soul from the pit of corruption, in love to it." When we set them before our face in true repentance, as David did when his sin was ever before him, God casts them behind his back. If this sickness had been his death, it would have put a period to that course of service for the glory of God and the good of the church which he was now pursuing, v. 18. Having recovered from it, he resolves not only to proceed, but to abound, in praising and serving God (v. 19): The living, the living, he shall praise thee. We should not only praise him all the days of our life, but the father to the children should make known his truth, that the ages to come may give God the glory of his truth by trusting to it. Hezekiah, doubtless, did this himself, and yet Manasseh his son walked not in his steps. Parents may give their children many good things, good instructions, good examples, good books, but they cannot give them grace.

IV. In the last two verses of this chapter observe two lessons: 1. That God's promises are intended not to supersede, but to quicken and encourage, the use of means. Hezekiah is sure to recover, and yet he must take a lump of figs and lay it on the boil, v. 21. We must not put physicians, or physic, in the place of God, but make use of them in subordination to God and to his providence; help thyself and God will help thee. 2. That the chief end we should aim at, in desiring life and health, is that we may glorify God, and do good, and improve ourselves in knowledge and grace. Hezekiah, when he meant, What is the sign that I shall recover? asked, What is the sign that I shall go up to the house of the Lord, there to honour God? (v. 22).

CHAP. XXXIX

The story of this chapter likewise we had before, 2 Kings xx. 12, &c. It is here repeated, not only as a very memorable passage, but because it concludes with a prophecy of the captivity in Babylon; and as the former part of the prophecy of this book frequently referred to Sennacherib's invasion, so the latter part of this book speaks much of the Jews' captivity in Babylon and their deliverance. We have here, I. The pride and folly of Hezekiah, in showing his treasures to the king of Babylon's ambassadors that were sent to congratulate him on his recovery, ver. 1, 2. II. Isaiah's examination of him concerning it, and his confession, ver. 3, 4. III. The sentence passed upon him for it, that all his treasures should, in process of time, be carried to Babylon, ver. 5–7. IV. Hezekiah's penitent and patient submission to this sentence, ver. 8.

Verses 1–4

Humanity and common civility teach us to rejoice with our friends and neighbours when they rejoice, particularly on their recoveries from sickness. The king of Babylon, having heard that Hezekiah had recovered, sent to compliment him. The sun was the Babylonians' god; and when they understood that it was with a respect to Hezekiah that the sun went back ten degrees, on such a day, they thought themselves obliged to do Hezekiah all the honour they could. The king of Babylon made his court to Hezekiah, not because he was pious, but because he was prosperous, as the Philistines coveted an alliance with Isaac, Gen. xxvi. 28. The king of Babylon was an enemy to the king of Assyria, and therefore was fond of Hezekiah, because the Assyrians were so weakened by the power of his God. Hezekiah was a wise and good man, but, when one miracle after another was wrought in his favour, he found it hard to keep his heart from being lifted up into the snare of pride. What a poor thing it was for Hezekiah, whom God had so dignified, to be over proud of the respect paid him by a heathen prince as if that added anything to him! As far as we see cause to suspect that this sly and subtle sin of pride has insinuated itself into our breasts, let us be ashamed of it, as Hezekiah here.

Verses 5–8

If God love us, he will humble us. A mortifying message is sent to Hezekiah, that he might be humbled for the pride of his heart, and be convinced of the folly of it. When Hezekiah boasts of his treasures he is told that he acts like the foolish traveller who shows his money and gold to one that proves a thief and is thereby tempted to rob him. If Hezekiah had known that the successors of this king of Babylon would hereafter be the ruin of his family and kingdom, he would not have complimented his ambassadors as he did; and, when the prophet told him that it would be so, we may well imagine how he was vexed at himself for what he had done. Those that are fond of an alliance with irreligious men will have enough of it, and will have cause to repent it. Hezekiah thought himself very happy in the friendship of Babylon, though it was the mother of harlots and idolatries; but Babylon, who now courted Jerusalem, in process of time conquered her and carried her captive. Hezekiah reckoned that word of the Lord good which made him sensible that he had done amiss. When Hezekiah told of the punishment of his iniquity he said, Good is the word of the Lord.

CHAP. XL

At this chapter begins the latter part of the prophecy of this book, which is not only divided from the former by the historical chapters that come between, but distinguished from it in scope and style. This is all one continued discourse, and the prophet not so much as once named. That consisted of many burdens, many woes; this consists of many blessings. The distress which the people of God were in by the Assyrians is here spoken of as a thing past, ch. liii. 4.; and the captivity in Babylon, and their deliverance out of that, much greater events, are here largely foretold. Before God sent his people into captivity he furnished them with precious promises for their support in their trouble; and we may well imagine how much it helped to dry up their tears by the rivers of Babylon. But it looks further and to greater things; much of Christ and gospel grace. As if it were designed for a prophetic summary of the New Testament, it begins with that which begins the gospels, "The voice of one crying in the wilderness" (ch. xl. 3), and concludes with that which concludes the book of the Revelation, "The new heavens and the new earth", ch. lxvi. 22. While the prophet is speaking of redemption of the Jews he had in his thoughts a more glorious deliverance.

In this chapter we have, I. Orders given to preach and publish the glad tidings of redemption, ver. 1, 2. II. These glad tidings introduced by a voice in the wilderness, which gives assurance that all obstruction shall be removed (ver. 3–5), and that the word of God shall be established and accomplished, ver. 6–8. III. A joyful prospect given to the people of God of this redemption, ver. 9–11. IV. The sovereignty and power of God magnified, ver. 12–17. V. Idols therefore triumphed over and idolaters upbraided with their folly, ver. 18–26. VI. A reproof given to the people of God for their fears, ver. 27–31.

The commission and instructions given, not to this prophet only, but to all the Lord's prophets, and to all Christ's ministers, to proclaim comfort to God's people. Let them be sure that, notwithstanding all this, God had mercy in store for them. It was especially a direction to the prophets that should live in the time of the captivity, when Jerusalem was in ruins; they must encourage the captives to hope. Gospel ministers, being employed by the blessed Spirit as comforters, and as helpers of the joy of Christians, are here put in mind of their business.

I. Comfortable words directed to God's people in general, v. 1. The prophets have instructions from their God to comfort the people of God. There are a people in the world that are God's people. It is the will of God that his people should be a comforted people, even in the worst of times. Words of conviction, such as we had in the former part of this book, must be followed with words of comfort, such as we have here; for he that has torn will heal us.

II. Comfortable words directed to Jerusalem in particular: "Speak to the heart of Jerusalem (v. 2). Do not whisper it, but cry unto her: show saints their comforts as well as sinners their transgressions; make her hear it." Her warfare is accomplished, the set time of her servitude; the campaign is now at an end. Human life is a warfare (Job vii. 1); the Christian life much more. But the struggle will not last always; the warfare will be accomplished, and then the good soldiers shall not only enter into rest, but be sure of their pay. The cause of her trouble is removed, and, when that is taken away, the effect will cease. Tell her that her iniquity is pardoned, God is reconciled to her. Nothing can be spoken more comfortably than this, Son, be of good cheer; thy sins are forgiven thee. Troubles are then removed in love when sin is pardoned. She has received of the Lord double for the cure of all her sins, more than sufficient to separate between her and her idols, the worship of which was the great sin from which God designed to reclaim them by their captivity in Babylon. It begat in them a rooted antipathy to idolatry, and was physic doubly strong for the purging out of that iniquity. True penitents have indeed, in Christ and his sufferings, received of the Lord's hand double for all their sins; for the satisfaction Christ made by his death was of such an infinite value that it was more than double to the demerits of sin; for God spared not his own Son.

Verses 3–8

The time to favour Zion having come, the people of God must be prepared, by repentance and faith, for the favours designed them. We have here the voice of one crying in the wilderness, which may be applied to those prophets, with the captives who, when they saw the day of their deliverance dawn, called earnestly upon them to prepare for it. But it must be applied to John the Baptist; for, though God was the speaker, he was the voice of one crying in the wilderness to prepare the way of the Lord, to dispose men's minds for the reception of the gospel of Christ.

I. By repentance for sin; which John Baptist preached to all Judah and Jerusalem (Matt. iii. 2, 5), and thereby made ready a people prepared for the Lord, Luke i. 17. God is coming in a way of mercy, and we must prepare for him, v. 3–5. If we apply it to their captivity, it may be taken as a promise that, whatever difficulties lie in their way, when they return they shall be removed. This voice in the wilderness sets pioneers on work to level the roads. It is the same duty that we are called to, in preparation for Christ's entrance into our souls. We must get into such a frame of spirit as will dispose us to receive Christ and his gospel: "Prepare you the way of the Lord; and let all be suppressed which would be an obstruction to his entrance. Make room for Christ: Make straight a highway for him." Those that are hindered from comfort in Christ by their dejections and despondencies are the valleys that must be exalted. Those that are hindered from comfort in Christ by a proud conceit are the mountains and hills that must be made low. Those that have entertained prejudices against the word and ways of God, that are untractable, are the crooked that must be made straight. When this is done the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, v. 5. When the captives are prepared for deliverance Cyrus shall proclaim it. When John Baptist has for some time preached repentance, and so made ready a people prepared for the Lord (Luke i. 17), then the Messiah himself shall be revealed in his glory, working miracles, and by his grace binding up and healing with consolations those whom John had wounded with convictions. And this revelation of divine glory shall be a light to lighten the Gentiles. All flesh shall see it together, and not the Jews only, as the return out of captivity was taken notice of by the neighbouring nations, Ps. cxxvi. 2.

II. By confidence in the word of the Lord, and not in any creature. By this accomplishment of the prophecies and promises of salvation, it appears that the word of the Lord is sure. The power of man, when it does appear against the deliverance, is not to be feared; for it shall be as grass before the word of the Lord: it shall wither and be trodden down. The insulting Babylonians are but as grass. The power of man, when it would appear for the deliverance, is not to be trusted, for it is but as grass. When God is about to work salvation for his people he will take them off from depending upon creatures, and looking for it from hills and mountains. The word of our God, that glory of the Lord which is now to be revealed, the gospel, and that grace which is brought with it to us and wrought by it in us, shall stand for ever. To prepare the way of the Lord we must be convinced that all flesh is grass, weak and withering. We ourselves therefore cannot save ourselves. All the beauty of the creature is but as the flower of grass. We must be convinced that the word of the Lord will furnish us with a happiness that will run parallel with the duration of our souls, which must live for ever.

Verses 9–11

It was promised (v. 5) that the glory of the Lord shall be revealed.

I. How it shall be revealed, v. 9. Notice shall be given of it to the remnant that are left in Zion and Jerusalem, the poor of the land, who were vine-dressers and husbandmen; it shall be told them that their brethren shall return to them. This shall be told also to the captives who belonged to Zion and Jerusalem. Zion is said to dwell with the daughter of Babylon (Zech ii. 7); and there she receives notice of Cyrus's gracious proclamation. It shall be published by Zion and Jerusalem (so the text reads it); those that remain there, or that have already returned, let them proclaim it as loudly as they can: let them lift up their voice with strength. Let them say to the cities of Judah, and all the inhabitants of the country, Behold your God. This is our God, we have waited for him. This may refer to the invitation which was sent forth from Jerusalem to the cities of Judah, as soon as they had set up an altar, immediately upon their return out of captivity, to come and join with them in their sacrifices, Ezra iii. 2–4. But this was to have its full accomplishment in the apostles' public and undaunted preaching of the gospel to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem.

II. What that glory is which shall be revealed. He will come with strong hand, too strong to be obstructed though it may be opposed. He shall recompense to all according to their works, as a righteous Judge: His reward is with him. His work is before him. He himself knows what he will do. God is the Shepherd of Israel (Ps. lxxx. 1); Christ is the good Shepherd, John x. 11. He shall feed his flock like a shepherd. His word is food for his flock to feed on; his ordinances are fields for them to feed in; his ministers are under-shepherds. He takes care of the lambs that are weak, and cannot help themselves and those that are with young. The good Shepherd has a tender care for children, for young converts, for weak believers, and those that are of a sorrowful spirit. These are the lambs of his flock. He will gather them in when they wander, gather them up when they fall, gather them together when they are dispersed, and gather them home to himself at last; and all this with his own arm, out of which none shall be able to pluck them, John x. 28. He will gently lead them.

Verses 12–17

These verses describe the greatness and glory of the Lord Jehovah, God of Israel, and were written to encourage his people that were captives in Babylon to hope, and depend upon him for deliverance, and to fill those who receive the glad tidings of redemption by Christ with a holy awe and reverence of God.

I. His power is unlimited, v. 12. 1. He has a vast reach. View the celestial globe, but the great God metes the heavens with a span. All the waters in the world he can measure in the hollow of his hand, and he comprehends the dust of the earth in a measure, or with his three fingers; it is no more to him that a pugil, or that which we take up between our thumb and two fingers. 2. He has a vast strength, and can as easily move mountains as the tradesman heaves his good into the scales; he poises them with his hand as exactly as if he weighed them in a pair of balances.

II. His wisdom is unsearchable, v. 13, 14. As none can do what God has done, so none can suggest anything to him which he thought not of. When the Lord made the world (Job xxvi. 13) there was none that gave him any advice. Nor does he need any counsellor to direct him in the government of the world.

III. The nations of the world are nothing in comparison, v. 15, 17. Take all the great and mighty nations, kings the most pompous, kingdoms the most populous; take the isles, the multitude of the isles of the Gentiles: Before him they are as a drop of the bucket compared with the vast ocean, or the small dust of the balance (which does not serve to turn it, and therefore is not regarded, it is so small) in comparison with all the dust of the earth. He takes them up as a very little thing. They are counted by him, and are to be counted by us less than nothing, and vanity. He can as easily bring them all into nothing as at first he brought them out of nothing. They are all vanity; the word used for the chaos (Gen. i. 2). This magnifies God's love to the world, that, though it is of such small account with him, yet, for the redemption of it, he gave his only-begotten Son, John iii. 16.

IV. The services of the church can make no addition to him (v. 16): Lebanon is not sufficient to burn for the fuel of the altar, nor the beasts of it for sacrifices, v. 16. He is exalted far above all blessing and praise, all burnt-offerings and sacrifices.

The prophet here reproves those, 1. Who made images and then said that they resembled God, and paid their homage to them. 2. Who put creatures in the place of God, who feared them more than God, or loved them more than God. Twice the challenge is here made, To whom will you liken God? v. 18, and again v. 25. To whom will you liken me? This shows the absurdity, (1) Of making visible images of him who is invisible, imagining the image to be animated by the deity. (2) Of making creatures equal with God in our affections. Proud people make themselves equal with God; covetous people make their money equal with God; and whatever we esteem or love, fear or hope in, more than God, that creature we equal with God, which is the highest affront imaginable. Now, to show the absurdity of this,

I. The prophet describes idols as worthy of the greatest contempt (v. 19, 20): "Look upon the better sort of them, made of some base metal, cast into what shape the founder pleases, and gilded, or overlaid with plates of gold, that it may pass for a golden image. It is a creature; for the workman made it; therefore it is not God, Hos. viii. 6. It is a cheat; for it is gold on the outside, but within it is lead or copper, in this representing the deities, that they were not what they seemed to be. He that is so impoverished that he has scarcely a sacrifice to offer to his god when he has made him, though he cannot procure one of brass or stone, he will have a wooden one rather than none, and chooses a tree that will not soon rot, and of that he will have his graven image made. The better sort have silver chains to fix theirs with; and, though it be but a wooden image, care is taken that it shall not be moved." How these idolaters shame their own reason, in dreaming that gods of their own making (Nehushtans, pieces of brass or logs of wood) should be able to do them any kindness! See how these idolaters shame us, who worship the only living and true God. They spared no cost upon their idols; we grudge that as waste which is spent in the service of our God.

II. He describes God as infinitely great, and worthy of the highest veneration. To prove the greatness of God he appeals,

1. To what they had heard of him by the hearing of the ear (v. 21): "Have you not known by the very light of nature? Has it not been told you by your fathers and teachers, according to the constant tradition received from their ancestors and predecessors, even from the beginning? Have you not understood it as always acknowledged from the foundation of the earth, that God is a great God, and a great King above all gods?" The invisible things of God are clearly seen from the creation of the world, Rom. i. 20. Thou mayest not only ask thy father, and thy elders (Deut. xxxii. 7); but ask those that go by the way (Job xxi. 29), ask the first man you meet. God has the command of all the creatures. The heaven and the earth themselves are under his management: He sits upon the circle, or globe, of the earth, v. 22. He is still stretching out the heavens, and will do so till the day comes that they shall be rolled together like a scroll. He spreads them out as easily as we draw a curtain, opening these curtains in the morning and drawing them close again at night. And the heaven is to this earth as a tent to dwell in; it is a canopy drawn over our heads. The numerous inhabitants of this earth are in his eye as grasshoppers in ours, so little and so easily crushed. If the spies thought themselves grasshoppers before the sons of Anak (Num. xiii. 33), what are we before the great God? Grasshoppers live but awhile, and live carelessly, not like the ant; so do the most of men. Those who act against him will certainly be brought down by the mighty hand of God, v. 23, 24. They shall not be planted; they shall not be sown; and those are the two ways of propagating plants, either by seed or slips. If they should so be planted or sown, yet their stock shall not take root in the earth, they shall not continue long in power.

2. He appeals to what their eyes saw of him (v. 26): "Lift up your eyes on high; be not always poring on this earth, but sometimes look up, behold the glorious lights of heaven, consider who has created them." What we see of the creature should lead us to the Creator. The idolaters, when they beheld the hosts of heaven, looked no further, but worshipped them, Deut. iv. 19. The Creator brings out their host by number, as a general draws out the squadrons and battalions of his army; he calls them all by names (Ps. cxlvii. 4); and by the greatness of his might, not one of them fails, but everyone does that to which he is appointed.

Verses 27–31

I. The prophet reproves the people of God, captives in Babylon for their unbelief and distrust of God (v. 27): "Why sayest thou, O Jacob! to thyself and to those about thee, My way is hidden from the Lord?" 1. The titles he here gives them were enough to shame them out of their distrusts: O Jacob! O Israel! They bore these names—as God's professing people, a people in covenant with him. 2. The way of reproving them is by reasoning with them. Many of our foolish fears would vanish before a strict enquiry into the causes of them. 3. They spoke of God, as if he had cast them off. 4. The ill word they said was a word of despair concerning their present condition. They were ready to conclude, (1) That God would not heed them: My way is hidden from the Lord. There are such difficulties in our case that even divine wisdom and power will be nonplussed. (2) That God could not help them: "My judgment is passed over from my God; my case is past relief, so far past it that God himself cannot redress the grievances of it."

II. He reminds them of that which was sufficient to silence all those fears and distrusts. For the conviction of idolaters (v. 21), he appeals to what they had known. Jacob and Israel were a knowing people and their knowledge came by hearing. Among other things, they had heard that God had spoken once, twice, yea, many a time they had heard it, That power belongs unto God (Ps. lxii. 11).

1. He is himself an almighty God. He must needs be so, for he is the everlasting God, and therefore with him there is no decay. He is without beginning or end and therefore with him there is no change. He is also the Creator of the ends of the earth and therefore is the rightful ruler of all, and is able to save his church as he was at first to make the world. There is no searching out of his understanding, so as to defeat its intentions. None can say, "Thus far God's wisdom can go, and no further." He faints not, nor is weary; he upholds the whole creation, and governs all the creatures, and has power to relieve his church, when it is brought low.

2. He gives strength to his people, and helps them to help themselves. He that is the strong God is the strength of Israel. (1) He can help the weak, v. 29. (2) He will help the willing, will help those who, in a humble dependence upon him, help themselves, and will do well for those who do their best, v. 30, 31. The youths and the young men are strong, but are apt to think themselves stronger than they are. And they shall faint and be weary, shall utterly fail in their conflicts, and under their burdens; they shall soon be made to see the folly of trusting to themselves. But those that wait on the Lord, and by faith rely upon him and commit themselves to his guidance, shall find that God will not fail them. They shall have grace sufficient for them: They shall renew their strength. God will be their arm every morning, ch. xxxiii. 2. They shall use this grace for the best purposes. They shall soar upward, upward towards God. Devout affections are the eagles' wings on which gracious souls mount up, Ps. xxv. 1. They shall press forward, forward towards heaven. They shall walk, they shall run, the way of God's commandments, cheerfully and with alacrity.

CHAP. XLI

This chapter is intended both for the conviction of idolaters and for the consolation of all God's faithful worshippers. And however this might be primarily intended for the conviction of Babylonians, and the comfort of Israelites, doubtless it was intended both for admonition and encouragement to us. I. God by the prophet shows the folly of those that worshipped idols, ver. 1–9. II He encourages his faithful ones to trust in him, ver. 10–20. III. He challenges the idols, ver. 21–29. So that the chapter may be summed up in those words of Elijah, "If Jehovah be God, then follow him; but, if Baal be God, then follow him."

Verses 1–9

God's care for his people Israel in raising up Cyrus to be their deliverer is a proof of his sovereignty above all idols and of his power to protect his people.

I. A general challenge to the worshippers of idols, v. 1. It is renewed (v. 21): Produce your cause. The court is set, summonses are sent to the islands. Silence (as usual) is proclaimed while the cause is in trying: "Keep silence before me, and judge nothing before the time." The defenders of idolatry are called to say what they can in defence of it: "Let them renew their strength, in opposition to God. Let them come near; in vindication and honour of their idols, let them speak freely: Let us come near together to judgment."

II. He particularly challenges the idols to do that for their worshippers, which he had done and would do for his worshippers.

1. That which is to be proved is, (1) That the Lord is God alone, the first and with the last (v. 4), that he is infinite, eternal, and unchangeable, that he governed the world from the beginning, and will to the end of time. (2) That Israel is his servant (v. 8), whom he protects, and employs, and in whom he is and will be glorified.

2. To prove this he shows,

(1) That it was he who called Abraham, the father of this despised nation, out of an idolatrous country. He is the righteous man whom God raised up from the east. Of him the Chaldee paraphrast expressly understands it: Who brought Abraham publicly from the east? To maintain the honour of the people of Israel, it was very proper to point to this great ancestor of theirs; and (v. 8) God calls Israel the seed of Abraham my friend. Also to put contempt upon the Chaldean idolatry, it was proper to show how Abraham was called from serving other gods (Joshua. xxiv. 2, 3, &c.). Also, to encourage the captives in Babylon to hope that God would find a way for their return to their own land, it was proper to remind them how he brought their father Abraham out of the same country into this land, to give it to him for an inheritance, Gen. xv. 7. He was a righteous man, that believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness; and so he became the father of all those who by faith in Christ are made the righteousness of God through him, Rom. iv. 3, 11; 2 Cor. v. 21; Gen. xviii. 19. God raised him up from the east, from Ur first and afterwards from Haran, which lay east from Canaan. He raised him out of iniquity and made him pious, out of obscurity and made him famous. He called him to his foot, to follow him with an implicit faith; for he went out not knowing whither he went, but whom he followed, Heb. xi. 8. We must all either come to his foot or be made his footstool. He gave nations before him, the nations of Canaan, and the Hittites acknowledged him a mighty prince, Gen. xxiii. 6. He made him rule over those kings whom he conquered for the rescue of his brother Lot, Gen. xiv. And when God gave them as dust to his sword, and as driven stubble to his bow, he then pursued them, and passed safely, or in peace, under the divine protection.

(2) That it is he who will, ere long, raise up Cyrus from the east. It is spoken of as a thing past, as if it were already done. God will raise him up in righteousness (so it may be read, ch. xlv. 13), will call him to his foot, make what use of him he pleases, and make him victorious over the nations that oppose his coming to the crown. He shall be a type of Christ, who is righteousness itself, whom God will, in the fulness of time, raise up and make victorious over the powers of darkness.

III. He exposes the folly of idolaters, who obstinately persisted in their idolatry (v. 5): The isles of the Gentiles saw this, not only what God did for Abraham himself, but what he did for his seed, how he brought them out of Egypt, and made them rule over kings, and they feared, Exod. xv. 14–16. They were afraid, drew near, and came; but, instead of helping to reason one another out of their sottish idolatries, they helped to confirm one another in them, v. 6, 7. They said one to another, Be of good courage; let us unanimously agree to keep up the reputation of our gods. One tradesman encourages another to come into a confederacy for the keeping up of the noble craft of god-making. They not only had recourse to their old gods for protection, but made new ones, Deut. xxxii. 17. So the carpenter, having done his part to the timber-work, encouraged the goldsmith to do his part in gilding or overlaying it; and, when it came into the goldsmith's hand, he that smooths with the hammer, that polishes it, or beats it thin, quickened him that smote the anvil, and told him it was ready for the soldering, which perhaps was the last operation about it, and then it is fastened with nails, and you have a god of it.

IV. He encourages his own people to trust in him (v. 8, 9): But thou, Israel, art my servant. "Idolaters put themselves under the protection of these impotent deities. Those that make them are like unto them, and so is every one that trusts in them; but thou, O Israel! art the servant of a better Master." They are God's servants. He has chosen them to be a peculiar people to himself. They were the seed of Abraham his friend. It was the honour of Abraham that he was called the friend of God (James ii. 23). And for the father's sake the people of Israel were beloved. He had not yet cast them away, though they had often provoked him, and therefore he would not now abandon them.

Verses 10–20

The scope of these verses is to silence the fears, and encourage the faith, of the servants of God in their distresses. Perhaps it is intended, in the first place, for the support of God's Israel, in captivity;

but all that faithfully serve God through patience and comfort of this scripture may have hope. A word of caution, counsel, and comfort, which is so often repeated, Fear thou not; and again (v. 13), Fear not; and (v. 14). It is against the mind of God that his people should be a timorous people.

I. They may depend upon his presence with them as their God. "I will hold thy right hand, go hand in hand with thee" (so some); as their guide. When we are weak he will hold us up, will encourage us, and so hold us by the right hand, Ps. lxxiii. 23. He will silence fears: Saying unto thee, Fear not. He has said it again and again in his word, but he will go further; he will by his Spirit say it to their hearts.

II. Though their enemies be now very formidable, yet the day is coming when God will reckon with them. There are those that are incensed against God's people, that strive with them (v. 11), that war against them (v. 12), that hate them. But let God's people wait God's time. They shall be convinced of the folly of striving with God's people. They shall be ashamed and confounded, which might bring them to repentance, but will rather fill them with rage. They shall be ruined and undone (v. 11): They shall be as nothing before the justice and power of God. This is repeated (v. 12).

III. They themselves should become a terror to those who were now a terror to them, and victory should turn on their side, v. 14–16. Jacob and Israel are reduced and brought very low. It is the worm Jacob, so little, so weak, and so defenceless, trampled on by everybody, forced to creep even into the earth for safety. Jacob's King calls himself a worm and no man, Ps. xxii. 6. God's people are sometimes as worms, but not vipers, as their enemies are, not of the serpent's seed. God regards Jacob's low estate, and says, "Fear not, thou worm Jacob; fear not that thou shalt be crushed; and you men of Israel" (you few men, so some read it, you dead men, so others), "do not give up yourselves for gone." By whom shall Jacob arise, for he is small? We are here told: I will help thee, saith the Lord; and it is the honour of God to help the weak. The Lord will help them by enabling them to help themselves and making Jacob to become a threshing instrument. Observe, He is but an instrument, a tool in God's hand. But, if God make him a threshing instrument, he will make him fit for use, new and sharp, and having teeth, or sharp spikes; and then, by divine direction and strength, thou shalt thresh the mountains, the highest, and strongest, and most stubborn of thy enemies. He pursues the metaphor, v. 16. Having threshed them, thou shalt winnow them, and the wind shall scatter them. This had its accomplishment, in part, in the victories of the Jews in the times of the Maccabees; but it seems designed to read the final doom of all the implacable enemies of the church of God in the triumphs of the cross of Christ over the powers of darkness, and he that overcomes shall have power over the nations, Rev. ii. 26.

IV. They shall have abundance of comfort in God, and God shall have abundance of honour from them: Thou shalt rejoice in the Lord, v. 16. "Thou shalt also glory in the Holy One of Israel, in what he has done for thee."

V. If there be occasion, God will again do for them as he did for Israel in their march from Egypt to Canaan, v. 17–19. When the captives, either in Babylon or in their return thence, want water or shelter, God will take care of them. Their return out of Babylon was typical of our redemption by Christ; and so these promises, 1. Were provided by the gospel of Christ. That glorious discovery of his love has given full assurance that God has provided sufficient for the supply of all their wants, and the answering of all their prayers. 2. They are applied by the grace and Spirit of Christ to all believers, that they may have consolation in their way and a complete happiness in their end. It is here supposed that the people of God, in their passage through this world, are often in straits: The poor and needy seek water, and there is none; the poor in spirit hunger and thirst after righteousness. The soul of man seeks for satisfaction somewhere, but soon despairs of finding it in the world. It is here promised that their grievances shall be redressed: "I the Lord will hear them, will answer them, I will be with them as I have always been, in their distresses." While we are in the wilderness of this world this promise is to us what the pillar of cloud and fire was to Israel, an assurance of God's gracious presence. They shall have fresh water, as Israel had, even where one would least expect it (v. 18): I will open rivers in high places, rivers of grace, rivers of pleasure, rivers of living water, which he spoke of the Spirit (John vii. 38, 39). The preaching of the gospel to the world turned that wilderness into a pool of water. "I will plant in the wilderness the cedar (v. 19), so that they shall pass through with as much ease and delight as a man walks in his grove. These trees shall be to them what the pillar of cloud was to Israel, a shelter from the heat." Christ and his grace are so to believers. When God sets up his church in the Gentile wilderness there shall be as great a change in men's characters as if thorns and briers were turned into cedars. They shall see and acknowledge the hand of God in this, v. 20. That they may see this wonderful change is above the ordinary course of nature and therefore comes from a superior power.

Verses 21–29

The Lord, by the prophet, here repeats the challenge to idolaters: "Produce your cause (v. 21) and bring forth the strongest reasons you have to prove that your idols are gods, worthy of adoration."

I. The idols are here challenged to bring proofs of their knowledge and power. Understanding and active power are the accomplishments of a man. Whoever pretends to be a god must have these in perfection.

1. "They can tell us nothing that we did not know before, so ignorant are they. We challenge them to inform us," (1) "What has been formerly: Let them show the former things. What did they ever do that was worth taking notice of?" (2) What shall happen; to declare to us things to come (v. 22), and again (v. 23). No creature can foretell things to come, otherwise than by divine information, with any certainty.

2. "They can do nothing that we cannot do ourselves, so impotent are they." That which is charged upon these idols is that they are of nothing, v. 24. Some read it: "The work they do is of nought, and so is the ado that is made about them. Therefore he that chooses you, and gives you your deity, is an abomination to God." A servant is at liberty to choose his master, but a man is not at liberty to choose his God.

II. God here produces proofs that he is the true God, and that there is none besides him.

1. He has an irresistible power. This he will shortly make to appear in the raising up of Cyrus, a type of Christ (v. 25): He will raise him up from the north and from the rising of the sun. Cyrus by his father was a Mede, by his mother a Persian; and his army consisted of Medes, whose country lay north, and Persians, whose country lay east, from Babylon. God will raise him up to great power, and he shall come against Babylon with ends of his own to serve. But, (1) He shall proclaim God's name; so it may be read. So he did when, in his proclamation for the release of the Jews, he acknowledged that the Lord God of Israel was the God. (2) All opposition shall fall before him: He shall come upon the princes of Babylon and trample upon them as the potter treads clay. Christ, as man, was raised up from the north, for Nazareth lay in the northern parts of Canaan; as the angel of the covenant, he ascends from the east. He maintained the honour of heaven (he shall call upon my name), and came upon the prince of darkness as mortar and trod him down.

2. He has an infallible foresight. Now the false gods not only could not do it, but they could not foresee it. (1) He challenges them to produce any of their pretended deities, or their diviners (v. 26). (2) He challenges to himself the sole honour of doing it and foretelling it (v. 27). I am he that will give to Jerusalem one that brings good tidings. This is applicable to the work of redemption, in which the Lord has given to us the glad tidings of reconciliation.

III. Judgment is here given upon this trial. 1. None of all the idols had foretold this work of wonder. Other nations besides the Jews were released out of captivity in Babylon by Cyrus, and yet none of them had any intelligence given them of it beforehand, by any of their gods or prophets. None of all the gods of the nations have shown their worshippers the way of salvation, which God will show by the Messiah. 2. None of those who pleaded for them could produce any instance of their knowledge or power that had in it any colour of proof that they were gods. Judgment must therefore be given against the defendant upon Nihil dicit—He is mute. 3. Sentence is therefore given according to the charge exhibited against them (v. 24).

CHAP. XLII

The prophet seems here to launch out yet further into the prophecy of the Messiah and his kingdom under the type of Cyrus. Here is, I. A prophecy of the Messiah's coming with meekness, and yet with power, ver. 1–4. II. His commission opened, which he received from the Father, ver. 5–9. III. The joy with which the glad tidings should be received, ver. 10–12. IV. The success of the gospel, for the overthrow of the devil's kingdom, ver. 13–17. V. The rejection of the Jews for their unbelief, ver. 18–25.

Verses 1–4

We are sure that these verses are to be understood of Christ, for the evangelist tells us expressly that in him this prophecy was fulfilled, Matt. xii. 17–21.

I. The Father's confidence in him. 1. God owns him: He is my servant. Though he was a Son, yet, as a Mediator, he took upon him the form of a servant. 2. As chosen by him: He is my elect. Infinite Wisdom made the choice and then avowed it. 3. As one he put confidence in: He is my servant on whom I lean; so some read it. 4. As one he took care of: He is my servant whom I uphold; so we read it. The Father stood by him and strengthened him. His delight was in him from eternity.

II. The qualification for his office: I have put my Spirit upon him, to enable him to go through his undertaking, ch. lxi. 1.

III. The work to which he is appointed: it is to bring forth judgment to the Gentiles, that is, to set up a religion in the world under the bonds of which the Gentiles should come and the blessings of which they should enjoy.

IV. The mildness and tenderness with which he should pursue this undertaking, v. 2, 3. He shall carry it on without noise. He shall have no trumpet sounded before him, nor any noisy retinue to follow him. The opposition he meets with he shall not strive against, but patiently endure the contradiction of sinners against himself. His kingdom is spiritual and therefore its weapons are not carnal, nor is its appearance pompous. Those that are wicked he will be patient with; when he has begun to crush them, so that they are as bruised reeds, he will give them space to repent; though they are very offensive, as smoking flax (ch. lxv. 5), yet he will bear with them, as he did with Jerusalem. Those that are as a reed oppressed with doubts and fears, as a bruised reed, that are as smoking flax, as the wick of a candle newly lighted, which is ready to go out again, he will not despise. More is implied than is expressed. He will not break the bruised reed, but will strengthen it, that it may become as a cedar in the courts of our God. He will not quench the smoking flax, but blow it up into a flame.

V. The courage and constancy with which he should persevere (v. 4): Till he is able to say, It is finished; and he enables his apostles and ministers not to fail nor be discouraged, till they also have finished their testimony. He sets judgment in the earth. He erects his government in the world, a church for himself among men, reforms the world by the power of his gospel and grace.

Verses 5–12

I. The covenant God made with and the commission he gave to the Messiah, v. 5–7.

1. The royal titles by which the great God here makes himself known (v. 5): He is the fountain of all being and therefore the fountain of all power. In the upper world he created the heavens and stretched them out (ch. xl. 22). In the lower world he spread forth the earth, and made it a habitation, and that which comes out of it is produced by his power. In the world of mankind: He gives breath to the people upon it; he gives spirit, the powers and faculties of a rational soul. Now this is prefixed to God's covenant with the Messiah, and the commission given him to show that the work of redemption was to restore man to the allegiance he owes to God as his Maker.

2. The assurances which he gives to the Messiah of his presence with him, v. 6. The Messiah was called of God. He was no intruder (Heb. v. 4). When an angel was sent from heaven to strengthen him in his agonies, the Father himself was with him, and this promise was fulfilled.

3. The great intentions of this commission speak comfort to the children of men. God, in giving us Christ, has with him freely given us all the blessings of the new covenant. Two glorious blessings Christ, in his gospel, brings with him to the Gentile world—light and liberty. He is given for a light to the Gentiles. By his Spirit in the word he presents the object; by his Spirit in the heart he prepares the organ. He is sent to proclaim liberty to the captives, as Cyrus did, to bring out the prisoners; not only to open the prison doors, and give them leave to go out, which was all that Cyrus could do, but to bring them out, to enable them to make use of their liberty. This Christ does by his grace.

II. The ratification and confirmation of this grant. 1. The authority of him that makes the promise (v. 8): I am the Lord, Jehovah, that is my name. If he is the Lord that gives being and birth to all things, he will give being and birth to this promise. 2. The accomplishment of the promises he had formerly made concerning his church, are proofs of the kindness he bears to his people (v. 9): "Behold, the former things have come to pass. And now new things do I declare. Now I will make new promises, now I will bestow new favours. Old Testament blessings you have had abundantly; now I declare New Testament blessings, not a fruitful country and dominion over your neighbours, but spiritual blessings in heavenly things. Before they spring forth in the preaching of the gospel I tell you of them, under the type and figure of the former things."

III. The song of joy and praise which should be sung hereupon to the glory of God (v. 10): Sing unto the Lord a new song, a New Testament song. The giving of Christ for a light to the Gentiles (v. 6) was a new thing. The praises of God's grace shall be sung with joy and thankfulness, 1. By those that live in the end of the earth, in countries that lie most remote from Jerusalem. 2. By mariners and merchants, and those that go down to the sea. The Jews traded little at sea; if therefore God's praises be sung by those that go down to the sea, it must be by Gentiles. 3. By the islands and the inhabitants thereof, v. 10, and again, v. 12. 4. By the wilderness and the cities thereof, and the villages of Kedar. These lay east from Jerusalem, as the islands lay west. 5. By the inhabitants of the rock, and those that dwell on the tops of the mountains, by the inhabitants of the rock, the inhabitants of that part of Arabia which is called Petræa—the rocky.

Verses 13–17

These verses may be the song itself that is to be sung by the Gentile world or a prophecy of what God will do to make way for the singing of that song.

I. He will appear in his power and glory more than ever. So he did in the preaching of his gospel, and in the wonderful success it had in the pulling down of Satan's strongholds, v. 13, 14. He had long held his peace, but now he shall go forth to attack the devil's kingdom and give it a fatal blow. Christ, in it, went forth conquering and to conquer. The ministry of the apostles is called their warfare; and they were the soldiers of Jesus Christ. He shall stir up jealousy, shall appear more jealous than ever for his own name and against idolatry. He shall cry, in the preaching of his word, cry like a travailing woman; for the ministers of Christ preached as men that travailed in birth again till they saw Christ formed in the souls of the people, Gal. iv. 19. He shall conquer by the power of his Spirit. As a type and figure of this, to make way for the redemption of the Jews out of Babylon, God will break the power of their oppressors, and will at once destroy and devour the Babylonian monarchy. In accomplishing this destruction of Babylon by the Persian army under Cyrus, he will make waste mountains and hills, level the country, and dry up all their herbs. The army shall drain the fens and low grounds, to make way for the march of their army. Thus, when the gospel shall be preached, it shall have a free course.

II. He will manifest his favour and grace, and towards those who ask the way to Zion, he will show the way, and lead in it, v. 16. God will lead by a way that they knew not, will show them the way to life and happiness by Jesus Christ, who is the way. Thus, in the conversion of Paul, he was struck blind first, and then God revealed his Son, and made the scales to fall from his eyes. God will make darkness light before them. Insuperable difficulties are in the way of their obedience; but God will make crooked things straight; their way shall be plain. As a type of this, he will lead the Jews, when they return out of captivity, to their own land again.

III. He will put those to confusion who adhere to idols (v. 17). The Babylonians when they see how the Jews, who despise their images, are owned and delivered by the God they worship, shall be ashamed that ever they said to these molten images, You are our gods. In times of reformation sin becomes unfashionable.

Verses 18–25

The prophet, having spoken by way of encouragement to the believing Jews, here turns to those among them who were unbelieving. In them there was a type of the Jews who rejected Christ and were rejected by him.

I. The call that is given to this people (v. 18): "Hear, you deaf, and attend to the joyful sound, and look you blind, that you may see the joyful light." This call to the deaf to hear and the blind to see is like the command given to the man that had the withered hand to stretch it forth; though he could not do this, because it was withered, yet, if he had not attempted to do it, he would not have been healed.

II. The character that is given of them (v. 19, 20): Who is blind, but my servant, or deaf as my messenger? The people of the Jews were in profession God's servants, and their priests and elders his messengers (Mal. ii. 7); but they were deaf and blind. He complains of their sottishness—they are blind; and of their stubbornness—they are deaf. They were even worse than the Gentiles themselves. Blindness and deafness in spiritual things are worse in those that profess themselves to be God's servants and messengers than in others. The prophet goes on (v. 20) to describe the blindness and obstinacy of the Jewish nation, just as our Saviour describes it in his time (Matt. xiii. 14, 15).

III. The care God will take of the honour of his own name, notwithstanding their blindness and deafness. The scripture was fulfilled in the casting off of the Jews as well as in the calling in of the Gentiles. He will magnify the law (divine revelation in all the parts of it) and will make it honourable. The law is truly honourable, and, if men will not magnify it by their obedience to it, God will magnify it by punishing them for their disobedience.

IV. The calamities God will bring upon the Jewish nation for their wilful blindness and deafness, v. 22. They are robbed and spoiled. Those that were impenitent and unreformed in Babylon were sentenced to perpetual captivity. It was for their sins that they were spoiled of all their possessions. They were some of them snared in holes, and others hidden in prison-houses. There they lie, and there they are likely to lie. This had its full acomplishment in the final destruction of the Jewish nation by the Romans.

V. The counsel given them in order to their relief; for, though their case be sad, it is not desperate. The generality of them are deaf; they will not harken to the voice of God's word. He will therefore try his rod, and see who among them will give ear to that, v. 23. If one method do not take effect, another may. We may all of us, if we will, hear the voice of God. In hearing the word we must hear for hereafter; we must especially hear for eternity. Acknowledge the hand of God in afflictions, and, whoever were the instruments, have an eye to him as the principal agent (v. 24): "Who gave Jacob and Israel, that people that used to have such an interest in heaven and such a dominion on earth, who gave them for a spoil to the robbers, as they are now to the Babylonians and to the Romans? Did not the Lord?" It is he against whom we have sinned; the prophet puts himself into the number of the sinners, as Dan. ix. 7, 8. See the mischief that sin makes; it provokes God to anger against a people, and so kindles a universal conflagration, sets all on fire.

CHAP. XLIII

The contents of this chapter are much the same with those of the foregoing chapter. I. Precious promises made to God's people in their affliction, of his presence with them, for their support and their deliverance, ver. 1–7. II. A challenge to idols to vie with the omniscience and omnipotence of God, ver. 8–13. III. Encouragement given to the people of God to hope for their deliverance out of Babylon, ver. 14–21. IV. A method taken to prepare the people by putting them in mind of their sins, that they might repent and seek mercy, ver. 22–28.

Verses 1–7

This chapter has a plain connexion with the close of the foregoing chapter. It was there said that Jacob and Israel would not walk in God's ways, and now one would think it should have followed that God would abandon them; but no, the next words are, But now, fear not, O Jacob! O Israel! I have redeemed thee, and thou art mine. Though many among them were untractable, yet God would continue his love for his people, and the body of that nation should still be reserved for mercy. Now the sun, breaking out thus of a sudden from behind a thick and dark cloud, shines with a pleasing surprise. The expressions of God's goodwill to his people here speak abundance of comfort to all the spiritual seed of upright Jacob and praying Israel.

I. The grounds of God's care and concern for his people. Jacob and Israel, though in a sinful miserable condition, shall be looked after; for, 1. They are God's workmanship, created by him unto good works, Eph. ii. 10. He has created them, not only given them a being, but formed them into a people, constituted their government, and incorporated them by the charter of his covenant. 2. They are the people of his purchase: he has redeemed them. Out of the land of Egypt he first redeemed them, and out of many another bondage, in his love, and in his pity (ch. lxiii. 9); much more will he take care of those who are redeemed with the blood of his Son. 3. They are his peculiar people: he has called them by name. 4. He is their God in covenant (v. 3). Those that have God for them need not fear who or what can be against them.

II. The former instances of this care. 1. God had purchased them dearly: I gave Egypt for thy ransom. The Ethiopians had invaded them in Asa's time; but they shall be destroyed rather than Israel shall be disturbed. What are Ethiopia and Seba, all their lives and all their treasures, compared with the blood of Christ? 2. He had prized them accordingly, and they were very dear to him (v. 4).

III. The further instances God would yet give them of his care and kindness. 1. He would be present with them in their greatest difficulties and dangers (v. 2). 2. He would still, when there was occasion, make all the interests of the children of men give way to the interests of his own children. 3. Those of them that were scattered and dispersed in other nations should all be gathered in and share in the blessings of the public, v. 5–7. Some of the seed of Israel were dispersed into all countries, but those whose spirits God stirred up to go to Jerusalem should be fetched in from all parts. But who are the seed of Israel that shall be thus carefully gathered in? He tells us (v. 7) they are such as God has marked for mercy. They are called by his name. They are created for his glory. God is with the church, and therefore let her not fear; none that belong to her shall be lost.

Verses 8–13

God here challenges the worshippers of idols to produce proofs of the divinity of their false gods.

I. Their gods have eyes and see not, ears and hear not, and those that make them and trust in them are like unto them. They have the shape, capacities, and faculties, of men; but they are, in effect, destitute of reason and common sense, or they would never worship gods of their own making.

II. God's witnesses are summoned to appear, and give evidence for him (v. 10): "You, O Israelites! all you that are called by my name, you are all my witnesses, and so is my servant whom I have chosen." It was Christ himself that was so described (ch. xlii. 1), My servant and my elect.

1. All the prophets that testified to Christ, and Christ himself, the great prophet, are here appealed to as God's witnesses. God's people are witnesses for him, and can attest, upon their own experience, concerning the power of his grace. But the Messiah especially is given to be a witness for him to the people; having lain in his bosom from eternity.

2. Let us see what the point is which these witnesses are called to prove (v. 12): You are my witnesses, saith the Lord, that I am God. I am a being self-existent and self-sufficient; I am he whom you are to fear, and worship, and trust in. Nay (v. 13), before the day was (before the first day of time, before the creation of the light, and, consequently, from eternity) I am he. The idols were gods formed (dei facti—made gods, or rather fictitii—fictitious); by nature they were no gods, Gal. iv. 8. But God had a being from eternity, before there were either idols or idolaters (truth is more ancient than error); and he will have a being to eternity. I, even I, am the Lord, the great Jehovah, who is, and was, and is to come; and besides me there is no Saviour, v. 11. God has an infinite and infallible knowledge, as is evident from the predictions of his word (v. 12): I have declared and I have shown that which has without fail come to pass. He has an infinite and irresistible power. He pleads not only, I have shown, but, I have saved (v. 13). The gods of the heathen cannot so much as inspire an historian, much less a prophet. They are challenged to join issue upon this: Let them bring forth their witnesses, to prove their omniscience and omnipotence.

Verses 14–21

I. God here takes to himself such titles as were very encouraging to his people. He is the Lord their Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel (v. 14), and again (v. 15), their Holy One, and therefore will make good every word he has spoken to them. He is the Creator of Israel, that made them a people out of nothing and he is their King.

II. He assures them he will break the power of their oppressors, ch. xiv. 17. God will take care to send a prince to Babylon, that shall bring down all their nobles, and all their people too, even the Chaldeans, whose cry is in the ships, or whose cry is to the ships, as their refuge when the city is taken, that they may escape by the river.

III. He reminds them of the great things he did for their fathers when he brought them out of the land of Egypt (v. 16, 17). He that did this can make a way for you in the sea when you return out of Babylon.

IV. He promises to do yet greater things for them than he had done in the days of old. They should see them repeated, nay, they should see them outdone (v. 18): "Remember not the former things, to undervalue the present things, as if the former days were better than these. Behold, the Lord will do a new thing." The best exposition of this is, Jer. xvi. 14, 15; xxiii. 7, 8. Though former mercies must not be forgotten, fresh mercies must in a special manner be improved.

V. He promises not only to deliver them out of Babylon, but to conduct them safely and comfortably to their own land (v. 19, 20): I will make a way in the wilderness and rivers in the desert. The same power that made a way in the sea (v. 16) can make a way in the wilderness. And he can produce waters in the dryest land, in such abundance as not only to give drink to his people, his chosen, but to the beasts of the field, also the dragons and the ostriches, who are therefore said to honour God for it. This looks forward, not only to God's care of the Jewish church between their return from Babylon and the coming of Christ, but to the grace of the gospel, especially as it is manifested to the Gentile world. The sinners of the Gentiles, who had been as the beasts of the field, running wild, fierce as the dragons, stupid as the owls or ostriches, shall be brought to honour God for his grace.

VI. He traces up all these promised blessings to their great origin (v. 21): This people have I formed for myself, and therefore I do all this for them, that they may show forth my praise. The new heavens, the new earth, the new man, are the work of God's hand; they are fashioned according to his will. As he formed us, so he feeds us, and keeps us, and leads us.

Verses 22–28

This charge comes in here, 1. To clear God's justice in bringing them into captivity. They had neglected God and had cast him off, and therefore he justly rejected them and gave them to the curse (v. 28); and they must be brought to own this before they are prepared for deliverance.

I. The sins with which they are here charged.

1. Omissions of the good which God had commanded. Observe how it comes in with a but; compare v. 21, where God tells them what favours he had bestowed upon them and what his just expectations were from them. But they had made very ill returns to him for his favours. They had cast off prayer: Thou hast not called upon me, O Jacob! Jacob was a man famous for prayer (Hosea xii. 4). To boast of the name of Jacob, and yet live without prayer, is to mock God and deceive ourselves. They had grown weary of their religion. They grudged the expense of their devotion. They were for a cheap religion; and in those acts of devotion that were costly they desired to be excused. They had not brought, no, not their small cattle, the lambs and kids, which God required for burnt-offerings (v. 23), much less did they bring their greater cattle. Sweet cane, or calamus, was used for the holy oil, incense, and perfume; but they were not willing to be at the charge of that, v. 24. They were, in effect, as no sacrifices (v. 23): Neither hast thou honoured me with thy sacrifices. As God had appointed it, it was no burdensome thing; it was not a service that they had any reason at all to complain of: "I have not caused thee to serve with an offering; I have not made it a drudgery to you. I have not wearied thee with incense." They had many feasts and good days, but only one day in all the year in which they were to afflict their souls. The ordinances of the ceremonial law, though, in comparison with Christ's easy yoke, they are spoken of as heavy (Acts xv. 10), yet, in comparison with the service that idolaters did to their false gods, they were light. God did not require them to sacrifice their children, as Moloch did.

2. Commissions of the evil which God had forbidden. Thou hast made me to serve with thy sins. When we make God's gifts the food and fuel of our lusts, then we make God to serve with our sins. God had not made them to serve with their sacrifices, but they had made him to serve with their sins. The master had not tired the servants with his commands, but they had tired him with their disobedience.

II. What were the aggravations of their sin, v. 27. 1. That they were children of disobedience; for their first father (that is, their forefathers) had sinned. 2. That they were scholars of disobedience too; for their teachers had transgressed against God, were guilty of gross scandalous sins, and the people, no doubt, would learn to do as they did.

III. What were the tokens of God's displeasure against them for their sins, v. 28. I have profaned the princes of the sanctuary, that is, the priests and Levites who presided with great dignity in the temple-service; they profaned themselves, and made themselves vile, by their enormities, and then God profaned them and made them vile, by their calamities, Mal. ii. 9. The honour of their state was ruined likewise: "I have given Jacob to the curse, that is, to be cursed, and hated, and abused by all their neighbours, and Israel to reproach, to be insulted, ridiculed, and triumphed over by their enemies."

IV. What were the riches of God's mercy towards them notwithstanding (v. 25): I, even I, am he who notwithstanding all this blotteth out thy transgressions.

1. This gracious declaration of God's readiness to pardon sin comes in very strangely. The charge ran very high: Thou hast wearied me with thy iniquities, v. 24. Now one would think it should follow: "I, even I, am he that will destroy thee, and burden myself no longer with care about thee." No, I, even I, am he that will forgive thee; as if the great God would teach us that forgiving injuries is the best way to keep ourselves from being wearied with them. Of the sins of every believing penitent, the pardon is expressed; he will blot them out, as a cloud is blotted out by the beams of the sun (ch. xliv. 22), as a debt is blotted out not to appear against the debtor (the book is crossed as if the debt were paid, because it is pardoned upon the payment which the surety has made). He will not remember the sin, which shall be no diminution to his love for the future. When God forgives he forgets. It is not for the sake of anything in us, but for his own sake, for his mercies' sake, and especially for his Son's sake.

2. Those words (v. 26), Put me in remembrance, may be understood either (1) As a rebuke to a proud Pharisee, that expects to find favour for his merits and not to be beholden to free grace: "If you have anything to offer for the sake of which you should be pardoned, put me in remembrance of it." Or, (2) As a direction and encouragement to a penitent publican. Put him in remembrance of the promises he has made to penitents, and the satisfaction his Son has made for them. This is the only way, and it is a sure way, to peace. Only acknowledge thy transgression.

CHAP. XLIV

God, by the prophet, goes on in this chapter, as before, I. To encourage his people with the assurance of great blessings he had in store for them at their return out of captivity, and those typical of much greater in the days of the Messiah, ver. 1–8. II. To expose the folly of idol-makers and idol-worshippers, ver. 9–20. III. To confirm the assurances he had given to his people of those great blessings, and to raise their joyful expectations, ver. 21–28.

Verses 1–8

Two great truths in these verses:

1. That the people of God are a happy people, especially upon account of the covenant that is between them and God. Three things complete their happiness:

1. The covenant-relations wherein they stand to God, v. 1, 2. Israel is here called Jeshurun—the upright one; for those only, like Nathanael, are Israelites indeed, in whom is no guile. Jacob and Israel had been represented as very provoking and obnoxious to God's wrath, but mercy steps in with a notwithstanding: "Yet now hear, O Jacob my servant! thou and I will be friends again for all this." So and so I will do for them, says God (Heb. viii. 12), for I will be merciful to their unrighteousness. Now the relations wherein they stand to him are very encouraging. (1) They are his servants. (2) They are his chosen, and he will abide by his choice; those whom he has chosen he takes under special protection. (3) They are his creatures. He made them, and therefore he will help them over their difficulties and help them in their services.

2. The covenant-blessings which he has secured to them and theirs, v. 3, 4. (1) Those that are sensible of their spiritual wants, and the insufficiency of the creature to supply them, shall have abundant satisfaction in God: I will pour water upon him that is thirsty. (2) Those that are barren as the dry ground shall be watered with the grace of God. (3) The water God will pour out is his Spirit (John vii. 39). This is the great New Testament promise, that God, having sent his servant Christ, and upheld him, will send his Spirit to uphold us. To all who are thus made to partake of the privileges of adoption God will give the spirit of adoption. Hereby there shall be a great increase of the church. Thus it shall be spread to distant places, v. 4.

3. The consent they cheerfully give to their part of the covenant, v. 5. Many of those that were without did at that time join themselves to them, invited by that glorious appearance of God for them, Zech. viii. 23. And doubtless it looks further yet, to the conversion of the Gentiles. These converts are one and another, very many, of different ranks and nations, and all welcome to God, Col. iii. 11. Everyone for himself shall say, "I am the Lord's; living and dying I will be his." They shall call themselves by the name of Jacob. They shall love all God's people, and be willing to take their lot with them in all conditions. They shall do this very solemnly. Some of them shall subscribe with their hand unto the Lord, as a man sets his hand to it, and delivers it as his act and deed. The more express we are in our covenanting with God the better, Exod. xxiv. 7.

II. That, as the Israel of God are a happy people, so the God of Israel is a great God, and he is God alone. This speaks abundant satisfaction to all that trust in him, v. 6–8. The God we trust in is a God of incontestable sovereignty and irresistible power. He is the Lord, Jehovah, self-existent and self-sufficient; and he is the Lord of hosts, of all the hosts of heaven and earth, of angels and men. He is the King of Israel and his Redeemer; and those that take God for their King shall have him for their Redeemer. He is God from everlasting, before the world was, and will be so to everlasting. If there were not a God to create, nothing would ever have been; and, if there were not a God to uphold, all would soon come to nothing again. He is God alone (v. 6): Besides me there is no God. There is no God besides Jehovah. He is all-sufficient, and therefore there needs no other. His people needed not to hope in any other God. Those on whom the sun shines need neither moon nor stars, nor the light of their own fire. They needed not to fear any other god. None besides could foretell these things to come, which God now by his prophet gave notice of to the world, above 200 years before they came to pass (v. 7).

Verses 9–20

This discourse is intended, 1. To arm the people of Israel against the strong temptation to worship idols when they were captives in Babylon, and to humour those who were now their lords and masters. 2. To cure them of their inclination to idolatry, which was the sin that did most easily beset them and to reform them from which they were sent into Babylon. As the rod of God is of use to enforce the word, so the word of God is of use to explain the rod. 3. To furnish them with something to say to their Chaldean task-masters. When they insulted over them, when they asked, Where is your God? they might hence ask them, What are your gods?

For the conviction of idolaters, we have,

I. A challenge given to them to clear themselves from the imputation of the most shameful folly imaginable, v. 9–11. They set their wits to contrive, and their hands to frame, graven images, and they call them their delectable things. We tell them that they deceive themselves and one another. Their delectable things shall not profit them, neither supply them with good nor protect them from evil. The graven images are profitable for nothing at all. They are their own witnesses, witnesses against themselves, if they would but give their own consciences leave to deal faithfully with them. Who has formed a god? Who but a madman, or one out of his wits, would think of forming a god, of making that which, if he make it a god, he must suppose to be his maker? The workmen that formed this god are of men, weak and impotent, and therefore cannot possibly make a being that shall be omnipotent.

II. A particular narrative of the whole proceeding in making a god.

1. The persons employed about it are handicraft tradesmen, the very same that you would employ in making the common utensils of your husbandry, a cart or a plough. You must have a smith, a blacksmith, who with the tongs works in the coals; and it is hard work. He cannot allow himself time to eat or drink, for he drinks no water, and therefore is faint, v. 12. The plates with which the smith was to cover the image, or whatever iron-work was to be done about it, he fashioned with hammers, and made it all very exact, according to the model given him. Then comes the carpenter, and he takes as much care and pains about the timber-work, v. 13. He brings his box of tools, for he has occasion for them all: He stretches out his rule upon the piece of wood, marks it with a line, where it must be sawed or cut off; he fits it, or polishes it, with planes, the greater first and then the less; he marks out with the compasses what must be the size and shape of it; and it is just what he pleases.

2. The form in which it is made is that of a man, a poor, weak, dying creature; but it is the noblest form and figure that he is acquainted with. He makes it according to the beauty of a man, but altogether unfit to represent the beauty of the Lord. God put a great honour upon man when, in respect of his soul, he made him after the image of God; but man does a great dishonour to God when he makes him, in respect of bodily parts, after the image of man. All the beauty of the body of a man, when pretended to be put upon him who is an infinite Spirit, is a deformity and diminution to him. And, when the goodly piece is finished, it must remain in the house, in the temple or shrine prepared for it.

3. The matter of which it is mostly made is sorry stuff to make a god of; it is the stock of a tree. (1) The tree itself was fetched out of the forest, where it grew among other trees, of no more virtue or value than its neighbours. It was a cedar, it may be, or a cypress, or an oak, v. 14. Perhaps he had an eye upon it some time before for this use, and strengthened it for himself, used some art or other to make it stronger and better-grown than other trees were. Or, it may be, it pleases his fancy better to take an ash, which is of a quicker growth, and which was of his own planting for this use, and which has been nourished with rain from heaven. What an affront he puts upon the God of heaven in setting up that as a rival which was nourished by his rain, that rain which falls upon the just and unjust.

(2) The boughs of this tree were good for nothing but for fuel; to that use were they put, and so were the chips that were cut off, v. 15, 16. To show that that tree has no innate virtue in it for its own protection, it is as capable of being burnt as any other tree; he who chose it had no more value for it than for any other tree, throwing part of it into the fire as common rubbish, asking no question for conscience' sake. It serves him for his parlour-fire: He will take thereof and warm himself (v. 15), and he finds the comfort of it, Aha! I am warm; I have seen the fire; and certainly that part of the tree which served him for fuel, the use for which God and nature designed it, does him a much greater kindness and yields him more satisfaction than ever that will of which he makes a god. It serves him for his kitchen-fire: he roasteth roast, and is satisfied that he has not done amiss to put it to this use. It serves him to heat the oven: He kindles it and bakes bread with the heat of it, and none charges him with doing wrong.

(3) The stock or body of the tree shall serve to make a god. It might as well have served to make a bench. When the besotted idolater has thus served the meanest purposes with part of his tree, and the rest has had time to season: He makes it a graven image, and falls down thereto (v. 15), that is (v. 17), The residue thereof he makes a god, even his graven image; he falls down to it, and worships it; he prays to it, as having a dependence upon it, and great expectations from it: he saith, Deliver me, for thou art my god.

III. Here is judgment given upon this whole matter, v. 18–20. Man has become worse than the beasts that perish; for they act according to the dictates of sense, but man acts not according to the dictates of reason (v. 18). Men that act rationally in other things in this act most absurdly. They are rebels against the great law of consideration (v. 12) None considers in his heart, nor has so much application of mind as to reason thus with himself: "I have burnt part of this tree in the fire, for baking and roasting; and now shall I make the residue thereof an abomination? Shall I be such a fool as to fall down to the stock of a tree—a senseless, lifeless, helpless thing?" These idolaters put a cheat upon themselves (v. 20): They feed on ashes; they will be disappointed as much as a man that would expect nourishment by feeding on ashes. The apostasy of sinners from God is owing entirely to themselves and to the evil heart of unbelief that is in their own bosom. There is none of them that can be persuaded so far to suspect himself as to say, Is there not a lie in my right hand? and so to think of delivering his soul. Self-suspicion is the first step towards self-deliverance.

Verses 21–28

I. The duty which Jacob and Israel, now in captivity, were called to, that they might be qualified for deliverance. Our first care must be to get good by our afflictions, and then we may hope to get out of them. The duty is expressed in two words: Remember and return. 1. "Remember these, O Jacob! Remember the folly of idolatry, and that thou art my servant, and therefore must not serve other masters." 2. Return unto me, v. 22.

II. The favours of which Jacob and Israel, now in captivity, were assured; and what is here promised to them upon their remembering and returning to God is in a spiritual sense promised to all that in like manner return to God. When we begin to remember God he will begin to remember us; it is he that remembers us first.

1. The grounds upon which God's favourable intentions to his people were built. (1) They are his servants, and therefore he has a just quarrel with those that detain them. Let my people go, that they may serve me. (2) He formed them into a people, v. 24. From the first beginning of their increase into a nation they were under his particular care. (3) He has redeemed them formerly, and he is still the same. The Lord has redeemed Jacob; he is about to do it (v. 23); he has determined to do it; for he is the Lord their Redeemer, v. 24. (4) He has glorified himself in them (v. 23), and therefore will do so still, John xii. 28. (5) He has pardoned their sins, which were the only obstruction to their deliverance, v. 22. Therefore he will break the yoke of captivity because he has blotted out, as a thick cloud, their transgressions. Our transgressions and our sins as a cloud interpose between heaven and earth. When God pardons sin he blots out this cloud, this thick cloud, so that the intercourse with heaven is laid open again.

2. The universal joy which the deliverance of God's people should bring along with it (v. 23): Sing, O you heavens! The whole creation shall have cause for joy and rejoicing in the redemption of God's people; and it is assured that though now it groans, being burdened, it shall at last be delivered from the bondage of corruption. The greatest establishment of the world is the kingdom of God in it, Ps. xcvi. 11–13; xcviii. 7–9. The angels shall rejoice in it. The heavens shall sing, for the Lord has done it. And there is joy in heaven when God and man are reconciled (Luke xv. 7). Even the inhabitants of the Gentile world, should join in these praises, as sharing in these joys.

3. The encouragement we have to hope that though great difficulties lie in the way of the church's deliverance, yet, when the time for it shall come, they shall all be got over with ease; for thus saith Israel's Redeemer, I am the Lord that maketh all things, did make them at first and am still making them; for providence is a continued creation.

4. The confusion which this would put upon the oracles of Babylon, by the confutation it would give them, v. 25. God, by delivering his people out of Babylon, would frustrate the tokens of the liars, of all the lying prophets, that said the Babylonian monarchy had many ages yet to live. Nor would it only baffle their pretended prophets, but their celebrated politicians too: He turns the wise men backward. Those that are made acquainted with Christ see all the knowledge they had before to be foolishness, and themselves taken in their own craftiness, 1 Cor. iii. 19.

5. The confirmation which this would give to the oracles of God, which the Jews had distrusted and their enemies despised: God confirms the word of his servant (v. 26); and performs the counsel of the messengers whom he hath many a time sent to his people.

6. The particular favours God designed for his people, that were now in captivity, v. 26–28. It is here supposed that Jerusalem, and the cities of Judah, should for a time lie in ruins, dispeopled and uninhabited; but it is promised that they shall be rebuilt and repeopled. God has said to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be inhabited; for, while the world stands, God will have a church in it. The cities of Judah too shall again be built. The Assyrian army under Sennacherib only took them, and then, upon the defeat of that army, they returned undamaged to the right owners; but the Chaldean army demolished them, and by carrying away the inhabitants left them to go to decay of themselves. Yet these desolations shall not be perpetual. God will raise up the wastes and decayed places. It is here supposed that the temple too should be destroyed, and lie for a time razed to the foundations; but it is promised that the foundation of it shall again be laid, and no doubt built upon. As the desolation of the sanctuary was to all the pious Jews the most mournful part of the destruction, so the restoration and re-establishment of it would be the most joyful part of the deliverance. It is here supposed that very great difficulties would lie in the way of this deliverance, but it is promised that by a divine power they shall all be removed (v. 27): God saith to the deep, Be dry; so he did when he brought Israel out of Egypt, and so he will again when he brings them out of Babylon. Who art thou, O great deep? Dost thou retard their passage and think to block it up? Thou shalt be dry. When Cyrus took Babylon by draining the river Euphrates into many channels, and so making it passable for his army, this was fulfilled. God saith of Cyrus, He is my shepherd (v. 28). Israel is his people, and the sheep of his pasture. These sheep are now in the midst of wolves; they are impounded for trespass. Now Cyrus shall be his shepherd, employed by him to release these sheep. It was more the praise of Cyrus to be God's shepherd than to be emperor of Persia. God makes what use he pleases of men; in those very things wherein they are serving themselves, and look no further than that, God is serving his own purposes by them.

CHAP. XLV

Cyrus was nominated in the foregoing chapter to be God's shepherd, he was to be a type of the Great Redeemer. We have here, I. The great things which God would do for Cyrus, that he might release God's people, ver. 1–4. II. The proof God would hereby give of his eternal power, ver. 5–7. III. A prayer for the hastening of this deliverance, ver. 8. IV. A check to the unbelieving Jews, ver. 9, 10. V. Encouragement given to the believing Jews, who trusted in God and continued instant in prayer, ver. 11–15. VI. A challenge given to the worshippers of idols and their doom read, and satisfaction given to the worshippers of the true God and their comfort secured, ver. 16–25.

Verses 1–4

Cyrus was a Mede, descended (as some say) from Astyages, king of Media. The pagan writers are not agreed in their accounts of his origin. Some tell us that in his infancy, he was an outcast, left exposed, and was saved from perishing by a herdsman's wife. However, it is agreed that Crœsus king of Lydia made a descent upon his country, which he repulsed, prosecuting the advantages he had gained against Croesus with such vigour that in a little time he took Sardis and made himself master of the rich kingdom of Lydia and the many provinces that then belonged to it. This made him very great (for Croesus was rich to a proverb); but it was nearly ten years afterwards that, in conjunction with his uncle Darius and with the forces of Persia, he made his famous attack upon Babylon. Babylon had now grown rich and strong. Some say the walls were so thick that six chariots might drive abreast upon them. Cyrus had a great ambition to make himself master of this place, and at last he performed it. Here, years before it came to pass, we are told,

I. What great things God would do for him, that he might put it into his power to release his people. In order to this he shall be a mighty conqueror and a wealthy monarch, and nations shall become tributaries to him and help him both with men and money. Cyrus is here called God's anointed, because he was designed for this great service by God, and was to be herein a type of the Messiah. God engages to hold his right hand, as Elisha put his hands upon the king's hands when he was to shoot his arrow against Syria, 2 Kings xiii. 16. Being under such direction,

1. He shall extend his conquests very far and shall make nothing of the opposition that will be given him. Populous kingdoms shall yield to him. God will subdue nations before him; the battle is his, and therefore his is the victory. Potent kings shall fall before him: I will loose the loins of kings, and it was literally fulfilled in Belshazzar, for, when he was terrified by the handwriting on the wall, the joints of his loins were loosed, Dan. v. 6. Great cities shall surrender themselves into his hands. God will incline the keepers of the city to open before him the two-leaved gates, from a full conviction that it is to no purpose to contend with him. The longest and most dangerous marches shall be made easy and ready to him: I will go before thee, to clear the way, and to conduct thee in it, and then the crooked places shall be made straight; or, as some read it, the hilly places shall be levelled and made even. No opposition shall stand before him. He that gives him his commission will break in pieces the gates of brass that are shut against him, and cut asunder the bars of iron wherewith they are fastened. This was fulfilled if that be true which Herodotus reports, that the city of Babylon had 100 gates all of brass, with posts and hooks of the same metal.

2. He shall replenish his coffers (v. 3): I will give thee the treasures of darkness, treasures of gold and silver, that had been buried under ground by the inhabitants. Cyrus owned God's goodness to him, and in consideration of that, released the captives. Ezra i. 2, God has given me all the kingdoms of the earth and thereby has obliged me to build him a house at Jerusalem.

II. We are here told what God designed in doing all this for Cyrus.

1. "That thou mayest know by all this that I the Lord am the God of Israel; for I have called thee by thy name long before thou wast born."

2. It was that the Israel of God might be released, v. 4. Though he knew not God, God bespoke him for his shepherd. He called him by his name, Cyrus, and called him his anointed. And why did God do all this for Cyrus? Not for his own sake, whether he was a man of virtue or no is questioned. Xenophon indeed, when he would describe the heroic virtues of an excellent prince, made use of Cyrus's name, but other historians represent him as haughty, cruel, and bloodthirsty. The reason why God preferred him was for Jacob his servant's sake. Cyrus was a type of Christ, victorious over principalities and powers, and entrusted with unsearchable riches, for the use and benefit of God's servants. When he ascended on high he led captivity captive, took those captives that had taken others captives, and opened the prison to those that were bound.

Verses 5–10

God here asserts his sole dominion, manifest to the world in all the great things he did for Cyrus and by him. Observe,

I. This doctrine is here laid down in two things: 1. That there is no God besides him. This is a fundamental truth, which would abolish idolatry out of the world. With what an awful, commanding, air of majesty and authority does the great God here proclaim it to the world: I am the Lord, I the Lord, Jehovah, and there is none else, there is no God besides me, no other self-existent, self-sufficient, infinite and eternal. I am the Lord, and there is none else. This is here said to Cyrus, not only to cure him of the sin of his ancestors, which was the worshipping of idols, but to prevent his falling into the sin of some of his predecessors in victory and universal monarchy, which was the setting up of themselves for gods and being idolized. Let Cyrus remember that still he is but a man, and there is no God but one. 2. That he is Lord of all, and there is nothing done without him (v. 7): I form the light, I create darkness, I make peace (put here for all good) and I create evil, not the evil of sin (God is not the author of that), but the evil of punishment. Light and darkness are opposite to each other. In the revolution of every day each takes its turn. The self-same cause of both is he that is the first Cause of all. He who formed the natural light (Gen. i. 3) still forms the providential light. He who at first made peace among the jarring principles of nature makes peace in the affairs of men. He who allowed the natural darkness, which was a mere privation, creates the providential darkness.

II. How this doctrine is here proved and published. 1. It is proved by that which God did for Cyrus: There is no God besides me, for (v. 5) I girded thee, though thou hast not known me. By this it appears that the God of Israel makes what use he pleases even of those that are strangers to him and pay their homage to other gods. 2. It is published to all the world by the word of God, by his providence, and by the testimony of the suffering Jews in Babylon. The wonderful deliverance of the Israel of God proclaimed to all the world that there is none like unto the God of Jeshurun, that rides on the heavens for their help.

III. How this doctrine is here improved and applied.

1. For the comfort of those that quietly waited, for the redemption of Israel (v. 8): Drop down, you heavens, from above. Some take this as the saints' prayer for the deliverance. I rather take it as God's precept concerning it; for he is said to command deliverances, Ps. xliv. 4. All the creatures shall be made to contribute to the carrying on of this great work. We must not expect salvation without righteousness, for they spring up together and together the Lord hath created them. Christ died to save us from our sins, not in our sins, and is made redemption to us by being made to us righteousness and sanctification. This great deliverance is from heaven, and, if our hearts be open to receive it, the product will be the fruits of righteousness and the great salvation.

2. For reproof to those of the church's enemies that opposed this salvation, or those of her friends that despaired of it (v. 9): Woe unto him that strives with his Maker! Woe to the insulting Babylonians that set God at defiance, and will not let his people go! Let not the oppressed, in dejection quarrel with God for the prolonging of their captivity. Shall the clay say to him that forms it, "What makest thou? Why dost thou make me of this shape and not that?" Shall we impeach God's wisdom, or question his power, who are ourselves so wonderfully made? Shall we say, He has no hands, whose hands made us and in whose hands we are? It is as unnatural as for the child to find fault with the parents, to say to the father, What begettest thou? or to the mother, "What hast thou brought forth; Why was I not begotten and born an angel, exempt from the infirmities of human nature and the calamities of human life?"

Verses 11–19

The people in captivity, who reconciled themselves to the will of God and were content to wait his time for their deliverance, are assured they should not wait in vain.

I. They are invited to enquire concerning the issue of their troubles, v. 11. "Ask of me things to come; have recourse to the prophets and see what they say. Ask the watchmen, What of the night? Ask them, How long?" We may not strive with our Maker by passionate complaints, but we may wrestle with him by faithful and fervent prayer. See the power of prayer and its prevalency with God: Thou shalt cry, and he shall say, Here I am; what would you that I should do unto you?

II. They are encouraged to depend upon the power of God when they are brought very low and are utterly incapable of helping themselves, v. 12. Their help stands in the name of the Lord, who made heaven and earth.

III. They are particularly told what God would do for them, and this shall lead them to expect a more glorious Redeemer of whom Cyrus was a type.

1. Liberty shall be proclaimed to them, v. 13. Cyrus is the man that shall proclaim it: I have raised him up in righteousness, that is, in pursuance of my promises. I will direct all his ways. Two things Cyrus must do for God: (1) Jerusalem is God's city, now in ruins, and he must rebuild it. (2) Israel is God's people, but they are now captives, and he must release them, not demanding any ransom. And Christ is anointed to do that for poor captive souls which Cyrus was to do for the captive Jews, to proclaim the opening of the prison to those that were bound (ch. lxi. 1), in a worse bondage than that in Babylon.

2. Provision shall be made for them. They went out poor, and unable to bear the expenses of their re-establishment; and therefore it is promised that the labour of Egypt and other nations should come over to them and be theirs, v. 14. They did not go out empty from Babylon any more than from Egypt. Those that are redeemed by Christ shall be enriched. Those whose spirits God stirs up to go to the heavenly Zion may depend upon him to bear their charges. The world is theirs as far as is good for them.

3. Prosclytes shall be brought over to them: Men of stature shall come after thee in chains; they shall fall down to thee, saying, Surely God is in thee. This was in part fulfilled when many of the people of the land became Jews (Esther viii. 17), and said, We will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you, Zech. viii. 23. But this was to have its full accomplishment in the gospel church,—when the Gentiles shall become obedient by word and deed to the faith of Christ (Rom. xv. 18).

IV. They are taught to trust God further than they can see him. The prophet puts this word into their mouths (v. 15): Verily, thou art a God that hidest thyself. He hid himself when he was bringing them out of the trouble. The salvation of the church is carried on in a mysterious way, by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts working on men's spirits (Zech. iv. 6), by weak and unlikely instruments, small and accidental occurrences, but this is our comfort, though God hide himself, we are sure he is the God of Israel, the Saviour. See Job xxxv. 14.

V. They are instructed to triumph over idolaters and all the worshippers of other gods (v. 16).

VI. They are assured that those who trust in God shall never be made ashamed of their confidence in in him, v. 17. They shall be saved in him; for his name shall be their strong tower. Beyond this temporal deliverance they must think of that salvation by the Messiah which is the salvation of the soul, a restoration to everlasting bliss. "You shall not only be delivered from the everlasting shame and contempt which will be the portion of idolaters (Dan. xii. 2), but you shall have everlasting honour and glory." Those who are confounded as penitents for their own sin shall not be confounded as believers in God's promise and power.

VII. They are engaged for ever to cleave to God, and never to desert him. That the Lord we serve and trust is God alone appears by the two great lights, that of nature and that of revelation.

1. It appears by the light of nature; for he made the world, and therefore may justly demand its homage (v. 18): "Thus saith the Lord, that created the heavens and formed the earth, I am the Lord, the sovereign Lord of all, and there is none else." When he had made it he established it, founded it on the seas (Ps. xxiv. 2), hung it on nothing (Job xxvi. 7) as at first he made it of nothing. He fitted it for the service of man, to whom he designed to give it. He made nothing in vain, but intended everything for some end. If any man prove to have been made in vain, it is his own fault.

2. It appears by the light of revelation. As the works of God abundantly prove that he is God alone, so does his word, and the discovery he has made of himself and of his mind and will by it. All that God has said is plain: I have not spoken in secret, in a dark place of the earth. The Pagan deities delivered their oracles out of dens and caverns, with a low and hollow voice, and in ambiguous expressions; those that had familiar spirits whispered and muttered (ch. viii. 19); but God delivered his law from the top of Mount Sinai, distinct, audible, and intelligible. The vision is written, and made plain, so that he who runs may read it. If it be obscure to any, they may thank themselves. Christ pleaded in his own defence what God says here, In secret have I said nothing, John xviii. 20. God has in his word invited men to seek him, so he never denied their believing prayers. If he did not think fit to give them the particular thing they prayed for, yet he gave them such grace, comfort and satisfaction of soul as were equivalent. What we say of winter is true of prayer, It never rots in the skies.

Verses 20–25

What is here said is intended,

I. For idolaters, to show them their folly in worshipping gods that cannot help them, and neglecting a God that can. Let all that have escaped of the nations, not only the Jews, but those of other nations that were by Cyrus released, hear what is to be said against the worshipping of idols. They set up the wood of their graven image. Though they overlay it with gold, deck it with ornaments, and make a god of it, yet still it is but wood. They pray to a god that cannot save. "Summon them all; tell them that the great cause shall again be tried between God and Baal. There is no other God besides me." None besides is fit to rule. None besides is able to help. As he is a just god, so he is the Saviour.

II. For the comfort and encouragement of God's faithful worshippers, whoever they are, v. 22. God says it to all his people, though they seem to be lost and forgotten in their dispersion, "Let them but look to me by faith and prayer, look above second causes, look up to me, and they shall be saved." When Christ is lifted up from the earth, as the brazen serpent upon the pole, he shall draw the eyes of all men to him. I have sworn by myself (and God can swear by no greater, Heb. vi. 13); the word has gone out of my mouth, that he who made all should be Lord of all, that, since all beings are derived from him, they should all be devoted to him. He has assured us that the kingdoms of the world shall become his kingdom. This is applied to the dominion of our Lord Jesus, Rom. xiv. 10, 11. Unto him shall men of distant countries come, to implore his favour. All that are incensed against him shall be ashamed; some shall be brought to a penitential shame for it, others to a remediless ruin. In the Lord the captive Jews had righteousness (that is, grace both to sanctify their afflictions and to qualify them for deliverance) and strength for their support and escape. In the Lord Jesus we have righteousness to recommend us to the goodwill of God towards us, and strength to begin and carry on the good work of God in us. The people of the Jews shall in the Lord be justified before men and openly glory in their God. All true Christians, that depend upon Christ for strength and righteousness, in him shall be justified and shall glory in that.

CHAP. XLVI

God, by the prophet prepares them for deliverance by possessing them with a detestation of idols and with a believing confidence in God I. Let them not be afraid of the idols of Babylon (ver. 1, 2), but let them trust in that God who had often delivered them, to do it now, ver. 3, 4. II. Let them not think to make idols of their own, ver. 5–7, but have an eye to God in his word, not in an image; let them depend upon the promises and God's power to accomplish them all, ver. 9–11. And let them know that the unbelief of man shall not make the word of God of no effect, ver. 12, 13.

Verses 1–4

I. The false gods will certainly fail their worshippers, v. 1, 2. Bel and Nebo were two celebrated idols of Babylon. As Bel was a deified prince, so (some think) Nebo was a deified prophet, for so Nebo signifies; so that Bel and Nebo were their Jupiter and their Mercury or Apollo. God here tells them what shall become of these idols. When Cyrus takes Babylon, down go the idols. Bel and Nebo, that were set up on high, shall stoop and bow down at the feet of the soldiers that plunder their temples. And because there is a great deal of gold and silver upon them they carry them away with the rest of the spoil. The mules are laden with them and their other idols, to be sent among other lumber (for so it seems they accounted them rather than treasure) into Persia. They stoop, they bow down together. They are all alike, tottering things, and their day has come to fall.

II. The true God will never fail his worshippers. He formed them into a people and gave them their constitution. Every good man is what God makes him. You have been borne by me from the belly, and carried from the womb. And as God began early to do them good he had constantly continued to do them good: he had carried them from the womb to this day. We have been carried in the arms of his power and in the bosom of his love and pity. Our spiritual life is sustained by his grace as necessarily and constantly as our natural life by his providence. "You have been borne by me from the belly, nursed when you were children; and even to your old age I am he, when, by reason of your infirmities, you will need help as much as in your infancy." Israel was now growing old. And they had hastened their old age, and the calamities of it, by their irregularities. But God is still their God, will still carry them in the same everlasting arms that were laid under them in Moses's time, Deut. xxxiii. 27. I will now bear them upon eagles' wings out of Babylon, as in their infancy I bore them out of Egypt. This promise to aged Israel is applicable to every aged Israelite. "Even to your old age, when you grow unfit for business, when you are compassed with infirmities, and perhaps your relations begin to grow weary of you, yet I am he, the very same by whom you have been borne from the belly and carried from the womb. You change, but I am the same. I will carry you, will bear you up and bear you out, and will carry you home at last."

Verses 5–13

The deliverance of Israel by the destruction of Babylon is again promised, for the conviction of idolaters and of oppressors.

I. For the conviction of those who made and worshipped idols, especially those of Israel who did so.

1. He challenges them either to frame an image that should be thought a resemblance of him (v. 5): To whom will you liken me? It is absurd to think of representing an infinite and eternal Spirit by the figure of any creature whatsoever. None ever saw any similitude of him, nor can see his face and live.

2. He exposes the folly of those who made idols and then prayed to them, v. 6, 7. They lavish gold out of the bag, though they pinch their families and weaken their estates by it. They weigh silver in the balance, either to be the matter of their idol, or to pay the workman's wages. They were in great care about their idols (v. 7): They bear him upon their own shoulders; they carry him, and set him in his place, more like a dead corpse than a living God. They set him on a pedestal, and he stands. They take pains to fasten him, and from his place he shall not remove, though they know he can neither move a hand nor stir a step to do them any kindness. When the goldsmith has made it that which they please to call a god they fall down, yea, they worship it. Now shall any that have some knowledge of the true and living God, thus make fools of themselves?

3. He puts it to their own reason, let that judge (v. 8): "Remember this, what senseless helpless things idols are, and show yourselves men—and not brutes, men and not babes. Act with reason and scorn to disparage your own judgment as you do when you worship idols."

4. He again produces incontestable proofs that he is God (v. 9): I am God, and there is none like me. "Remember the former things of old, what the God of Israel did for his people in their beginnings. Remember those things, and you will own that I am God and there is none else." He is God alone, for it is he only that declares the end from the beginning, v. 10. Many scripture prophecies which are delivered long ago are not yet accomplished; but the accomplishment of some in the meantime is an earnest of the accomplishment of the rest in due time. The accomplishment of this particular prophecy, which relates to the elevation of Cyrus and his agency in the deliverance of God's people out of their captivity, is mentioned for the confirmation of this truth. God by his counsel calls a ravenous bird from the east, a bird of prey, Cyrus, who (they say) had a nose like the beak of a hawk or eagle, to which some think this alludes, or (as others say) to the eagle which was his standard, as it was afterwards that of the Romans, to which there is supposed to be a reference, Matt. xxiv. 28. Cyrus came from the east at God's call. "I have spoken it by my servants the prophets, and what I have spoken is what I have purposed." For, though God has many things in his purposes which are not in his prophecies, he had nothing in his prophecies but what are in his purposes.

II. For the conviction of those that opposed the counsels of God assurance is here given that they shall be accomplished very shortly, v. 12, 13.

1. This is addressed to the stout-hearted, that is, either, (1) The proud and obstinate Babylonians, that are far from righteousness, that say they will never let the oppressed go free, in spite of their petitions or God's predictions. Or, (2) The unhumbled Jews, that have been long in the furnace, but are not melted, that, like the unbelieving murmuring Israelites in the wilderness, keep good things from themselves, as their fathers, who could not enter into the land of promise because of unbelief. This is applicable to the Jewish nation when they rejected the gospel of Christ; though they followed after the law of righteousness, they attained not to righteousness, because they sought it not by faith, Rom. ix. 31, 32.

2. Now God says that, whatever they think, the one in presumption, the other in despair, (1) Salvation shall be certainly wrought for God's people. If men will not do them justice, God will. He will place salvation in Zion, that is, he will make Jerusalem a place of safety and defence to all those who will plant themselves there. (2) It shall be very shortly wrought.

CHAP. XLVII

Infinite Wisdom could have ordered things so that Israel might have been released and yet Babylon unhurt; but if they will harden their hearts, and will not let the people go, they must thank themselves that their ruin is made to pave the way to Israel's release. That ruin is here to encourage Israel's faith and hope concerning deliverance, and to be a type of the downfall of that great enemy of the New Testament church which, in the Revelation, goes under the name of "Babylon". In this chapter we have, I. The ruin threatened, that Babylon should be brought down to the dust, ver. 1–5. II. The sins that provoked God to bring this ruin upon them. 1. Their cruelty to the people of God, ver. 6. 2. Their pride and carnal security, ver. 7–9. 3. Their contempt of God, ver. 10. 4. Their use of magic arts and their dependence upon enchantments and sorceries, ver. 11–15.

Verses 1–6

In these verses God by the prophet sends a messenger to Babylon, like that of Jonah to Nineveh: "The time is at hand when Babylon shall be destroyed." Fair warning is thus given her, that she may by repentance prevent the ruin and there may be a lengthening of her tranquillity.

I. God's controversy with Babylon. She has made God her enemy. Let her know that the righteous Judge, to whom vengeance belongs, has said (v. 3), I will take vengeance. He says, "I will not meet thee as a man, not with the strength of a man, which is easily resisted, but with the power of a God, which cannot be resisted. Not with the justice of a man, which may be bribed, but with the justice of a God, which can never be evaded."

II. The particular ground of this controversy. God will plead his people's cause against them. It is acknowledged (v. 6) that God had delivered his people into the hands of the Babylonians, had made use of them for the correction of his children, and had by their means polluted his inheritance. But the Babylonians carried the matter too far, and, when they had them in their hands with a base and servile spirit they trampled upon them, and showed them no mercy. They laid the yoke on very heavily, adding affliction to the afflicted, on the ancient—the elders in years, who were past their labour, and must sink under a yoke—the elders in office.

III. The terror of this controversy. She has reason to tremble when she is told who it is that has this quarrel with her (v. 4). "He is the Lord of hosts, that has all the creatures at his command, and therefore has all power both in heaven and in earth. He is the Holy One of Israel, a God in covenant with us." This may fitly be applied to Christ, our great Redeemer He is both Lord of hosts and the Holy One of Israel.

IV. The consequences of it to Babylon. She was beautiful as a virgin, and courted by all about her; she had been called tender and delicate (v. 1), and the lady of kingdoms (v. 5); but now the case is altered. Her honour is gone, and she must bid farewell to all her dignity. Her power is gone, and she must bid farewell to all her dominion. There is no throne, none for thee, O daughter of the Chaldeans! Those that abuse their honour or power provoke God to deprive them of it, and to make them come down and sit in the dust. Her ease and pleasure are gone: "She shall no more be called tender and delicate, but shall be put to hard service and made to feel both want and pain. Her liberty is gone, and she is brought into a state of servitude and sore bondage." Even the great men of Babylon must now receive the same law from the conquerors that they used to give to the conquered: "Take the millstones and grind meal (v. 2), set to work, to hard labour which will make thee sweat so that thou must throw off all thy head-dresses, and uncover thy locks." At the capricious humours of their masters, they must be forced to wade through the waters, to make bare the leg and uncover the thigh, that they might pass over the rivers, which would be a great mortification. All her glory, and all her glorying, are gone. Instead of glory, she has ignominy (v. 3). Thy nakedness shall be uncovered and thy shame shall be seen, according to the base and barbarous usage they commonly gave their captives. Instead of glorying she sits silently, and gets into darkness (v. 5), ashamed to show her face, for she shall no more be called the lady of kingdoms.

Babylon, now doomed to ruin, is here justly upbraided with her pride, in the day of her prosperity, and particularly in the prognostications and counsels of the astrologers.

I. The Babylonians are here upbraided with their pride and haughtiness; it was the language both of the government and of the body of the people: Thou sayest in thy heart I am, and none else besides me, v. 8 and 10. It is the very word that God has often said concerning himself, I am, and none else besides me, denoting his self-existence, his infinite and incomparable perfections, and his sole supremacy.

II. They are upbraided with their luxury and love of ease (v. 8): "Thou that art given to pleasures and dwellest carelessly and layest nothing to heart." Great wealth and plenty are great temptations to sensuality, and, where there is fulness of bread, there is commonly abundance of idleness.

III. They are upbraided with their carnal security and their vain confidence.

1. The cause of their security. They thought themselves safe. They lulled themselves asleep in ease and pleasure, and dreamt of nothing else but that tomorrow should be as this day, and much more abundant. They did not remember the latter end of it—the latter end of their prosperity, that it is a fading flower, and will wither—the latter end of their iniquity, that it will be bitterness. She did not remember her latter end (so some read it).

2. The ground of their security. They trusted in their wickedness and in their wisdom, v. 10. Their power and wealth, which they had gotten by fraud and oppression, were their confidence. They doubt not but they shall be too hard for all their enemies, because they dare lie, and kill, and forswear themselves, and do anything for their interest. Their policy and craft, which they called their wisdom, were their confidence. But their wisdom and knowledge perverted them.

3. The expressions of their security. Three things this proud and haughty monarchy said, in her security: (1) "I shall be a lady for ever," v. 7. Thus the New Testament Babylon says, I sit as a queen, and shall see no sorrow, Rev. xviii. 7. (2) "I shall not sit as a widow, in solitude and sorrow, shall never lose the power and wealth I am thus wedded to; the monarchy shall never want a monarch to espouse and protect it, and be a husband to the state; nor shall I know the loss of children," v. 8. (3) "No one sees me when I do amiss, and therefore there will be none to call me to an account," v. 10.

4. The punishment of their security. It shall be their ruin. "These two things shall come upon thee (the very two things that thou didst set at defiance), loss of children and widowhood, v. 9. Both thy princes and thy people shall be cut off, so that thou shalt be no more a government, no more a nation." It will be a sudden and surprising ruin. "Evil shall come upon thee (v. 11) and thou shalt have neither time nor way to prepare for it; for thou shalt not know whence it rises, and therefore shalt not know where to stand upon thy guard." Babylon pretended to great wisdom and knowledge (v. 10), but with all her knowledge she cannot foresee, nor with all her wisdom prevent, the ruin threatened. Fair warning was indeed given them, by Isaiah and other prophets of the Lord, of this desolation; but they slighted that notice, and would give no credit to it.

IV. They are upbraided with their divinations, their magical and astrological arts and sciences.

This is one of their provoking sins, v. 9. "These evils shall come upon thee to punish thee for the multitude of thy sorceries, and the great abundance of thy enchantments." Witchcraft is a sin in giving that honour to the devil which is due to God only, making God's enemy our guide. In Babylon it had the protection of the government. They are here upbraided with the mighty pains they had taken about their sorceries: Thou hast laboured in them from thy youth, v. 12. They had their astrologers, or viewers of the heavens, that under pretence of foretelling future events by them, viewed the heavens and forget him that made them. They had their star-gazers, who by the motions of the stars, their conjunctions and oppositions, read the doom of states and kingdoms. They are upbraided with the utter inability and insufficiency of all these pretenders in the day of their distress. This baffling of the diviners was literally fulfilled when, the night that Babylon was taken and Belshazzar slain, all his astrologers, soothsayers, and wise men, were quite nonplussed with the handwriting on the wall that pronounced the fatal sentence, Dan. v. 8. They are upbraided with the fall of the wise men themselves in the common ruin, v. 14. They shall be as stubble before a consuming fire. The Persians, to make room for their own wise men, will cut off those of Babylon; that fire shall burn them, and they shall not deliver themselves from the power of the flame. These astrologers, that dealt in the black art, were in effect their merchants; fortune-telling was one of the best trades in Babylon. Yet when some were devoured, others fled their country, everyone to his quarter, and there was none to save Babylon.

CHAP. XLVIII

God, having in the foregoing chapter reckoned with the Babylonians, comes, in this chapter, to show the house of Jacob their sins, but, withal, the mercy God had in store for them, that by their repentance and reformation they might be prepared for that mercy. I. He charges them with hypocrisy in that which is good and obstinacy in that which is evil, especially in their idolatry, ver. 1–8. II. He assures them that their deliverance would be wrought, not for any merit of theirs, ver. 9–11. III. He encourages them to depend purely upon God's power and promise for this deliverance, ver. 12–15. IV. He shows them that, as it was by their own sin that they brought themselves into captivity, so it would be only by the grace of God that they would obtain their enlargement, ver. 16–19. V. He proclaims their release, yet with a proviso that the wicked shall have no benefit by it, ver. 20–22.

Verses 1–8

I. The hypocritical profession which many of the Jews made of religion and relation to God.

1. How high their profession of religion soared, and what a good face they put upon a very bad heart. (1) They were the house of Jacob; they had a place and a name in the visible church. Jacob have I loved. (2) They were called by the name of Israel, an honourable name. Israel signifies a prince with God; and they prided themselves in being of that princely race. (3) They came forth out of the waters of Judah, and were of the royal tribe, the tribe that adhered to God when the rest revolted. (4) They swore by the name of the Lord, and thereby owned him to be the true God. (5) They made mention of the God of Israel in their prayers and praises. (6) They called themselves of the holy city. (7) They stayed themselves upon the God of Israel, and boasted of his promises and his covenant with them; they leaned on the Lord, Mic. iii. 11.

2. How low their profession of religion sunk, notwithstanding all this. It was all in vain. Their hearts were not true nor right in these professions.

II. The means God used to keep them close to himself, and to prevent their turning aside to idolatry. The many excellent laws he gave them would not serve to restrain them from sin, and therefore to those God added remarkable prophecies, and remarkable providences, which were all designed to convince them that it was their duty to adhere to him. 1. He favoured them with remarkable prophecies (v. 3): I have declared the former things from the beginning. Nothing material happened to their nation from its original which was not prophesied of before—their bondage in Egypt, their deliverance thence, the situation of their tribes in Canaan, &c. The very calamities they were now groaning under in Babylon God did from the beginning declare to them, Lev. xxvi. 31, &c.; Deut. xxviii. 26, &c.; xxix. 28. He also declared to them their return to God, and to their own land again, Deut. xxx. 4, &c.; Lev. xxvi. 44, 45. 2. He dignified them with remarkable providences (v. 6): I have shown thee new things from this time. He showed them new things by the prophets of their own day, and created them. They were hidden things, which they could not otherwise know, as the prophecy concerning Cyrus and the exact time of their release out of Babylon. These things God created now, v. 7. "Consider," says God, "how it was told you by the prophets, when it was the furthest thing from your thoughts, when you had not any reason to expect it (v. 7, 8), when the thing seemed utterly impossible." God had shown them hidden things, and done for them great things. "Now," says he (v. 6), "thou hast heard; see all this. Thou hast heard the prophecy; see the accomplishment of it. Will you not own that your God has been a good God to you? Declare this to his honour, and your own shame."

III. The reasons why God would take this method with them.

1. Because he would anticipate their boasting of themselves and their idols. "I spoke of it," says God, "lest thou shouldst say, My idol has done it or has commanded it to be done," v. 5. Those that were not so profane as to have ascribed the thing itself to an idol were yet so proud as to have pretended that by their own sagacity they foresaw it.

2. God took pains with them, because he knew they were obstinate, v. 4. I knew that thou wast hard; so the word is. "Thy neck is an iron sinew, unapt to submit to the yoke of God's commandments; not flexible to the will of God, nor manageable by his providence. Thy brow is brass; thou art impudent and canst not blush, but wilt thrust on in the way of thy heart." God sent his prophets to them, but they did not hear, they would not know. Thou wast called and not miscalled, a transgressor from the womb. They were prone to idolatry. They were murmurers as soon as ever they began their march to Canaan. Therefore I knew that thou wouldst deal very treacherously.

Verses 9–15

The deliverance of God's people out of their captivity in Babylon was so improbable that there was need of the encouragement of God's people concerning it. Two things were discouraging—their own unworthiness that God should do it for them and the many difficulties in the thing itself; now both these discouragements are removed,

I. A reason why God would do it for them, though they were unworthy, v. 9–11. 1. It is true they had been very provoking. Their captivity was the punishment of their iniquity. "But," says God, "I will defer my anger" (or, rather, stifle and suppress it). And why will God thus stay his hand? For my name's sake; because this people was called by his name, and, if they were cut off, the enemies would blaspheme his name. It is for my praise; because it would redound to the honour of his mercy. 2. It is true they were corrupt and ill-disposed, but God would make them fit for the mercy he intended for them: "I have refined thee, that thou mightest be made a vessel of honour." And this accounts for his bringing them into the trouble, and continuing them in it so long as he did. It was not to cut them off, but to do them good. He therefore takes them as they are, refined in part only, and not thoroughly. "I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction, and then designed thee for great things." Many have been brought home to God as chosen vessels and a good work of grace has been begun in them in the furnace of affliction. God will do it, not because he owes them such a favour, but that they may not be polluted by the insolent triumphs of the heathen, who, in triumphing over Israel, thought they triumphed over the God of Israel. Moses pleaded this often with God: Lord, what will the Egyptians say?

II. Here is a proof that God could do it for them, though they were unable to help themselves and the thing seemed altogether impracticable. They are called according to his purpose, called by him out of Egypt. (Hos. xi. 1) and now out of Babylon. He will deliver them by his own strength. They need not fear then, for He is God alone, and the eternal God (v. 12): "I am he who can do what I will and will do what is best. I am the first; I also am the last." What room then is left to doubt of their deliverance when he undertakes it? He is the God that made the world, and he that did that can do anything, v. 13. If the palm of his right hand (so the margin reads it) has gone so far as to stretch out the heavens, what will he do with his outstretched arm? He has the command of all the hosts of earth and heaven. They stand up together, helping one another in the service of their Maker. If God therefore will deliver his people, he cannot be at a loss for instruments in effecting their deliverance. "All you of the house of Jacob, assemble yourselves, and hear this for your comfort, Which among them, among the gods of the heathen, or their wise men, has declared these things, or could declare them?" (v. 14). None could out-see him, and therefore we may be sure that none could outdo him. Cyrus is the man who must do it. The Lord has loved him (v. 14); he has done him this honour, to make him an instrument in the redemption of his people and therein a type of the great Redeemer, God's beloved Son, in whom he was well pleased. I have called him, and therefore will bear him out. "I have brought him from a far country, brought him step by step, beyond his own intentions." Cyrus will do God's pleasure on Babylon. His arm (Cyrus's army, and in it God's arm) shall come, and be upon the Chaldeans, to bring them down (v. 14); for, if God call him, he will certainly make his way prosperous, v. 15.

Jacob and Israel are summoned to hearken to God speaking in and by the prophet. Those that draw nigh to God may depend upon this, that his secret shall be with them.

I. God refers them to what he had said to them and done for them formerly. He had always spoken plainly to them from the beginning, by Moses and all the prophets: I have not spoken in secret; he did not deliver his oracles obscurely and ambiguously, but so that they might be understood, Hab. ii. 2. "From the time that they were first formed into a people there am I (he sent them prophets, raised them up judges, and frequently appeared for them), and therefore there I will be still."

II. The prophet himself asserts his own commission: Now the Lord God has by his Spirit sent me, v. 16. Whom God sends, the Spirit sends.

III. God by the prophet sends them a gracious message. The preface to this message is both awful and encouraging (v. 17): Thus saith Jehovah, the eternal God, thy Redeemer, for he is the Holy One, that cannot deceive. The same words that introduce the law, and give authority to that, introduce the promise, and give validity to that.

1. Here is the good work which God undertakes to fulfil in them. He that is their Redeemer will be their instructor: "I am thy God that teaches thee to profit, that is, teaches thee such things that belong to thy peace." Whom God redeems he teaches; whom he designs to deliver out of their afflictions he first teaches to profit by their afflictions. He leads them to the way and in the way by which they should go. He not only enlightens their eyes, but directs their steps. By his grace he leads them in the way of duty, by his providence he leads them in the way of deliverance.

2. Here is the goodwill which God declares he had for them, v. 18, 19. (1) As when he gave them his law, he earnestly wished they might be obedient, Deut. v. 29. O that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments; v. 18. This confirms what God had said and sworn that he has no pleasure in the death of sinners. (2) He assures them that, if they had been obedient, that would not only have prevented their captivity, but would have advanced and perpetuated their prosperity. "Thy peace should have been as a river; thou shouldst have enjoyed a series of mercies, one continually following another, as the waters of a river, which always last." Their honour, and the justice of their cause, should in all cases have borne down opposition by their own strength, as the waves of the sea. Such should their righteousness have been that nothing should have stood before it; whereas, now they had been disobedient, the current of their prosperity was interrupted, and their righteousness overpowered. The rising generation should have been numerous and prosperous; whereas they were now very few, as appears by the small number of the returning captives (Ezra ii. 64). The honour of Israel should still have been unstained, untouched: His name should not have been cut off, as now it is in the land of Israel, which is either desolate or inhabited by strangers; nor should it have been destroyed from before God. This should engage us (I might say, enrage us) against sin, that it has not only deprived us of the good things we have enjoyed, but prevented the good things God had in store for us. Nothing but a prerogative of mercy would have saved them.

3. Here is assurance given of the great work which God designed to work for them, even their salvation out of their captivity. God proclaimed, long before Cyrus did, that whoever would might return to his own land (v. 20). Send the tidings of it by word of mouth to the ends of the earth. This was a figure of the publishing of the gospel to all the world. Let them all know those whom God owns for his are such as he has dearly bought and paid for: The Lord has redeemed his servant Jacob. The bonds God had loosed tied them the faster to him. He that redeemed us has an unquestionable right to us. Those whom God designs to bring home to himself he will take care care of, that they want not for the neccssary expenses of their journey. Through the deserts, they thirsted not (v. 21), for in all their removals the water out of the rock followed them. He can fetch in necessary supplies for his people in a way that they think the least likely. This refers to what he did for them when he brought them out of Egypt; when all this was literally true. But it should now be in effect done again, in their return out of Babylon. God does his work as effectually by marvellous providences as by miracles. This is applicable to those treasures of grace laid up for us in Jesus Christ, from which all good flows to us as the water did to Israel out of the rock, for that rock is Christ. But (v. 22), though God's thoughts were thoughts of peace, yet to those that were wicked and hated to be reformed there is no peace, no peace with God or their own consciences. What have those to do with peace who are enemies to God?

CHAP. XLIX

Glorious things had been spoken in the previous chapters concerning the deliverance of the Jews out of Babylon; but the prophecy had a further intention, and was to have its full accomplishment in a redemption that should as far outdo these expressions as the other seemed to come short of them, even the redemption of the world by Jesus Christ. In this chapter we have, I. The designation of Christ, under the type of Isaiah, to his office as Mediator, ver. 1–3 II. The assurance given him of the success of his undertaking among the Gentiles, ver. 4–8. III. The redemption that should be wrought by him, ver. 9–12. IV. The encouragement given hence to the afflicted church, ver. 13–17. V. The addition of many to it, and the setting up of a church among the Gentiles, ver. 18–23. VI. A ratification of the prophecy of the Jews' release out of Babylon, which was to be the figure and type of all these blessings, ver. 24–26. If this chapter be rightly understood, we shall see ourselves to be more concerned in the prophecies relating to the Jews' deliverance out of Babylon than we thought we were.

Verses 1–6

I. The foregoing chapter was directed to the house of Jacob and the people of Israel, v. 1, 12. But this is directed to the isles (that is, the Gentiles, for they are called the isles of the Gentiles, Gen. x. 5) and to the people from far, that were strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, and afar off. Let these listen. The tidings of a Redeemer are sent to the Gentiles, and they listened to the gospel when the Jews were deaf to it.

II. The great author of the redemption produces his authority from heaven. 1. God had appointed him; The Lord has called me from the womb to this office and made mention of my name, nominated me to be the Saviour. By an angel he called him Jesus—a Saviour, who should save his people from their sins, Matt. i. 21. This was said of some of the prophets, as types of him, Jer. i. 5. Paul was separated to the apostleship from his mother's womb, Gal. i. 15. 2. God had fitted him for the service. He made his mouth like a sharp sword, and made him like a polished shaft, or a bright arrow, to fight God's battles against the powers of darkness, to conquer Satan, and bring back God's revolted subjects to their allegiance, by his word: that is the two-edged sword (Heb. iv. 12). 3. God had preferred him to the service for which he had reserved him: He has hidden me in the shadow of his hand, which denotes, (1) Concealment. The gospel of Christ, and the calling in of the Gentiles by it, were long hidden in the shadow of the ceremonial law and the Old Testament types. (2) Protection. The house of David was the particular care of the divine Providence, because that blessing was in it. Christ in his infancy was sheltered from the rage of Herod. God had owned him, had said unto him, Thou art my servant, thou art Israel, in effect, the prince with God. Some read the words in two clauses: Thou art my servant (so Christ is, ch. xlii. 1); it is Israel in whom I will be glorified by thee; it is the spiritual Israel, the elect, in the salvation of whom by Jesus Christ, God will be glorified.

III. He is assured of the good success of his undertaking.

1. The discouragement he had met with at his first setting out (v. 4): "Then I said, with a sad heart, I have laboured in vain; those that were careless, and strangers to God, are so still: I have called, and they have refused; I have stretched out my hands to a gainsaying people." This was Isaiah's complaint. The same was a temptation to Jeremiah to resolve he would labour no more, Jer. xx. 9. It is the complaint of many a faithful minister, that has not loitered, but laboured, not spared, but spent, his strength, and himself with it, and yet, as to many, it is all in vain: they will not repent and believe. But here it seems to point at the obstinacy of the Jews, among whom Christ went in person preaching the gospel of the kingdom, laboured and spent his strength, and yet the rulers and the body of the nation rejected him and his doctrine. Let not the ministers think it strange that they are slighted when the Master himself was.

2. He comforts himself under this discouragement with this consideration, that it was the cause of God in which he was engaged: Yet surely my judgment is with the Lord, who is the Judge of all, and my work with my God, whose servant I am. His comfort may be the comfort of all faithful ministers, when they see little success of their labours. They are with God, and for God; they are on his side, and workers together with him. "He knows the way that I take; my judgment is with the Lord, to determine whether I have not delivered my soul and left the blood of those that perish on their own heads." Though the labour be in vain as to those that are laboured with, yet not as to the labourer himself, if he be faithful: the Lord will justify him and bear him out, though men condemn him. The work is with the Lord, to give them success, according to his purpose, in his own way and time.

3. He receives from God a further answer, v. 5, 6. Those whom God designs to employ as his servants he is fashioning and preparing when perhaps neither themselves nor others are aware of it. Christ was to be his servant, to bring Jacob again to him, that had treacherously departed from him. The seed of Jacob therefore, according to the flesh, must first be dealt with, and means used to bring them back. Christ, and the word of salvation by him, are sent first to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. But what if Jacob will not be brought back to God and Israel will not be gathered? In that case, (1) Christ will be glorious in the eyes of the Lord. Though few of the Jewish nation were converted by Christ's preaching and miracles, and many loaded him with ignominy, yet God made him glorious, at his baptism, and in his transfiguration, spoke to him from heaven, sent angels to minister to him, made even his shameful death glorious, much more his resurrection. In his sufferings God was his strength, so that though he met with all the discouragement imaginable, yet he did not fail nor was discouraged. An angel was sent from heaven to strengthen him, Luke xxii. 43. Faithful ministers, though they see not the fruit of their labours, shall yet be accepted of God, and in that they shall be truly glorious. (2) The gospel shall be glorious in the eyes of the world; it shall be entertained by the nations, v. 6. The Messiah seemed as if he had been primarily designed to bring Jacob back, v. 5. But it is comparatively but a small matter; a larger sphere of usefulness, is designed him: "And therefore I will give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation to the end of the earth." Hence Simeon learned to call Christ a light to lighten the Gentiles (Luke ii. 32), and St. Paul's exposition serves for a key to the context, Acts xiii. 47. Therefore, says he, we turn to the Gentiles, to preach the gospel to them, because so has the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee to be a light to the Gentiles. In this the Redeemer was truly glorious, the setting up of his kingdom in the Gentile world was more his honour than if he had raised up all the tribes of Jacob. This promise is in part fulfilled already, and will have a further accomplishment.

Verses 7–12

I. The humiliation and exaltation of the Messiah (v. 7). He was one whom man despised. He is despised and rejected of men, ch. liii. 3. Man, whom he came to save and to put honour upon, yet despised him and put contempt upon him. They not only made him despicable, but odious. He was one whom the nation abhorred; they cried out, Crucify him, crucify him. He was a servant of rulers, trampled upon, abused, scourged, and crucified as a slave. Yet Herod the king stood in awe of him, saying, It is John the Baptist; noblemen, rulers, centurions came and kneeled to him. It is for the honour of his kingdom among men when the great ones of the earth appear for him and do homage to him. This shall be the accomplishment of God's promise, and he will give him the heathen for his inheritance.

II. The blessings he has in store for all those to whom he is made salvation. God will own and stand by him in his undertaking (v. 8). Violent attacks were made upon Lord Jesus by the powers of darkness, when it was their hour, to drive him off from his undertakings, but God promises to preserve him and would preserve his kingdom among men, though fought against on all sides.

1. He shall be guarantee of the treaty of peace between God and man: I will give thee for a covenant of the people. It was in him that God was reconciling the world to himself; and he that spared not his own Son will deny us nothing. He is given for a covenant, as he is the blessed days-man who has laid his hand upon us both.

2. He shall repair the decays of the church and build it upon a rock. He shall cause the desolate heritages to be inherited; so the cities of Judah were after the return out of captivity, and so the church, which in the last and degenerate ages of the Jewish nation had been as a country laid waste, was again replenished by the fruits of the preaching of the gospel.

3. He shall free the souls of men from the bondage of guilt and corruption and bring them into the glorious liberty of God's children. He shall say to the prisoners that were bound under the power of Satan, Go forth, v. 9. Pardoning mercy is a release from the curse of the law, and renewing grace is a release from the dominion of sin. Both are from Christ. It is he that says, Go forth; it is the Son that makes us free, and then we are free indeed. He saith to those that are in darkness, Show yourselves; "not only see, but be seen, to the glory of God and your own comfort."

4. He shall provide for the comfortable passage of those whom he sets at liberty to the place of their happy settlement, v. 9–11. These verses refer to the provision made for the Jews' return, but they are applicable to that guidance of divine grace which all God's spiritual Israel are under. The world leads its followers by broken cisterns, or brooks that fail in summer; but God leads those that are his by springs of water. And those whom God guides shall find a ready road (v. 11): I will make all my mountains a way.

5. He shall bring them all together from all parts, that they may return in a body, that they may encourage one another. They were dispersed as their enemies pleased, to prevent any combination among themselves. But, when God's time shall come to bring them home together, one spirit shall animate them all, v. 12. Here shall a party come from far, some from the north, some from the west, some from the land of Sinim, a country belonging to one of the chief cities of Egypt, called Sin, of which we read, Ezek. xxx. 15, 16.

Verses 13–17

The return of the people of God, and the eternal redemption to be wrought out by Christ (of which that was a type), would be great occasions of joy and great proofs of the tender care God has of the church.

I. Nothing can furnish us with better matter for songs of praise and thanksgiving, v. 13. Let there be joy in heaven; let the earth and the mountains be joyful, and break forth into singing (Rom. viii. 19, 21), for God has comforted his people that were in sorrow.

II. Nothing can furnish us with more convincing arguments to prove the most tender concern God has for his church.

1. The troubles of the church have given some occasion to question God's care for it, v. 14. Zion, in distress, said, The Lord has forsaken me, and looks after me no more. Infidels, in their presumption, say God has forsaken the earth (Ezek. viii. 12). Weak believers, in their despondency, are ready to say, God has forsaken his church. But we have no more reason to question his promise and grace than we have to question his providence and justice.

2. The triumphs of the church, after her troubles, will put the matter out of question. What God will do for Zion we are told, v. 17. Her friends, who had deserted her, shall be gathered to her: Thy children shall make haste. Converts to the faith of Christ are the children of the church; they shall join themselves to her with great readiness. "Thy builders shall make haste" (so some read it), "who shall build up thy houses, thy walls, especially thy temple." Her enemies, who had threatened, shall be forced to withdraw from her. By Christ the prince of this world, the great destroyer, is cast out, and his attempts quite baffled. Zion's suggestions were altogether groundless. God had not forsaken her, nor forgotten her, nor ever will. "You think that I have forgotten you. Can a woman forget her sucking child?" A mother cannot but be concerned for her own child; for it is a piece of herself, and very lately one with her. It is possible that she may forget. But, says God, I will not forget thee. He has a constant care of his church and people (v. 16): I have engraven thee upon the palms of my hands. This alludes to the custom of those who tie a string upon their hands or fingers to put them in mind of things which they are afraid they shall forget, or to the wearing of signet or locket-rings in remembrance of some dear friend. His setting them thus as a seal upon his arm denotes his setting them as a seal upon his heart, and his being ever mindful of them and their interests. He adds, "Thy walls shall be continually before me; thy ruined walls, though no pleasing spectacle, shall be in my thoughts of compassion. The plan and model of thy walls, that are to be rebuilt, is before me, and they shall certainly be built according to it."

Verses 18–23

Two things are promised to be in part accomplished in the reviving of the Jewish church after its return, but more fully in the planting of the Christian church by the preaching of the gospel of Christ:

I. The church shall be replenished with great numbers added to it. It was promised (v. 17) that her children should make haste.

1. Multitudes shall flock to the church from all parts. Look round, and see how they gather themselves to thee (v. 18), by a local accession to the Jewish church. They come to Jerusalem for that was then the centre of their unity; but, under the gospel, it is by a spiritual accession to the mystical body of Christ in faith and love.

2. Such as are added to the church shall not be a burden and blemish to her, but her strength and ornament. As I live, saith the Lord, thou shalt surely clothe thyself with them all. When those that are added to the church are serious, and holy, and exemplary in their conversation, they are an ornament to it.

3. The country which was waste and desolate, and without inhabitant (ch. v. 9; vi. 11), shall be again peopled, nay, it shall be over-peopled (v. 19): "Thy waste and thy desolate places, that have long lain so, and the land of thy destruction, that land of thine which was destroyed with thee, shall now be so full of people that there shall be no room for the inhabitants." Thus the kingdom of God among men, which had been impoverished and almost depopulated, was again peopled and enriched by the setting up of the Christian church.

4. The new converts shall strangely increase and multiply. Jerusalem, after she has lost abundance of her children by sword, famine, and captivity, shall have a new family growing up, children which she shall have after she has lost the other (v. 20), as Seth, who was appointed another seed instead of Abel. God will repair his church's losses and secure to himself a seed to serve him in it. The children shall complain for want of room: "Our numbers increase so fast that the place is too strait for us"; as the sons of the prophets complained, 2 Kings vi. 1. But, strait as the place is, still more shall desire to be admitted, even when the poor and the maimed, the halt and the blind, are brought in, yet still there is room, room enough for those that are in and room for more, Luke xiv. 21, 22. The mother shall stand amazed at the increase of her family, v. 21. She shall say, Who has begotten me these? and, Who has brought up these? They come to her with all the affection of children; and yet she never bore any pain for them, but has them ready reared to her hand. The church is not perpetually visible, but there are times when it is desolate, and made few in number. Yet on the other hand its desolations shall not be perpetual. God will out of stones raise up children unto Abraham. Sometimes this is done in a very surprising way, as when a nation is born at once, ch. lxvi. 8.

5. This shall be done with the help of the Gentiles, v. 22. The Jews were cast off, among whom it was expected that the church should be built up. The Gentiles shall be called in. God will lift up his hand to them, to invite or beckon them, having all the day stretched it out in vain to the Jews, ch. lxv. 2. And he will set up his standard to them, the preaching of the everlasting gospel. They shall bring thy sons in their arms. They shall assist the sons of Zion, which are found among them, in their return to their own country. God can raise up friends for returning Israelites even among Gentiles. "Dost thou ask, Who has begotten and brought up these? Know that they were begotten and brought up among the Gentiles, but they are now brought into thy family."

II. The church shall have a prevailing interest in the nations, v. 22, 23. Kings shall be thy nursing fathers, to carry thy sons in their arms (as Moses, Num. xi. 12); and their queens shall be thy nursing mothers. This promise was in part fulfilled to the Jews, after their return out of captivity. Several of the kings of Persia countenanced and encouraged them, as Cyrus, Darius, and Artaxerxes; Esther the queen was a nursing mother to the Jews that remained in their captivity, putting her life in her hand to snatch the child out of the flames. The Christian church, after a long captivity, was happy in some such kings and queens as Constantine and his mother Helena, and afterwards Theodosius, and others, who nursed the church with all possible care and tenderness. The church in this world is in an infant state, and it is in the power of princes and magistrates to do it great service. Others who stand out against the church's interests, will be forced to yield. They shall bow down to thee and lick the dust. The promise to the church of Philadelphia seems to be borrowed from this (Rev. iii. 9): I will make those of the synagogue of Satan to come and worship before thy feet.

Verses 24–26

I. An objection against the promise of the Jews' release suggesting that it was not to be expected; for (v. 24) they were a prey in the hand of the mighty, and therefore it was not likely they should be rescued by force. They were lawful captives; by the law of God, having offended, they were justly delivered into captivity; and by the law of nations, being taken in war, they were justly detained in captivity till they should be ransomed or exchanged. Now this is spoken either by the enemies, as justifying themselves in their refusal to let them go, or by their friends, either in a way of distrust, or in a way of thankfulness. "Who would have thought that ever the prey should be taken from the mighty? Yet it is done." This is applicable to our redemption by Christ.

II. This objection answered by express promises. "Even the captives of the mighty, though they are mighty, shall be taken away; and the prey of the terrible, though they are terrible, shall be delivered; they cannot with all their impudence outface, the deliverance and the counsels of God concerning it" (v. 25). Here is a further promise God will bring judgments upon the oppressors, and so will work salvation for the oppressed: "I will contend with him that contends with thee, and thus I will save thy children." The captives shall be delivered by leading captivity captive, that is, sending those into captivity that had held God's people captive (v. 26): "I will feed those that oppress thee with their own flesh, and they shall be drunken with their own blood. The proud Babylonians shall become an easy prey to one another. Their ruin, which was begun by a foreign invasion, shall be completed by their intestine divisions. They shall bite and devour one another, till they are consumed one of another." See how cruel men sometimes are to themselves and to one another. They not only thirst after blood, but drink it with as much pleasure as if it were sweet wine.

III. The effect of Babylon's ruin: All flesh shall know that I the Lord am thy Saviour. God will make it to appear, to all the world, that, though Israel seem lost, they have a Redeemer.

CHAP. L

I. Those to whom God sends are justly charged with bringing all the troubles they were in upon themselves, it being made to appear that God was able and ready to help them if they had been fit for deliverance, ver. 1–3. II. He by whom God sends produces his commission (ver. 4), alleges his own readiness to submit to all the sufferings he was called to in the execution of it (ver. 5, 6), and assures himself that God, who sent him, would bear him out against all opposition, ver. 7–9. III. The message that is sent is life and death, comfort to desponding saints and terror to presuming sinners, ver. 10, 11. Now all this seems to have a double reference, 1. To the unbelieving Jews in Babylon, and to the prophet Isaiah. 2. To the unbelieving Jews in our Saviour's time, whose own fault it was that they were rejected, Christ having preached much to them, and suffered much from them. The prophet concludes with an exhortation to trust in God and not in ourselves.

Verses 1–3

Those who have professed to be the people of God, and yet seem to be dealt severely with, are apt to complain of God. But, in answer to their murmurings, we have,

I. A challenge given them to prove that the quarrel began on God's side, v. 1. He had been a husband to them; and husbands were then allowed a power to put away their wives upon any little disgust, Deut. xxiv. 1; Matt. xix. 7. But they could not say that God had dealt so with them. It is true they were now separated from him, and had abode many days without ephod, altar, or sacrifice; but whose fault was that? He had been a father to them; and fathers had then a power to sell their children for slaves to their creditors, in satisfaction for debts. Now it is true the Jews were sold to the Babylonians then, and afterwards to the Romans; but did God sell them for payment of his debts? No, he was not indebted to any of those to whom they were sold.

II. A charge, showing that they were themselves the authors of their own ruin: "Behold, for your iniquities, for the pleasure of them and the gratification of your own base lusts, you have sold yourselves, for your iniquities you are sold. You sold yourselves to work wickedness, and therefore God justly sold you into the hands of your enemies," 2 Chron. xii. 5, 8. The Jews were sent into Babylon for their idolatry, and were at last rejected for crucifying the Lord of glory; these were the iniquities for which they were sold and put away.

III. The confirmation of this challenge and this charge. God came and offered them his favour, offered them his helping hand, either to prevent their trouble or to deliver them out of it, but they slighted him and his grace. "Do you lay it upon me?" (says God); "tell me, then, wherefore, when I came, was there no man to meet me, when I called, was there none to answer me?" v. 2. God came to them by his servants the prophets, but there was no man that had any regard to the warnings which the prophets gave them. Because they mocked the messengers of the Lord, therefore God brought upon them the king of the Chaldeans, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16, 17. Last of all he sent unto them his Son. He came to his own, but his own received him not; they knew not, because they would not know, the things that belonged to their peace, and for that transgression it was that they were put away and their house was left desolate, Matt. xxi. 41; xxiii. 37, 38; Luke xix. 41, 42. It is plain that it was not owing to a want of power in God, for he is almighty, and could have recovered them from so great a death; nor was it owing to a want of power in Christ, for he is able to save to the uttermost. Can this man save us? For himself he cannot save. "But" (says God) "is my hand shortened at all, or is it weakened?" Can any limits be set to Omnipotence? Cannot he redeem who is the great Redeemer? The expression our Saviour sometimes used concerning the power of faith, that it will remove mountains and plant sycamores in the sea, is not unlike this; if their faith could do that, no doubt their faith would save them.

Verses 4–9

Our Lord Jesus, having proved himself able to save, here shows himself as willing as he is able. We suppose the prophet Isaiah to say something of himself in these verses, encouraging himself to go on in his work as a prophet, notwithstanding hardships, not doubting but that God would strengthen him; but, like David, he speaks of himself as a type of Christ.

I. As an acceptable preacher. Isaiah, as a prophet, was qualified for the work to which he was called, but Christ was anointed with the Spirit above his fellows. To make the man of God perfect, he has, 1. The tongue of the learned, to know how to give instruction, how to speak a word in season to him that is weary, v. 4. God gave to Christ the tongue of the learned, for the comfort of those that are weary and heavily laden under the burden of sin, Matt. xi. 28. See what is the best learning of a minister, to know how to comfort troubled consciences, and to speak properly, and plainly, to the various cases of poor souls. An ability to do this is God's gift. 2. The ear of the learned, to receive instruction. Prophets have as much need of this as of the tongue of the learned; for they must hear the word from God's mouth attentively, that they may speak it exactly, Ezek. iii. 17. None must undertake to be teachers who have not first been learners. Christ's apostles were first disciples. Those that would hear as the learned must be awake, for we are naturally drowsy and hear by halves and do not heed. We need to be awakened morning by morning. The morning, when our spirits are most lively, is a proper time for communion with God. The people came early in the morning to hear Christ in the temple (Luke xxi. 38), for, it seems, his were morning lectures.

II. As a patient sufferer, v. 5, 6. One who is commissioned to speak comfort to the weary has hard work to do and hard usage to undergo. My ear hast thou opened; then said I, Lo, I come; I was not rebellious, neither turned away back. Though he foresaw difficulty and discouragement, though he was to give constant attendance as a servant, though he was to humble himself to that which was very mean, yet he did not fly off, did not fail, nor was discouraged. In submission he resigned himself. I gave my back to the smiters; I gave my cheeks to those that not only smote them, but plucked off the hair of the beard, which was a greater degree both of pain and of ignominy. I hid not my face from shame and spitting. All this Christ underwent for us, and voluntarily, to convince us of his willingness to save us.

III. As a courageous champion, v. 7–9. The Redeemer is as famous for his boldness as for his humility and patience, and, though he yields, yet he is more than a conqueror. What was the prophet Isaiah's support was the support of Christ himself (v. 7): The Lord God will help me; and again, v. 9. God, having laid help upon his Son for us, gave help to him, and his hand was all along with the man of his right hand. He is near that justifieth me. Isaiah, no doubt, was loaded with reproach and calumny, as other prophets were; but he despised the reproach, knowing that God would roll it away and bring forth his righteousness as the light, perhaps in this world (Ps. xxxvii. 6), at furthest in the great day, when there will be a resurrection of names as well as bodies, and the righteous shall shine forth as the morning sun. "If God will help me, if he will justify me, will stand by me and bear me out, I shall not be confounded. I know that I shall not be ashamed." In this confidence he bids defiance to all opposers and opposition: God will help me, and therefore have I set my face like a flint. The prophet was bold in reproving sin, in warning sinners (Ezek. iii. 8, 9), and in asserting the truth of his predictions. Christ went on in his work, as Mediator, with unshaken constancy and undaunted resolution. Who will contend with me, either in law or by the sword? Let us stand together, as combatants, or as the plaintiff and defendant. Many offered to dispute with Christ, but he put them to silence. The prophet speaks this in the name of all faithful ministers; those who keep close to the pure word of God, in delivering their message, need not fear contradiction. Great is the truth and will prevail. Christ speaks this in the name of all believers, speaks it as their champion. Who is he that shall condemn me? The prophet perhaps was condemned to die; Christ we are sure was; and yet both could say, Who is he that shall condemn? For there is no condemnation to those whom God justifies. The righteous cause of Christ and his prophets shall outlive all opposition. The moth shall eat them up silently and insensibly; a little thing will serve to destroy them.

Verses 10–11

The prophet, having the tongue of the learned, here makes use of it. It is the summary of the gospel. He that believes shall be saved, though for a while he walk in darkness, but he that believes not, though for a while he walk in the light of his own fire, yet he shall lie down in sorrow.

I. Comfort is here spoken to disconsolate saints, and they are encouraged to trust in God's grace, v. 10. A child of God is one that fears the Lord with a filial fear, that stands in awe of his majesty and is afraid of incurring his displeasure. He is one that obeys the voice of God's servant, is willing to be ruled by the Lord Jesus in the great work of man's redemption. Those that truly fear God will obey the voice of Christ. It is no new thing for the children and heirs of light sometimes to walk in darkness, and for a time not to have any glimpse or gleam of light. He that is thus in the dark, Let him trust in the name of the Lord, in the goodness of his nature, his wisdom, power, and goodness. The name of the Lord is a strong tower. If he walk before God, which a man may do though he walk in the dark, he shall find God all-sufficient to him. Let him keep hold of his covenant-relation to God, and call God his God, as Christ on the cross, My God, My God.

II. Presuming sinners are warned not to trust in themselves, v. 11. They kindle a fire, and walk in the light of that fire. They depend upon their own righteousness, and burn their incense, with that fire (as Nadab and Abihu) and not with the fire from heaven. They compass themselves about with sparks of their own kindling. As they trust in their own righteousness, and not in the righteousness of Christ, so they place their happiness in their worldly possessions and enjoyments, and not in the favour of God. Creature-comforts are as sparks, short-lived and soon gone. They are ironically told to walk in the light of their own fire. Those that make the world their comfort, and their own righteousness their confidence, will meet with bitterness in the end. A godly man's way may be melancholy, but his end shall be peace and everlasting light. A wicked man's way may be pleasant, but his end will be darkness.

CHAP. LI

This chapter is designed for the encouragement of those that fear God and keep his commandments, even when they walk in darkness and have no light. Whenever the church of God is in distress her friends may comfort themselves and one another with these words, I. That God, who raised his church at first out of nothing, will take care that it shall not perish, ver. 1–3. II. That the righteousness and salvation he designs for his church are sure and near, ver. 4–6. III. That the persecutors of the church are weak creatures, ver. 7, 8. IV. That the same power which did wonders for the church formerly is now employed for her deliverance, ver. 9–11. V. That God himself, the Maker of the world, had undertaken to deliver his people out of their distress, and sent his prophet to assure them of it, ver. 12–16. VI. That, deplorable as the condition of the church now was (ver. 17–20), to the same woeful circumstances her persecutors and oppressors should shortly be reduced, ver. 21–23. The first three paragraphs of this chapter begin with, "Hearken unto me", and they are God's people that are all along called to hearken. The two other paragraphs of this chapter begin with "Awake, awake"; in the former (ver. 9) God's people call upon him to awake and help them; in the latter (ver. 17) God calls upon them to awake and help themselves.

Verses 1–3

The people of God are such as follow after righteousness, those that seek the Lord, for it is only in the way of righteousness that we can seek him with any hope of finding him. They are here directed to look back to their original, and the smallness of their beginning: "Look unto the rock whence you were hewn" (the idolatrous family in Ur of the Chaldees, out of which Abraham was taken, the generation of slaves which the heads and fathers of their tribes were in Egypt); "look unto the hole of the pit out of which you were digged, as clay, when God formed you into a people." How hard was that rock out of which we were hewn, unapt to receive impressions, and how miserable the hole of that pit out of which we were digged! The consideration of this should fill us with low thoughts of ourselves and high thoughts of divine grace. "Look unto Abraham your father, the father of all the faithful, of all that follow after the righteousness of faith as he did (Rom. iv. 11), and unto Sarah that bore you, and whose daughters you all are as long as you do well. Think how Abraham was called alone, and yet was blessed and multiplied: and let that encourage you to depend upon the promise of God. "Look unto Abraham, and see what he got by trusting in the promise of God, and take example by him to follow God with an implicit faith." They are here assured that their present tears should at length end in joys, v. 3. God will find out a time and way to comfort Zion. It is the greatest comfort of the church to be made serviceable to the glory of God, and to be as his garden in which he delights. He will make them cheerful, and give them hearts to rejoice. With the fruits of righteousness, joy and gladness shall be found therein; for the more holiness men have, and the more good they do, the more gladness they have.

Verses 4–8

The perpetuity of God's righteousness and his salvation.

I. This comfort belongs to "My people, and my nation, that I have set apart for myself, that own me and are owned by me." They are a people who know righteousness, and are able to form a right judgment of truth and falsehood, good and evil. And, as they have good heads, so they have good hearts, for they have the law of God in them. Even those who know righteousness, and have the law of God in their hearts, may yet be in great distress and loaded with reproach and contempt; but their God will comfort them.

II. The comfort that belongs to God's people. 1. The gospel of Christ shall be preached to the world: A law shall proceed from me, an evangelical law, the law of Christ, the law of faith, ch. ii. 3. This is that law of liberty by which the world shall be governed. It shall take deep root in the world, not only for the benefit of the Jews, but for a light of the people of other nations. 2. This law shall open a ready way to the children of men, that they may be justified and saved, v. 5. There is no salvation without righteousness; and, wherever there is the righteousness of God, there shall be his salvation. 3. This righteousness and salvation shall shortly appear: My righteousness is near. It is near in time and in place, Rom. x. 8. 4. This evangelical righteousness and salvation shall not be confined to the Jewish nation, but shall be extended to the Gentiles: My arms shall judge the people. Those that will not yield to the judgments of God's mouth shall be crushed by the judgments of his hand. Some shall thus be judged by the gospel, but others, and those of the isles, shall wait upon him, and bid his gospel, the commands as well as the comforts of it, welcome. It was a comfort to God's people, that multitudes should be added to them. It is added, And on my arm shall they trust, that arm of the Lord which is revealed in Christ, ch. liii. 1. 5. This righteousness and salvation shall be for ever, v. 8. As it shall spread through all the nations of the earth, so it shall last through all the ages of the world. The visible heavens above shall vanish like smoke; they shall be rolled like a scroll. The earth shall wax old like a garment. But when heaven and earth pass away, when all flesh and the glory of it wither as grass, the word of the Lord endures for ever. Those whose happiness is bound up in Christ's righteousness and salvation will have the comfort of it when time and days shall be no more.

III. If God's righteousness and salvation are near to them, then let them not fear the reproach of men, nor be afraid of their revilings, who bid you sing them the songs of Zion, or who ask you, in scorn, Where is now your God? Those can bear but little for Christ that cannot bear a hard word for him. Let us not fear the reproach of men. They will be quickly silenced (v. 8): The moth shall eat them up like a garment, ch. l. 9. The worm shall eat them like wool, or woollen cloth. The falsehood of their reproaches will be detected, but truth shall triumph. Clouds darken the sun, but give no obstruction to his progress.

Verses 9–16

I. A prayer that God would appear and act for the deliverance of his people. Awake, awake! put on strength, O arm of the Lord! v. 9. The arm of the Lord is Christ, or it is put for God himself, as Ps. xliv. 23. The arm of the Lord is said to awake when on his people's behalf it is stretched forth for action. God needs not to be reminded nor excited by us, but he gives us leave to be humbly earnest for such appearances of his power as will be for his own praise. The church sees her case bad, her enemies many and mighty, her friends few and feeble; and therefore she depends purely upon the strength of God's arm for her relief.

II. The pleas to enforce this prayer. 1. They plead precedents, their ancestors, and the great things God had done for them. "Let the arm of the Lord be made bare on our behalf. It did wonders against the Egyptians; it cut Rahab to pieces with one direful plague after another, and wounded Pharaoh, the dragon. It did wonders for Israel. It dried up the sea, to open a way for the ransomed to pass over," v. 10. Past experiences are good pleas in prayer. Thou hast; wilt thou not? Ps. lxxxv. 1–6. 2. They plead promises (v. 11): And the redeemed of the Lord shall return, that is (as it may be supplied), thou hast said, They shall, referring to ch. xxxv. 10. Sinners, when they are brought out of the slavery of sin into the glorious liberty of God's children, may come singing, as a bird got loose out of the cage. The souls of believers, when they are delivered out of the prison of the body, come to the heavenly Zion with singing. He that designs such joy for us at last will he not work such deliverances for us in the meantime as our case requires?

III. The answer immediately given to this prayer (v. 12): I, even I, am he that comforteth you. They prayed for the operations of his power; he answers them with the consolations of his grace, which may well be accepted as an equivalent. If God do not answer immediately with the saving strength of his right hand, we must be thankful if he answer us, as an angel himself was answered (Zech. i. 13) with good words and comfortable words. See how God resolves to comfort his people: He takes the work into his own hands: I, even I, will do it.

1. He comforts the timorous by chiding them: Why art thou cast down, and why disquieted? v. 12, 13.

(1) The absurdity of those fears. It is a disparagement to us to give way to them: Who art thou, that thou shouldst be afraid? It is absurd to be in such dread of a dying man. What! afraid of a man that shall die, who shall be made as grass, shall wither and be trodden down or eaten up? We ought to look upon every man as a man that shall die. Those we fear we must look upon as frail and mortal, and consider what a foolish thing it is for the servants of the living God to be afraid of dying men, that are here today and gone tomorrow. It is absurd to fear continually every day (v. 13). Now and then a danger may be imminent and threatening, and it may be prudent to fear it; but to be always in a toss, and to tremble at the shaking of every leaf, is to make ourselves all our lifetime subject to bondage (Heb. ii. 15). It is absurd to fear beyond what there is cause: "Thou art afraid of the fury of the oppressor. Where is the fury of the oppressor? It is gone in an instant, and the danger is over ere thou art aware." Pharaoh king of Egypt is but a noise, and the king of Babylon no more. What has become of all the furious oppressors of God's Israel, that were a terror to them? they passed away, and, lo, they were not; and so shall these.

(2) The impiety of those fears: "Thou art afraid of a man that shall die, and forgettest the Lord thy Maker, who is also the Maker of all the world." Our inordinate fear of man is a tacit forgetfulness of God. When we disquiet ourselves with the fear of man we forget that there is a God above him. We forget the experiences we have had of his care, and his interposition for our relief many a time, when we thought the oppressor ready to destroy; we forget our Jehovah-jirehs, monuments of mercy in the mount of the Lord.

2. He comforts those that were in bonds, v. 14, 15. The captive exile hastens that he may be loosed and may return to his own country, from which he is banished; his care is that he may not die in the pit (not die a prisoner), and that his bread should not fail. Now some understand this as his fault. He is impatient of delays, cannot wait God's time, but thinks he must die in the pit if he be not released immediately. Others take it to be his praise, that when the doors are thrown open he does not linger. And then it follows, But I am the Lord thy God, which intimates God will do for them that which they cannot do for themselves. He will find out a way to still the threatening storm, and bring them safely into the harbour. The Lord of hosts is his name, the name by which his people have long known him.

3. He comforts all his people who depended upon what the prophets said to them in the name of the Lord. When the deliverances which the prophets spoke of either did not come soon or did not come up to their expectation they began to be cast down; but are encouraged (v. 16) by what God says to his messenger, as he does here, I have put my words in thy mouth, that by them I may plant the heavens. God undertook to comfort his people (v. 12); but he does it by his prophets, by his gospel. He owns what they have said to be what he had enjoined them to say:

"I have put my words in thy mouth, and therefore he that receives thee and them receives me." God's Spirit revealed to them the words they should speak (2 Pet. i. 21; 1 Cor. ii. 13). I have covered thee in the shadow of my hand (as before, ch. xlix. 2) speaks the special protection not only of the prophets, but of their prophecies, not only of Christ, but of Christianity, of the gospel of Christ. "I have put my words in thy mouth, not that by the performance of them I may plant a nation, or found a city, but that I may plant the heavens and lay the foundations of the earth, which will be a new creation." This must look far forward to the great work done by the gospel of Christ and the setting up of his holy religion in the world. As God by Christ made the world at first (Heb. i. 2), so by him he will set up a new world, will again plant the heavens and found the earth. Sin having put the whole creation into disorder, Christ's taking away the sin of the world put all into order again.

Verses 17–23

A call to awake not so much out of the sleep of sin (though that also is necessary in order to their being ready for deliverance) as out of the stupor of despair. When the inhabitants of Jerusalem were in captivity they were so overwhelmed with the sense of their troubles that they had no heart to mind anything that tended to their comfort.

I. Jerusalem had long been in the depths of misery.

1. She had lain under the tokens of God's displeasure. He had put into her hand the cup of his fury. She had provoked him to anger and was made to taste the bitter fruits of it. The cup of God's fury is, and will be, a cup of trembling to all those that have it put into their hands. It is said (Ps. lxxv. 8) that the dregs of the cup, all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out, and drink them. Wherever there has been a cup of fornication, as there had been in Jerusalem's hand when she was idolatrous, sooner or later there will be a cup of fury.

2. Those that should have helped her in her distress failed her, v. 18. She staggers, and is very unsteady. She knows not what she says or does, much less what to say or do, and, in this unhappy condition, of all the sons that she has brought forth and brought up, there is none to guide her, none to lend either a hand to help her out of her trouble or a tongue to comfort her under it. These two things have come unto thee (v. 19), to complete thy desolation and destruction, even the famine and the sword, by which the city was wasted and by which the citizens perished. These two things that had come upon Jerusalem are the same with the two things that were afterwards to come upon Babylon (ch. xlvii. 9), loss of children and widowhood—piteous case that calls for comfort; and yet, when thou art froward under thy trouble, by whom shall I comfort thee? Those who should have been her comforters were their own tormenters (v. 20): They have fainted, driven to despair; they have no patience in which to keep possession of their own souls, nor any confidence in God's promise. They throw themselves upon the ground, in vexation at their troubles, and there they lie at the head of all the streets. There they lie like a wild bull in a net, fretting and raging, struggling to help themselves, but making their condition the worse by their own passions and discontents. Those that are of a froward peevish spirit never enquire wherefore he contends with them, and therefore nothing appears in them but anger at God.

II. It is promised that Jerusalem's troubles shall at length come to an end, and be transferred to her persecutors (v. 21): Nevertheless hear this, thou afflicted: "Thus saith thy Lord, the Lord, and thy God—the Lord, who is able to help thee—thy God, in covenant with thee, and who has undertaken to make thee happy—he is the God who pleads the cause of his people, who takes what is done against them as done against himself." It is his own cause; he has espoused it, and therefore will plead it. "I will take out of thy hand the cup of trembling, that bitter cup; it shall pass from thee." It is promised, "Thou shalt no more drink it again." Their persecutors and oppressors should be made to drink of the same bitter cup of which they had drunk so deeply, v. 23. Herein the New Testament Babylon treads in the steps of that old oppressor, tyrannizing over men's consciences, putting them upon the rack, and compelling them to sinful compliances. Babylon's case shall be as bad as ever Jerusalem's was. Daniel's persecutors shall be thrown into Daniel's den.

CHAP. LII

The greater part of this chapter is on the same subject with the chapter before, but the last three verses are on the same subject with the following chapter, concerning the person of the Redeemer, his humiliation and exaltation. I. The encouragement that is given to the Jews in captivity to hope that God would deliver them in his own way and time, ver. 1–6 II. The great joy that shall be both with ministers and people upon that occasion, ver. 7–10. III. The call given to those that remained in captivity, when liberty was proclaimed, ver. 11, 12. IV. A short idea given here of the Messiah, which is enlarged in the next chapter, ver. 13–15.

Verses 1–6

I. God's people are stirred up to appear vigorous for their own deliverance, v. 1, 2. Let them awake from their despondency, and pluck up their spirits, encourage themselves and one another. Let them awake from their distrust, look above them, look about them, look into the promises, look into the providences of God that were working for them, and let them raise their expectations of great things from God. Let them awake from their dullness. God here gives them an assurance, 1. That they should be reformed by their captivity: There shall no more come into thee the uncircumcised and the unclean (v. 1); their idolatrous customs should be no more introduced, or at least not harboured. Thus the gospel Jerusalem is purified by the blood of Christ and the grace of God, and made indeed a holy city. 2. That they should be rescued out of their captivity, that they should not be any more invaded: There shall no more come against thee (so it may be read) the uncircumcised and the unclean. If they keep close to God, and keep in with him, God will keep off, will keep out the enemy; but, if they again corrupt themselves, Antiochus will profane their temple and the Romans will destroy it. However, for some time they shall have peace. Let them prepare for joy: "Put on thy beautiful garments, no longer appear in mourning weeds. Put on a new face, a smiling countenance, now that a new and pleasant scene begins to open." Let them prepare for liberty: "Shake thyself from the dust into which thy proud oppressors have trodden thee (ch. li. 23), or into which thou hast in thy sorrow rolled thyself." Arise, and set up; so it may be read. "O Jerusalem! get clear of all the marks of servitude: Loose thyself from the bands of thy neck; assert thy own liberty." The gospel proclaims liberty to those who were bound with fears and makes it their duty to take hold of their liberty. Let those who have been weary and heavily laden under the burden of sin, finding relief in Christ, loose themselves from those bands; for, if the Son make them free, they shall be free indeed.

II. God stirs up himself for the deliverance of his people.

1. The Chaldeans who oppressed them never acknowledged God any more than Sennacherib did, ch. x. 6, 7. "You have sold yourselves for nought; you got nothing by it, nor did I," v. 3. The Babylonians gave him no thanks for them, but rather reproached and blasphemed his name upon that account. "And therefore they, having so long had you for nothing, shall at last restore you for nothing: You shall be redeemed without price," as was promised, ch. xlv. 13.

2. They had been often before in similar distress, and it was a pity that they should now be left in the hand of these oppressors (v. 4): "My people went down into Egypt, in an amicable way to settle there; but they enslaved them, and ruled them with rigour." And then they were delivered. Why may we not think God will deliver his people now? At other times the Assyrian oppressed the people of God without cause, as when the ten tribes were carried away captive by the king of Assyria; soon afterwards Sennacherib, another Assyrian, made himself master of all the defenced cities of Judah. The Babylonians might be called Assyrians, their monarchy being a branch of the Assyrians; and they now oppressed them without cause.

3. God's glory suffered by the injuries that were done to his people (v. 5): What have I here, what do I get by it, that my people are taken away for nought? The captives are so dispirited that they cannot praise him: Those that rule over them make them to howl, as the Egyptians of old made them to sigh, Exod. ii. 23. However God heard them, and came down to deliver them, as he did out of Egypt, Exod. iii. 7, 8. The natives, blaspheming, boasted that they were too hard for God because they were too hard for his people, and set him at defiance, as unable to deliver them. "Now," says God, "I will go down to deliver them; for their oppressors will neither praise God themselves nor let them do it."

4. His glory would be manifested by their deliverance (v. 6): "Therefore, because my name is thus blasphemed, I will arise, and my people shall know my name, my name Jehovah."

Verses 7–12

The removal of the Jews from Babylon, and the application of v. 7 to the preaching of the gospel (by the apostle, Rom. x. 15) plainly intimates that that deliverance was a type and figure of the redemption of mankind by Jesus Christ.

I. It is here spoken of as a great blessing, which ought to be welcomed with joy. 1. Those that bring the tidings of their release shall be very acceptable (v. 7), as they come over the mountains round about Jerusalem. It is meant of some of the Jews themselves, who immediately went themselves, or sent their own messengers, to Jerusalem itself, to tell the few who remained there that their brethren would be with them shortly; for it is published as a proof that Zion's God reigns, for they say unto Zion, Thy God reigns. This must be applied to the preaching of the gospel, which is a proclamation of peace and salvation; it is gospel indeed, good news of victory over our spiritual enemies and liberty from our spiritual bondage. The good news is that the Lord Jesus reigns. Christ himself brought these tidings first (Luke iv. 18, Heb. ii. 3), and of him the text speaks: How beautiful are his feet! his feet that were nailed to the cross, how beautiful upon Mount Calvary! 2. Zion's watchmen shall rejoice, v. 8. The watchmen (ch. lxii. 6) were such as God set on the walls of Jerusalem, to make mention of his name, and to continue instant in prayer to him, till he again made Jerusalem a praise in the earth. They stand upon their watch-tower, waiting for an answer to their prayers (Hab. ii. 1); and therefore when the good news comes they have it first. They shall lift up the voice, with the voice together shall they sing, to invite others to join with them in their praises. They shall see an exact agreement between the prophecy and the event, the promise and the performance; they shall see how they look one upon another eye to eye, and be satisfied that the same God spoke the one and did the other. Applying this also, as the foregoing verse, to gospel times, it is a promise of the pouring out of the Spirit upon gospel ministers, as a spirit of wisdom and revelation, to lead them into all truth, so that they shall see eye to eye, and be unanimous in these great things concerning the common salvation. Zion's waste places shall then rejoice because they shall be surprisingly comforted (v. 9): Break forth into joy, sing together, you waste places of Jerusalem. The redemption of Jerusalem is the joy of all God's people, Luke ii. 38. God will have the glory of it, v. 10. He has made bare his holy arm (manifested and displayed his power) in the eyes of all the nations.

II. When the liberty is proclaimed, let the people of God hasten out of Babylon with all convenient speed: Depart, depart (v. 11), go out from the midst of her; be gone. Babylon is no place for Israelites, Ezra i. 5. And it is a call to all those who are yet in the bondage of sin and Satan to make use of the liberty which Christ has proclaimed to them. Let them take heed of carrying away with them any of the pollutions of Babylon: Touch no unclean thing. Let them depend upon the presence of God with them and his protection in their removal (v. 12): You shall not go out with haste. They were to go with a diligent haste, but not with a diffident distrustful haste, as if they were afraid of being pursued. Cyrus shall give them an honourable discharge, and they shall have an honourable return, and not steal away; for the Lord will go before them. God will both lead their van and bring up their rear.

Verses 13–15

This prophecy, which begins here and is continued to the end of the next chapter, points as plainly as can be at Jesus Christ; the ancient Jews understood it of the Messiah, though some will have it understood of Jeremiah. But Philip has put it past dispute that of him speaks the prophet this, of him and of no other man, Acts viii. 34, 35.

I. God owns Christ to be commissioned for his undertaking. He is appointed to it. "He is my servant, whom I employ and therefore will uphold." In his undertaking he does his Father's will, seeks his Father's honour, and serves the interests of his Father's kingdom. He shall deal prudently, for the spirit of wisdom and understanding shall rest upon him, ch. xi. 2.

II. He gives a short prospect both of his humiliation and his exaltation. Many were astonished at him by reason of his sorrows. His visage was marred more than any man's when he was buffeted, smitten on the cheek, and crowned with thorns, and hid not his face from shame and spitting. He was a man of sorrows. Never was sorrow like unto his sorrow. How highly God exalted him, and exalted him because he humbled himself! Three words are used for this (v. 13): He shall be exalted and extolled and be very high. God shall exalt him, men shall extol him, and with both he shall be higher than the highest, higher than the heavens. Many nations shall be the better for him, for he shall sprinkle them; the blood of sprinkling shall be applied to their consciences, to purify them, for in his death there was a fountain opened, Zech. xiii. 1. He shall do it by baptism. So that this promise had its accomplishment when Christ sent his apostles to disciple all nations, by baptizing or sprinkling them. Kings shall shut their mouths at him, that is, they shall not open their mouths against him, as they have done. They shall with great humility and reverence receive his oracles and laws. That which had not been told them shall they see; the gospel brings to light things which will awaken the reverence of kings and kingdoms. They shall see and consider the glory of God shining in the face of Christ, which before they had not been told of—they had not heard. Christ disappointed the expectations of those who looked for a Messiah according to their fancies, as the carnal Jews, but outdid theirs who looked for such a Messiah as was promised.

CHAP. LIII

The two great things which the Spirit of Christ in the Old Testament prophets testified beforehand were the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow, 1 Pet. i. 11. But nowhere in all the Old Testament are these two so plainly and fully prophesied of as here in this chapter. This chapter is so replenished with the unsearchable riches of Christ that it may be called rather the gospel of the evangelist Isaiah than the prophecy of the prophet Isaiah. I. The reproach of Christ's sufferings—the meanness of his appearance, the greatness of his grief, and the prejudices which many conceived in consequence against his doctrine, ver. 1–3. II. The rolling away of this reproach, and the stamping of immortal honour upon his sufferings, by four considerations: 1. That therein he did his Father's will, ver. 4, 6, 10. 2. That thereby he made atonement for the sin of man (ver. 4–6, 8, 11, 12), for it was not for any sin of his own that he suffered, ver. 9. 3. That he bore his sufferings with an invincible patience, ver. 7. 4. That he should prosper in his undertaking, and his sufferings should end in his immortal honour, ver. 10–12.

Verses 1–3

The prophet, in the close of the former chapter, had foreseen and foretold the kind reception which the gospel of Christ should find among the Gentiles. Now here he foretells, with wonder, the unbelief of the Jews, notwithstanding the previous notices they had of the coming of the Messiah.

I. The contempt they put upon the gospel of Christ, v. 1. And it is applied likewise to the little success which the apostles' preaching met with among Jews and Gentiles, Rom. x. 16. Few believed the prophets who spoke before of Christ; when he came himself none of the rulers nor of the Pharisees followed him, and but here and there one of the common people; and, when the apostles carried this report all the world over, some in every place believed, but comparatively very few. To this day, of the many that profess to believe this report, there are few that cordially embrace it and submit to the power of it. They do not discern that divine power which goes along with the word, that working of the Spirit which makes the word effectual. They believe not the gospel because, by rebelling against the light they had, they had forfeited the grace of God.

II. The contempt they put upon the person of Christ because of the meanness of his appearance, v. 2, 3.

1. The low condition he submitted to, and how he abased and emptied himself. The entry he made into the world, and the character he wore in it, were no way agreeable to the ideas which the Jews had formed of the Messiah. It was expected that his extraction would be very great and noble. He was to be the Son of David, but he sprang out of this royal and illustrious family when it was reduced and sunk, and Joseph was but a poor carpenter. This is here meant by his being a root out of a dry ground, his being born of a mean and despicable family, in the north, in Galilee, of a family out of which, like a dry and desert ground, nothing green, nothing great, was expected, in a country of such small repute that it was thought no good thing could come out of it. It was expected that he should make a public entry, and come in pomp and with observation; but, instead of that, he grew up before God, not before men. He grew up as a tender plant, silently and insensibly, as the corn grows up, we know not how, Mark iv. 27. It was expected that he should have some uncommon beauty in his face and person, which should charm the eye, attract the heart, and raise the expectations of all that saw him. But there was nothing of this kind in him; not that he was deformed or misshapen, but he had no form nor comeliness, nothing extraordinary, which one might have thought to meet in an incarnate deity. Moses, when he was born, was exceedingly fair, to such a degree that it was looked upon as a happy presage, Acts, vii. 20; Heb. xi. 23. David, when he was anointed, was of a beautiful countenance, and goodly to look to, 1 Sam. xvi. 12. But the appearing of our Lord Jesus in the world had nothing in it of sensible glory. His gospel is preached, not with the enticing words of man's wisdom, but with all plainness. It was expected that he should live a pleasant life, which would have invited all sorts to him; but, on the contrary, he was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. His condition was, upon many accounts, sorrowful. He was unsettled, had not where to lay his head, lived upon alms, was opposed and menaced, and endured the contradiction of sinners against himself. His spirit was tender, and he admitted the impressions of sorrow. Grief was his intimate acquaintance; for he acquainted himself with the griefs of others, and sympathized with them.

2. The low opinion that men had of him, upon this account. There was in him the beauty of holiness and the beauty of goodness, enough to render him the desire of all nations; but the greater part of those among whom he lived, saw none of this beauty, for it was spiritually discerned. He was rejected as a bad man. We hid as it were our faces from him. It may be read, He hid as it were his face from us, concealed the glory of his majesty, and drew a veil over it, and therefore he was despised and we esteemed him not, because we could not see through that veil.

Verses 4–9

I. A further account of the sufferings of Christ. More is said here of the condition to which he humbled himself, to which he became obedient even to the death of the cross. 1. He had griefs and sorrows. He bore them, and blamed not his lot; he did neither shrink from them, nor sink under them, but persevered to the end, till he said, It is finished. 2. He had blows and bruises; he was stricken, smitten, and afflicted. All along he was smitten with the tongue, when he was contradicted, put under the worst of characters, and had all manner of evil said against him. At last he was smitten with the hand, with blow after blow. 3. He was scourged, not under the merciful restriction of the Jewish law, which allowed not above forty stripes to be given to the worst of malefactors, but according to the usage of the Romans. Pilate intended it as an equivalent for his crucifixion, and yet it proved a preface to it. He was wounded in his hands, and feet, and side. 4. He was wronged and abused (v. 7): He was oppressed, but our Lord Jesus kept possession of his own soul. 5. He was taken from prison and judgment, v. 8. He was proceeded against as a malefactor; he was apprehended and taken into custody, and made a prisoner; he was judged, accused, tried, and condemned. 6. He was cut off by an untimely death from the land of the living. He made his grave with the wicked (for he was crucified between two thieves, as if he had been the worst of the three) and yet with the rich, for he was buried in a sepulchre that belonged to Joseph, an honourable counsellor.

II. An account of the meaning of his sufferings. It is natural to ask with amazement, "How came it about? What evil had he done?" His enemies esteemed him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted, v. 4. Because they hated him, and persecuted him, they thought that God did. It is true he was smitten of God, v. 10 (or, as some read it, he was God's smitten and afflicted, the Son of God, though smitten and afflicted), but not in the sense in which they meant it.

1. He never did anything in the least to deserve this hard usage. Whereas he was charged with perverting the nation, and sowing sedition, it was utterly false; he had done no violence, but went about doing good. And, whereas he was called that deceiver, there was no deceit in his mouth (v. 9), compare 1 Pet. ii. 22. He never offended either in word or deed. The judge that condemned him owned he found no fault in him, and the centurion that executed him professed that certainly he was a righteous man.

2. Though he was oppressed and afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth (v. 7), no, not so much as to plead his own innocency, but freely offered himself to suffer and die for us. This takes away the scandal of the cross, that he voluntarily submitted to it, for great and holy ends. By his wisdom he could have evaded the sentence, and by his power have resisted the execution; but thus it was written, and thus it behoved him to suffer. This commandment he received from his Father, and therefore he was led as a lamb to the slaughter. As a sheep is dumb before the shearers, nay, before the butchers, so he opened not his mouth, which denotes his cheerful compliance with his Father's will. By this will we are sanctified, his making his own soul, his own life, an offering for our sin.

3. It was for our good, and in our stead, that Jesus Christ suffered. This is asserted here plainly and fully.

(1) It is certain that we are all guilty before God. We have all sinned, and have come short of the glory of God (v. 6): All we like sheep have gone astray. Every particular person stands charged with many actual transgressions. We have gone astray like sheep, which are apt to wander, and are unapt to find the way home again. That is our true character; we are bent to backslide from God, but altogether unable of ourselves to return to him. We turn aside everyone to his own way, and thereby set up our own will, in competition with God and his will, which is the malignity of sin.

(2) Our sins are our sorrows and our griefs (v. 4), or, as it may be read, our sicknesses and our wounds.

(3) Our Lord Jesus was appointed and did undertake to make satisfaction for our sins. For the Lord has laid on him the iniquity of us all. The laying of our sins upon Christ implies the taking of them off from us; we shall not fall under the curse of the law if we submit to the grace of the gospel. They were laid upon Christ when he was made sin (that is, a sin-offering) for us. Thus he put himself into a capacity to make those easy that come to him heavily laden under the burden of sin. See Ps. xl. 6–12. None but God had power to lay our sins upon Christ, both because the sin was committed against him, and because Christ was his own Son, who himself knew no sin. It was the iniquity of us all that was laid on Christ; for in Christ there is a sufficiency of merit for the salvation of all, and a serious offer made of that salvation to all, which excludes none that do not exclude themselves. God laid upon him our iniquity; but did he consent to it? Yes, he did; for some think that the true reading of the next words (v. 7) is, It was exacted, and he answered.

(4) Having undertaken our debt, he underwent the penalty. He bore our griefs and carried our sorrows, v. 4. Christ bore our sins, and so bore our griefs, bore them off us, that we should never be pressed above measure. He was wounded for our transgressions. Our sins were the thorns in his head, the nails in his hands and feet, the spear in his side. He was bruised, or crushed, for our iniquities; they were the procuring cause of his death. To the same purport is v. 8, for the transgression of my people was he smitten, the stroke was upon him that should have been upon us.

(5) The consequence of this to us is our peace and healing, v. 5. The chastisement of our peace was upon him. He is our peace, Eph. ii. 14. Christ was in pain that we might be at ease, knowing that through him our sins are forgiven us. Hereby we have healing; for by his stripes we are healed. Sin is not only a crime, for which we were condemned to die, but it is a disease, which tends directly to the death of our souls and for which Christ provided the cure. By his stripes he purchased for us the Spirit and grace of God to mortify our corruptions, which are the distempers of our souls, and to put our souls in a good state of health, that they may be fit to serve God. The dominion of sin is broken in us and we are fortified against that which feeds the disease.

(6) The consequence of this to Christ was his resurrection, for, being delivered for our offences, he was raised again for our justification. He rose to die no more; death had no more dominion over him. He that was dead is alive, and lives for evermore.

Verses 10–12

In the foregoing verses the prophet had testified of the sufferings of Christ; here he foretells the glory that should follow.

I. The services and sufferings of Christ's state of humiliation. Come, and see how he loved us, see what he did for us.

1. He submitted to the frowns of Heaven (v. 10): Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him, to put him to grief. Men esteemed him smitten of God for some very great sin of his own (v. 4); now it was true that he was smitten of God, but it was for our sin.

2. He substituted himself in the room of sinners, as a sacrifice. He made his soul an offering for sin; he himself explains this (Matt. xx. 28), that he came to give his life a ransom for many. We could not put him in our stead, but he put himself.

3. He subjected himself to that which to us is the wages of sin (v. 12): He has poured out his soul unto death, poured it out as water, so little account did he make of it, when the laying of it down was the appointed means of our redemption and salvation.

4. He suffered himself to be ranked with sinners, and yet offered himself to be an intercessor for sinners, v. 12. He was numbered with transgressors, not only condemned as a malefactor, but executed in company with two notorious malefactors, and he in the midst, as if he had been the worst of the three. In his whole life he was numbered among the transgressors; for he was called and accounted a sabbath-breaker, a drunkard, and a friend to publicans and sinners. In his sufferings he made intercession for the transgressors, for those that reviled and crucified him; for he prayed, Father, forgive them, thereby showing, not only that he forgave them, but that he was now doing that upon which their forgiveness, and the forgiveness of all other transgressors, were to be founded. That prayer was the language of his blood, crying, not for vengeance, but for mercy.

II. The graces and glories of his state of exaltation. It is promised,

1. That the Redeemer shall have a seed to serve him and to bear up his name, Ps. xxii. 30. True believers are the seed of Christ; the Father gave them to him to be so, John xvii. 6.

2. That he shall live to see his seed, and because he lives they shall live also, for he is their life.

3. That he shall himself continue to take care of the affairs of this family: He shall prolong his days. Christ will not commit the care of his family to any other. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, for he ever lives.

4. That his great undertaking shall answer expectation: The pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand. God's purposes shall take effect, and not one iota or tittle of them shall fail.

5. That he shall himself have abundant satisfaction in it (v. 11): He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied. He shall see it beforehand (so it may be understood); he shall with the prospect of his sufferings have a prospect of the fruit. He shall see it when it is accomplished in the conversion and salvation of poor sinners. Christ does and will see the blessed fruit of the travail of his soul in the founding and building up of his church and the eternal salvation of all that were given him.

Note, The great privilege that flows to us from the death of Christ is justification from sin, our being acquitted from that guilt which alone can ruin us, and accepted into God's favour, which alone can make us happy. Christ, who purchased our justification for us, applies it to us, by his intercession made for us, his gospel preached to us, and his Spirit witnessing in us. It is by faith that we are justified, by our consent to Christ and the covenant of grace; in this way we are saved. Faith is the knowledge of Christ, and without knowledge there can be no true faith. That knowledge of Christ, and that faith in him, by which we are justified, have reference to him both as a servant to God and as a surety for us. It is according to God's will that he does it. He is himself righteous, and of his righteousness have all we received. We must know him, and believe in him, as one that bore our iniquities —saved us from sinking under the load by taking it upon himself. The Father makes clear the victory of the Son. "I will set him among the great, highly exalt him, and give him a name above every name." Christ comes at his glory by conquest. He has vanquished principalities and powers, sin and Satan, death and hell, the world and the flesh; these are the strong that he has disarmed and taken the spoil of. The spoil which he has divided, consists in the vast multitudes of willing, faithful, loyal subjects, that shall be brought in to him; for so some read it: I will give many to him, and he shall obtain many for a spoil. God will give him the heathen for his inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession, Ps. ii. 8. The spoil which God divided to Christ he divides (it is the same word), he distributes, among his followers; for, when he led captivity captive, he received gifts for men, that he might give gifts to men.

CHAP. LIV

The death of Christ is the life of the church and of all that truly belong to it; and therefore very fitly, after the prophet had foretold the sufferings of Christ, he foretells the flourishing of the church, which is a part of his glory, and that exaltation of him which was the reward of his humiliation: it was promised him that he should see his seed, and this chapter is an explication of that promise. It may easily be granted that it has a primary reference to the welfare and prosperity of the Jewish church after their return out of Babylon, which was typical of the glorious liberty of the children of God, which through Christ we are brought into; yet it cannot be denied but that it has a further reference to the gospel church, into which the Gentiles were to be admitted. And the first words being understood by the apostle Paul of the New Testament Jerusalem (Gal. iv. 26, 27) may serve as a key to the whole chapter and that which follows. It is here promised concerning the Christian church, I. That, though the beginnings of it were small, it should be greatly enlarged by the accession of many to it among the Gentiles, ver. 1–5. II. That though sometimes God might seem to withdraw from her, he would return in mercy, ver. 6–10. III. That, though for a while she was in sorrow and under oppression, she should at length be advanced to greater honour, ver. 11, 12. IV. That knowledge, righteousness, and peace, should flourish and prevail, ver. 13, 14. V. That a 'attempts against the church should be baffled, ver. 14–17.

Verses 1–5

If we apply this to the state of the Jews after their return out of captivity, it is a prophecy of the increase of their nation after they were settled in their own land. Jerusalem had been in the condition of a wife written childless, or a desolate solitary widow; but now it is promised that the city should be replenished and the country peopled again, that the ruins of Jerusalem should be repaired, and that those estates which had for many years been wrongfully held by the Babylonian Gentiles should now return to the right owners. God will again be a husband to them, and the reproach of their captivity, and the small number to which they were then reduced, shall be forgotten. But we must apply it to the church of God in general; I mean the kingdom of God among men, God's city in the world.

I. The low state of religion in the world long before Christianity was brought in. It was like one barren, that did not bear, or like one desolate, that had lost husband and children; the church lay in a little compass, and brought forth little fruit. The Gentiles had less religion among them than the Jews, and the children of God, like the children of a broken, reduced family, were scattered abroad (John xi. 52).

II. Its recovery from this low condition by the preaching of the gospel and the planting of the Christian church.

1. Multitudes were converted from idols to the living God. Those were the church's children that were born again, were partakers of a new and divine nature, by the word. There were more found in the Gentile church (when that was set up) than ever were found in the Jewish church. The increase of the church is the joy of all its friends and strengthens their hands. Even in heaven, among the angels of God, there is an uncommon joy for a sinner that repents, much more for a nation that does so.

2. The bounds of the church were extended much further than ever before, v. 2, 3. (1) It is here supposed that the present state of the church is a tabernacle state; it dwells in tents, like the heirs of promise of old (Heb. xi. 9). The city, the continuing city, is reserved for hereafter. A tent is soon taken down and shifted, and, when God pleases, it is as soon fixed elsewhere. (2) Though it be a tabernacle state, it is sometimes very remarkably a growing state, no matter though it be in a tent. Thus it was in the first preaching of the gospel; it was the business of the apostles to disciple all nations, and so to lengthen the cords of this tabernacle, that more might be enclosed, which would make it necessary to strengthen the stakes, that they might bear the weight of the enlarged curtains. The more numerous the church grows the more cautious she must be to fortify herself against errors and corruptions, and to support her seven pillars, Prov. ix. 1. (3) It was a proof of divine power that in all places it grew and prevailed mightily, Acts xix. 20. The gospel spread itself into all parts of the world; there were eastern and western churches.

3. This was the comfort and honour of the church (v. 4): Fear not, for thou shalt not be ashamed, as formerly, of the straitness of thy borders, and the fewness of thy children.

4. This was owing to the relation in which God stood to his church, as her husband (v. 5): Thy Maker is thy husband. Jesus Christ is the church's Maker, by whom she is formed into a people—her Redeemer, by whom she is brought out of captivity, the bondage of sin, the worst of slaveries. This is he that espoused her to himself: He is the Lord of hosts, the Holy One of Israel, the same that presided in the affairs of the Old Testament church and was the Mediator of the covenant made with it.

Verses 6–10

The succour and relief which God sent to his captives in Babylon are here foretold, as a type of all those consolations of God treasured up for all believers in the covenant of grace.

I. Look back to former troubles, and God's favours to his people, v. 6–8. 1. How sorrowful the church's condition had been. She had been as a woman forsaken, though she was a wife of youth, or she had been as one rejected, and full of discontent. Even those that are espoused to God may yet seem to be forsaken. The similitude is explained (v. 7, 8). When God continues his people long in trouble he seems to forsake them; so their enemies construe it (Ps. lxxi. 11). It was in wrath that he forsook them and hid his face from them (ch. lvii. 17); yet it was but in a little wrath in comparison with what they had deserved, and what others justly suffer. It was but for a moment, a small moment. As he is slow to anger, so he is swift to show mercy. 2. How sweet the returns of mercy would be to them when God should come and comfort them. God's gathering his people takes rise from his mercy, not any merit of theirs; and it is with great mercies (v. 7), with everlasting kindness, v. 8.

II. Look forward to future dangers, and in defiance of them God's favours appear constant, and his kindness everlasting; for it is formed into a covenant of peace.

1. This is as firm as the waters of Noah, that is, as that promise which was made concerning the deluge that there should never be the like again, v. 9; see Gen. viii. 21, 22; ix. 11. And God has kept his word, though the world has been very provoking. And thus inviolable is the covenant of grace: I have sworn that I would not be wroth with thee, as I have been, and rebuke thee, as I have done.

2. It is more firm than the strongest parts of the visible creation (v. 10): The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, Hab. iii. 6. Mountains have sometimes been shaken by earthquakes, and removed; but the promises of God were never broken by the shock of any event. When our friends fail us our God does not, nor does his kindness depart? Do the kings of the earth, and the rulers, set themselves against the Lord? They shall depart and be removed. God's kindness shall never depart from his people, for whom he loves he loves to the end. Therefore the covenant is immovable and inviolable, because it is built not on our merit, but on God's mercy, which is from everlasting to everlasting.

Verses 11–17

Very precious promises that God would not only continue his love to his people under their troubles, but that he would raise them to greater prosperity than any they had yet enjoyed. In the foregoing chapter we had the humiliation and exaltation of Christ; here we have the humiliation and exaltation of the church; for, if we suffer with him, we shall reign with him.

I. The distressed state of the church (v. 11): "O thou afflicted, poor, and indigent society, that art tossed with tempests, like a ship ready to be swallowed up by the waves, not comforted by any prospect of deliverance." This was the condition of the Jews in Babylon, and afterwards, for a time, under Antiochus. It is often the condition of Christian churches and of believers, like the disciples in a storm, ready to perish; and where is their faith?

II. The glorious state the church is advanced to by the promise of God. Let the people of God, when they are afflicted and tossed, think they hear God speaking comfortably to them by these words. In all their afflictions he is afflicted, and encourages her with the assurance of the great things he would do for her.

1. God promises that which would be her beauty and honour.

(1) This is promised by a similitude taken from a city, for the church is the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem. Whereas now Jerusalem lay in ruins, a heap of rubbish, it shall be beautified, and appear more splendid than ever; the stones shall be laid not only firm, but fine. The foundations shall be garnished with sapphires, for Christ, and the foundation of the apostles and prophets, are precious above anything else. The windows of this house, city, or temple, shall be made of agates, the gates of carbuncles, and all the borders (the walls that enclose the courts) shall be of pleasant stones, v. 12. God, having graciously undertaken to build his church, the glory of the New Testament church shall far exceed that of the Jewish church, in those gifts and graces of the Spirit which are infinitely valuable.

(2) Those things that shall be the beauty and honour of the church are knowledge, holiness, and love, the very image of God, in which man was created, renewed, and restored. And these are the sapphires and carbuncles, the precious and pleasant stones, with which the gospel temple shall be beautified; built upon the foundation, 1 Cor. iii. 12. Then the church is all glorious, [1] When it is full of the knowledge of God (v. 13): All thy children shall be taught of the Lord. They shall be taught by those whom God shall appoint and whose labours shall be under his direction and blessing. It is a promise of the Spirit of illumination. Our Saviour quotes it with application to gospel grace (John vi. 45). [2] When the members of it live in love and unity among themselves: Great shall be the peace of thy children. All that are taught of God are taught to love one another (1 Thess. iv. 9). [3] When holiness reigns; for that above anything is the beauty of the church (v. 14): In righteousness shalt thou be established. The reformation of manners, the restoration of purity, the due administration of public justice, and the prevailing of honesty and fair dealing among men, are the strength and stability of any church or state.

2. Whereas now she lay in danger, God promises her protection and security. There shall be no fears within (v. 14): "Thou shalt be far from oppression, not only from evil, but from the fear of evil." There shall be no fightings without. Though attempts should be made upon them they should none of them succeed, v. 15. It is granted, "They shall surely gather together against thee; thou must expect it." As long as there is a devil in hell, and a persecutor out of it, God's people must expect frequent alarms; but God will not own them. Their attempt will end in their own ruin: "Whosoever shall gather together against thee, they shall fall for thy sake, or they shall fall before thee." We may with the greatest assurance depend upon God for the safety of his church. The smith that makes weapons is God's creature, and he gave him his skill to work in iron and brass (Exod. xxxi. 3, 4) and to make proper instruments for warlike purposes. The smith blows the coals in the fire, to make his iron malleable, that it may be hardened into steel, and so he may bring forth an instrument proper for the work of those that seek to destroy. It is the iron age that is the age of war. But God has created the smith, and therefore can tie his hands, so that the project of the enemy shall miscarry. They must have soldiers, and it is God that created the waster to destroy. Military men value themselves upon their splendid titles, but God calls them wasters made to destroy, for wasting and destruction are their business. They think their own ingenuity, labour, and experience, made them soldiers; but it was God that created them, and he will serve his own purposes and designs by them. The promise of God concerns the church's safety as the heritage of the servants of the Lord (v. 17). "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; it shall not prove strong enough to do any harm to the people of God; it shall recoil in the face of him that uses it against thee." When the weapons of war do not prosper there are tongues that rise in judgment. They are such as misrepresent them, and falsely accuse them to make them odious to the people and obnoxious to the government. This the enemies of the Jews did, to incense the kings of Persia against them, Ezra iv. 12; Esther iii. 8. "But these insulting threatening tongues thou shalt put to silence by well-doing (1 Pet. ii. 15), by doing that which will make thee manifest in the consciences even of thy adversaries, that thou art not what thou art represented to be." This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord. God's servants are his sons. God's promises are their heritage for ever (Ps. cxix. 111).

CHAP. LV

In this chapter we have much of the covenant of grace made with us in Christ. The "sure mercies of David", which are promised here (ver. 3) are applied by the apostle to the benefits which flow to us from the resurrection of Christ (Acts xiii. 34). Here is, I. A free and gracious invitation to all to come and take the benefit of gospel grace, ver. 1. II. Pressing arguments to enforce this invitation, ver. 2–4. III. A promise of the success of this invitation among the Gentiles, ver. 5. IV. An exhortation to repentance and reformation, ver. 6–9. V. The ratification of all this, with the certain efficacy of the word of God, ver. 10, 11. And a particular instance of the accomplishment of it in the return of the Jews out of their captivity, a sign of the accomplishment of all these other promises.

Verses 1–5

I. We are all invited to come and take that provision which the grace of God has made for poor souls in the new covenant.

1. Who are invited: Ho, everyone. Not the Jews only, but the Gentiles, the poor and the maimed, the halt and the blind, whoever can be picked up out of the highways and the hedges. Ministers are to make a general offer of life and in gospel times the invitation should be sent to the Gentiles. The gospel covenant excludes none that do not exclude themselves.

2. What is the qualification required—they must thirst. Those that are satisfied with the world and its enjoyments—those that depend upon the merit of their own works for a righteousness—these do not thirst; they have no sense of their need, are in no pain or uneasiness about their souls. But those that thirst are invited to the waters, as those that labour, and are heavy-laden, are invited to Christ for rest. Where God gives grace he first gives a thirsting after it; and, where he has given a thirsting after it, he will give it, Ps. lxxxi. 10.

3. Whither they are invited: Come you to the waters. Come to Christ; for he is the fountain opened; he is the rock smitten. Come to holy ordinances, to those streams that make glad the city of our God; to those who believe in Christ the things signified will be as wine and milk, abundantly refreshing. Come to the healing waters; come to the living waters. Our Saviour referred to it, John vii. 37. If any man thirst, let him come to me and drink.

4. What they are invited to do. (1) Come and buy. "Come and buy, stand not hesitating about the terms, nor deliberating whether you shall agree to them." (2) "Come, and eat; make it still more your own, as that which we eat is more our own than that which we only buy."

5. What is the provision they are invited to: "Come, and buy wine and milk, which will not only quench the thirst" (fair water would do that), "but nourish the body, and revive the spirits." Christ outdoes our expectations. We come to the waters, and would be glad of them, but we find there wine and milk, which were the staple commodities of the tribe of Judah. We must part with our puddle-water, nay, with our poison, that we may procure this wine and milk.

6. The free communication of this provision: Buy it without money, and without price. Our buying without money intimates, (1) That the gifts offered us are invaluable and such as no price can be set upon. (2) That he who offers them has no need of us, nor of any returns we can make him. (3) That the things offered are already bought and paid for. Christ purchased them not with money, but with his own blood, 1 Pet. i. 19. (4) That we shall be welcome to the benefits of the promise, and we must own it, that, if Christ and heaven be ours, we may see ourselves for ever indebted to free grace.

II. We are earnestly pressed to accept this invitation.

1. We are persuaded to hearken to God and to his proposals: "Hearken diligently unto me, v. 2. Not only give me the hearing, but apply it to yourselves (v. 3): Incline your ear, as you do to that which you find yourselves pleased with; come up to my terms."

2. The arguments used to persuade us,

(1) The unspeakable wrong we do to ourselves if we refuse this invitation: "Wherefore do you spend money for that which is not bread, when with me you may have wine and milk without money? Wherefore do you spend your labour and toil for that which will not be so much as dry bread to you, for it satisfies not?" The things of this world are not bread, not proper food for a soul. They satisfy not. The children of this world spend their money and labour for these uncertain unsatisfying things.

(2) The kindness we do to ourselves if we accept this invitation and comply with it. "If you hearken to Christ, you eat that which is good, which is both wholesome and pleasant, good in itself and good for you." God's good word and promise, a good conscience, and the comforts of God's good Spirit, are a continual feast to those that hearken obediently to Christ. Hereby we secure to ourselves lasting happiness: Hear, and your soul shall live. The great God graciously secures all this to us; "Come to me, and I will make an everlasting covenant with you, and thereby settle upon you the sure mercies of David." The benefits of this covenant are the mercies of David, such mercies as God promised to David (Ps. lxxxix. 28, 29, &c.), which are called the mercies of David his servant, and are appealed to by Solomon, 2 Chron. vi. 42. By David here we are to understand the Messiah. Covenant-mercies are all his mercies; they are purchased by him; and out of his hands they are dispensed to us. He is the Mediator and trustee of the covenant. They are sure mercies for in Christ the promises are all yea and amen.

III. Jesus Christ is promised for the making good of all the other promises which we are here invited to accept, v. 4. He is that David whose sure mercies all the blessings and benefits of the covenant are. There was nothing in us to merit such a favour, but Christ is the gift of God. We know not how to find the way to the waters where we are to be supplied, but Christ is given to be a leader. We know not what to do, but he is given for a commander, to show us what to do and enable us to do it. Christ is a commander by his precept and a leader by his example; our business is to obey him and follow him.

IV. The Master of the feast being fixed, it is next to be furnished with guests. The Gentiles shall be called to this feast: Thou shalt call a nation that thou knowest not, that is, that was not formerly called and owned as thy nation. They shall come at the call: Nations that knew not thee shall run unto thee. There shall be a concourse of believing Gentiles to Christ, who, being lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to him. The Gentiles will thus flock to Christ because he is the Son of God. God will bring them to him because he is the Holy One of Israel, true to his promises, and he has promised to glorify him by giving him the heathen for his inheritance.

Verses 6–13

A further account of that covenant of grace which is made with us in Jesus Christ. This gracious discovery of God's goodwill is not to be confined either to the Jew or to the Gentile, to the Old Testament or to the New, much less to the captives in Babylon. The precepts and the promises are here given to all, to everyone that thirsts after happiness, v. 1.

I. A gracious offer made of pardon, and peace, and all happiness, to poor sinners, upon gospel terms, v. 6, 7.

1. Let them pray, and their prayers shall be heard and answered (v. 6): "Seek the Lord while he may be found. Call upon him now while he is near, and within call. Pray to him, to be reconciled, and, being reconciled, pray to him for everything else you need." Now his patience is waiting on us, his word is calling to us, and his Spirit striving with us. Let us now improve our advantages and opportunities; for now is the accepted time.

2. Let them repent and reform, and their sins shall be pardoned, v. 7. Here is a call to the unconverted, to the wicked and the unrighteous—to the wicked, who live in known gross sins, to the unrighteous, who live in the neglect of plain duties: to them is the word of this salvation sent, and all possible assurance given that penitent sinners shall find God a pardoning God. There are two things involved in repentance: (1) It is to turn from sin; it is to forsake it. There must be a change of the mind; the unrighteous must forsake his thoughts. Repentance, if it be true, strikes at the root, and washes the heart from wickedness. We must alter our judgments concerning persons and things, dislodge the corrupt imaginations and quit the vain pretences under which an unsanctified heart shelters itself. (2) To repent is to return to the Lord; against whom we have rebelled; it is to return to the Lord as the fountain of life. If we do so God will have mercy. Misery is the object of mercy. With God there are tender mercies. He will abundantly pardon. He will multiply to pardon (so the word is), as we have multiplied to offend.

II. Encouragements given us to accept this offer and to venture our souls upon it.

1. If we look up to heaven, we find God's counsels there high and transcendent, his thoughts and ways infinitely above ours, v. 8, 9. The wicked are urged to forsake their evil ways and thoughts (v. 7) and to bring their ways and thoughts to comply with his; "for" (says he) "my thoughts and ways are not as yours. Yours are conversant only about things beneath; but mine are above, as the heaven is high above the earth; and, if you would approve yourselves true penitents, yours must be so too, and your affections must be set on things above." Sinners may be ready to fear that God will not be reconciled to them, because they could not find in their hearts to be reconciled to one who should have so basely and so frequently offended them. "But" (says God) "my thoughts in this matter are not as yours, but as far above them as heaven is above the earth." We think God apt to take offence and backward to forgive—that, if he forgives once, he will not forgive a second time. Peter thought it a great deal to forgive seven times (Matt. xviii. 21), but God meets returning sinners with pardoning mercy. We forgive and cannot forget; but, when God forgives sin, he remembers it no more.

2. If we look down to this earth, we find God's word there powerful and effectual, v. 10, 11. He saith to the snow, Be thou on the earth; he appoints when it shall come, to what degree, and how long it shall lie there; he saith so to the small rain and the great rain of his strength, Job. xxxvii. 6. It returns not without having accomplished its end, but waters the earth. And the watering of the earth is in order to its fruitfulness. Thus he makes it to bring forth and bud; and thus it gives not only bread to the eater, present maintenance to the owner and his family, but seed likewise to the sower, that he may have food for another year. The husbandman must be a sower as well as an eater, else he will soon see the end of what he has. "So shall my word be, as powerful in the mouth of prophets as it is in the hand of providence; it shall not return unto me void, it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing for which I sent it." These promises of mercy and grace shall have as real an effect upon the souls of believers, for their sanctification and comfort, as ever the rain had upon the earth, to make it fruitful. Christ's coming into the world, as the dew from heaven (Hos. xiv. 5), will not be in vain.

3. If we take a special view of the church, we shall find what great things God has done, and will do, for it (v. 12, 13): You shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace. This refers, (1) To the deliverance and return of the Jews out of Babylon. They shall go out of their captivity, and be led forth towards their own land again. They shall go out with joy and peace. They shall have the goodwill and good wishes of all the countries they pass through. The hills and their inhabitants shall break forth into singing. And, when they come to their own land, it shall be ready to bid them welcome. (2) Without doubt to something more. This shall be for an everlasting sign, that is, [1] The redemption of the Jews out of Babylon shall be a ratification of those promises that relate to gospel times. [2] It shall be a representation of the blessings promised and a figure of them. Gospel grace will set those at liberty that were in bondage to sin and Satan. They shall go out and be led forth. Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad. It will make a great change in men's characters. Those that were as thorns and briers, good for nothing but the fire, shall become graceful and useful as the fir-tree and the myrtle-tree. The raising of pleasant trees in the room of them signifies the removal of the curse of the law and the introduction of gospel blessings. The covenant of grace is an everlasting covenant; for the present blessings of it are signs of everlasting ones.

CHAP. LVI

I. A solemn charge given to us all to make conscience of our duty, ver 1, 2. II. Great encouragement given to strangers that were willing to come under the bonds of the covenant, ver. 3–8. III. A high charge drawn up against the watchmen of Israel, that were careless in the discharge of their duty (ver. 9–12), which seems to be the beginning of a new sermon, by way of reproof, continued in the following chapters.

Verses 1–2

When God is coming towards us in mercy we must go to meet him in a way of duty.

I. God here tells us what are his intentions of mercy to us (v. 1): My salvation is near to come—the great salvation wrought out by Jesus Christ typified by the salvation of the Jews from Sennacherib or out of Babylon. 1. The gospel salvation is the salvation of the Lord. 2. In that salvation God's righteousness is revealed, which St. Paul makes the ground of his glorying in it (Rom. i. 17). The law revealed that righteousness of God by which all sinners stand condemned, but the gospel reveals that by which all believers stand acquitted. 3. The Old Testament saints saw this salvation coming long before it came; and they had notice by the prophets of its approach.

II. He tells us what are his expectations of duty from us. Say not, "We see the salvation near, and therefore we may live as we list, for there is no danger now of missing it or coming short of it"; that is turning the grace of God into wantonness. But, on the contrary, when the salvation is near double your guard against sin. That which is here required to qualify and prepare us for the approaching salvation is,

1. That we be honest and just in all our dealings: Keep you judgment and do justice. God is true to us; let us be so to one another.

2. That we religiously observe the sabbath day, v. 2. We are not just if we rob God of his time. Sabbath-sanctification is here put for all the duties of the first table, the fruits of our love to God, as justice and judgment are put for all those of the second table, the fruits of our love to our neighbour. They might distinguish themselves from the heathen by putting a difference between God's day and other days.

3. That we have nothing to do with sin: Blessed is the man that keeps his hand from doing evil, any wrong to his neighbour, in body, goods, or good name—or, more generally, anything that is displeasing to God and hurtful to his own soul. The best evidence of our having kept the sabbath well will be to keep a good conscience all the week. It will appear that we have been in the mount with God if our faces shine in a holy conversation before men.

Verses 3–8

The prophet is here, in God's name, encouraging those that were joining themselves to God, yet laboured under great discouragements. 1. Some were discouraged because they were not of the seed of Abraham. They had joined themselves to the Lord, but they questioned whether God would accept them, because they were of the sons of the stranger, v. 3. They were Gentiles, aliens from the covenants of promise, and therefore feared they had no part nor lot in the matter. They said, "The Lord has utterly separated me from his people, and will not own me as one of them, nor admit me to their privileges." 2. Others were discouraged because they were not fathers in Israel. The eunuch said, Behold, I am a dry tree. He was thought to be of no use because he had no children, nor was ever likely to have any. This was the more grievous because eunuchs were not admitted to be priests (Lev. xxi. 20), nor to enter into the congregation (Deut. xxiii. 1). Yet God would not have the eunuchs to think that they should be excluded from the gospel church, and from being spiritual priests. As the taking down of the partition wall, contained in ordinances, admitted the Gentiles, so it let in likewise those that had been kept out by ceremonial pollutions. Now encouragements are given

I. To those who have no children of their own, though they had the honour to be the children of the church and the covenant themselves.

1. What a good character they have! They keep God's sabbaths as he has appointed them to be kept. They choose those things that please God. They take hold of his covenant. The covenant of grace is proffered to us in the gospel; to take hold of it is to accept the offer deliberately and sincerely to take God to be to us a God and to give up ourselves to be to him a people. We take hold of it as a criminal took hold of the horns of the altar to which he fled for refuge.

2. If they answer to this character, though they are not built up into families (v. 5): Unto them will I give a better place and name. There is a place and a name, which we have from sons and daughters, but there is a better place, and a better name, which those have that are in covenant with God, and it is sufficient to counterbalance the want of the former. A place and a name denote rest and reputation. Though they have not children to be the music of their house, yet they shall have a place and a name. God will give it to them by promise; he will himself be both their place and their name. He will give it to them in his house, and within his walls; there they shall have a place. Our relation to God, our interest in Christ, and our hopes of eternal life, are things that give us in God's house a blessed place and a blessed name. It shall be an everlasting name, that shall never be cut off.

II. To those that are themselves the children of strangers.

1. It is here promised that they shall now be welcome to the church, v. 6, 7. When God's Israel come out of Babylon, let them bring their neighbours along with them, and God will find room enough for them all in his house. Let them know that the sons of the strangers shall have a place and a name in God's house provided, [1] That they forsake other gods. [2] That they join themselves to him as subjects to their prince and soldiers to their general, by an oath of fidelity and obedience. [3] That they join themselves to him as friends to his honour, to love the name of the Lord. Serving him and loving him go together, and that obedience is most acceptable to him, which flows from a principle of love, for then his commandments are not grievous, 1 John v. 3. Three things are promised them, in their coming to God: Assistance: "I will bring them to my holy mountain, not only bid them welcome when they come, but incline them to come, will show them the way, and lead them in it." Acceptance: "Their burnt-offerings and their sacrifices shall be accepted on my altar, and be never the less acceptable for being theirs, though they are sons of the stranger." Comfort: They shall not only be accepted, but they themselves shall have the pleasure of it: I will make them joyful in my house of prayer. Many a sorrowful spirit has been made joyful in the house of prayer.

2. It is here promised that multitudes of the Gentiles shall come to the church. My house shall be called a house of prayer for all people. Now concerning this house it is promised, (1) That it shall not be a house of sacrifice, but a house of prayer. (2) That it shall be a house of prayer, not for the people of the Jews only, but for all people. This was fulfilled when Peter was made, not only to perceive it himself, but to tell it to the world, that in every nation he that fears God and works righteousness is accepted of him, Acts x. 35. It had been declared again and again that the stranger that comes nigh shall be put to death, but Gentiles shall now be looked upon no longer as strangers and foreigners, Eph. ii. 19. And it is intimated here (v. 8) that when the Gentiles are called in they shall be incorporated into one body with the Jews, that (as Christ says, John x. 16) there may be one fold and one Shepherd. There are still more and more to be brought in. The church is a growing body: we may still hope there shall be more, till the mystical body be completed. Other sheep I have.

Verses 9–12

From words of comfort the prophet here, by a very sudden change passes to words of reproof in the three following chapters; and therefore some here begin a new sermon. He had assured the people that in due time God would deliver them out of captivity. Now here he shows what their sins and provocations were.

I. Desolating judgments are here summoned, v. 9. The sheep of God's pasture are now to be made the sheep of his slaughter, to fall as victims to his justice, and therefore the beasts of the field and the forest are called to come and devour. If this refers primarily to the descent made upon them by the Babylonians, and their devouring them, yet it may look further, to the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation by the Romans. The Roman armies came upon them as beasts of the forest to devour them, and they quite took away their place and nation.

II. The reason of these judgments is here given. The shepherds, who should have been the watchmen of the flock, were treacherous and minded not the trust reposed in them, and so the sheep became an easy prey to the wild beasts. Now this may refer to the false prophets in Isaiah's, Jeremiah's, and Ezekiel's time, and to the priests that bore rule by their means. Or it may refer to the wicked princes, the sons of Josiah, that did evil in the sight of the Lord, and wicked magistrates under them, who betrayed their trust, and augmented the fierce anger of the Lord instead of doing anything to turn it away. Or it may refer to those who were the nation's watchmen in our Saviour's time, the chief priests and the scribes, who should have given notice to the people of the approach of the Messiah, but who, instead of that, opposed him. Woe unto thee, O land! when thy guides are such. 1. They were ignorant of their work, and unfit to teach, being so ill-taught themselves: His watchmen are blind, and unfit to be watchmen. Christ describes the Pharisees to be blind leaders of the blind, Matt. xv. 14. The beasts of the field come to devour, and the watchmen are blind, and are not aware of them. They are all ignorant (v. 10), shepherds that cannot understand (v. 11), that know not what is to be done about the sheep. 2. As they were blind watchmen, that could not discern the danger, so they were dumb dogs, that would not give warning of it. They barked at God's prophets, bit them and worried the sheep, but made no opposition to the wolf or thief. 3. They were lazy, and loved their ease, loving to slumber. 4. They were covetous—greedy dogs that can never have enough. All their enquiry is what they shall get, not what they shall do. They are everyone looking to his own way, minding his own private interests, and have no regard at all to the public welfare. Everyone is for propagating his own opinion, advancing his own party, while the common concerns of the public are wretchedly neglected and postponed. 5. They were never so much in their element as in their drunken revels (v. 12): Come (say they), I will fetch wine and we will fill ourselves, or be drunk, with strong drink. They courted the people to sit and drink with them, and so confirmed those in their wicked ways, whom they should have reproved. How could they think it any harm to be drunk when the watchmen themselves joined with them and led them to it! 6. They were confident of the continuance of their prosperity and ease; they said, "To-morrow shall be as this day and much more abundant; we shall have as much to spend upon our lusts tomorrow as we have today."

CHAP. LVII

The prophet makes his observations, I. Upon the deaths of good men, ver. 1, 2. II. Upon the gross idolatries and spiritual whoredoms which the Jews were guilty of, and the judgments they were thereby bringing upon themselves, ver. 3–12. III. Upon the gracious returns of God to his people to put an end to their captivity and re-establish their prosperity, ver. 13–21.

Verses 1–2

The prophet had condemned the watchmen for their ignorance and sottishness; here he shows the general stupidity and senselessness of the people.

I. The providence of God removing good men out of this world. The righteous, as to this world, perish; Piety exempts none from death. Righteousness delivers from the sting of death, but not from the stroke of it. Those are often removed that could be worst spared; the fruitful trees are cut down by death and the barren left still to cumber the ground.

II. The careless world slighting these providences: No man lays it to heart, none considers it. There are very few that lament it as a public loss, very few that take notice of it as a public warning. Little children, when they are little, least lament the death of their parents, because they know not what a loss it is to them.

III. The happiness of the righteous in their removal. They are taken away from the evil to come. When the deluge is coming they are called into the ark. In wrath to the world those are taken away that stood in the gap to turn away the judgments of God. It is a sign that God intends war when he calls home his ambassadors. The righteous man, when he dies enters into peace and rests in his bed. Those that practised uprightness, and persevered in it to the end, shall find it well with them when they die. Their souls then enter into peace.

Verses 3–12

A high charge, but a just one, against that wicked generation out of which God's righteous ones were removed, because the world was not worthy of them.

I. The name and title by which they stand indicted, v. 3. They are arraigned as sons of the sorceress, or of a witch, the seed of an adulterer and a whore. Sin is sorcery and adultery, for it is departing from God and dealing with the devil. They were children of disobedience. "Come," says the prophet, "draw near hither, and I will read you your doom; you are children of transgression, a seed of falsehood" (v. 4).

II. The particular crimes laid to their charge.

1. Scoffing at God and his word. They were a generation of scorners (v. 4): "Against whom do you sport yourselves? You think it is only against the poor prophets, whom you trample upon, but really it is against God himself, whose message they deliver." They made wry mouths at the prophets, and drew out the tongue, contrary to all the laws of good breeding: nor did they treat God's prophets with common civility.

2. Idolatry. This was that sin which the people of the Jews were most notoriously guilty of before the captivity; but that affliction cured them of it. In Isaiah's time it abounded, witness the abominable idolatries of Ahaz (which some think are particularly referred to here) and of Manasseh. (1) They were dotingly fond of their idols, inflamed themselves with them by their violent passions in the worship of them, 1 Kings xviii. 26, 28. They worshipped their idols under every green tree, in the open air, and in the shade; the beauty of the green trees made them the more fond of their idols which they worshipped there. (2) They were barbarous and unnaturally cruel in the worship of their idols. They slew their children, and offered them in sacrifice to their idols, in valleys, and under the cliffs of the rock, in dark and solitary places, the fittest for such works of darkness. (3) They were insatiable in their idolatries. [1] They had gods of the valleys, which they worshipped by the water side (v. 6): Among the smooth stones of the valley, or brook, is thy portion. If they saw a smooth carved stone, they were ready to worship it. "To them hast thou poured a drink-offering, and offered a meat-offering, as if they had given thee thy meat and drink." Have we taken the true God for our portion? Let us then serve him with our meat and drink, not by depriving ourselves of the use of them, but by eating and drinking to his glory. Here, in a parenthesis, comes in an expression of God's just resentment of this wickedness of theirs: Should I receive comfort in these—in such a people as this, who thus serve Baal? Should I have compassion on these? (so some), or should I repent me concerning these? so others. [2] They had gods of the hills too (v. 7): "Upon a lofty and high mountain hast thou set thy bed, thy idol, thy idol's temple and altar, the bed of thy uncleanness, where thou committest spiritual whoredom. Thither wentest thou up readily enough, though it was uphill, to offer sacrifice." [3] As if these were not enough, they had household-gods too, their lares and penates. Behind the doors and the posts (v. 8), where the law of God should be written, they set up the remembrance of their idols to show to others how mindful they were of them, and to put their children in mind of them. They were hardened in their wickedness; they went as publicly, and in as great crowds, to the idol-temples, as ever they had gone to God's house. This was like an impudent harlot, discovering themselves to another than God. They enlarged their bed, that is, their idol-temples, and (as the margin reads the following words) thou hewedst it for thyself larger than theirs, than theirs from whom thou copiedst it, 2 Kings xvi. 10. "Thou hast made a covenant with them, with the idols, with the idol-worshippers, to live and die together. Thou lovedst their bed, that is, the temple of an idol, wherever thou sawest it."

3. Another sin charged upon them is their trusting to foreign aids and contracting a communion with the Gentile powers (v. 9): Thou wentest to the king which some understand of Moloch, which signifies a king. Or it may be meant of the king of Assyria, whom Ahaz made his court to, or of the king of Babylon, whose ambassadors Hezekiah caressed, that they might strengthen themselves by an alliance with them. They went with ointments and perfumes, either to beautify their own faces and so make themselves worthy the friendship of the greatest king, or to be presented to those whose favour they desired. They hereby disparaged themselves and laid the honour of their crown and nation in the dust: Thou didst debase thyself even unto hell. They debased themselves by truckling to their heathen neighbours, and depending upon them, when they had a God to go to who is all-sufficient and in covenant with them.

III. The aggravations of their sin. 1. They had been tired with disappointments in their wicked courses, and yet they would not be convinced of the folly of them (v. 10): "Thou art wearied in the greatness of thy way; thou hast undertaken a mighty task, to find out true satisfaction and happiness in that which is vanity and a lie." Thou art wearied in the multitude, or multiplicity, of thy ways (so some read it): those that forsake the only right way wander endlessly in a thousand by-paths, and lose themselves in the many inventions which they have sought out. 2. Though they were convinced that the way they were in was a sinful way, yet, because they had found sensual pleasure and worldly profit by it, they could not persuade themselves to be sorry for it: "Thou hast found the life of thy hand" (or the living of it); thou art not grieved, any more than Ephraim when he said (Hos. xii. 8), "I have become rich; I have found out substance." Prosperity in sin is a great bar to conversion from sin. 3. They had dealt very unworthily with God by their sin; for, they pretended that the reason why they left God was because he was too terrible a majesty for them; they must have gods that they could be more familiar with. "But," says God, "of whom hast thou been afraid or feared, that thou hast lied? What did I ever do to frighten thee from me?" However, it is certain that they had no true reverence of God. "Thou hast not remembered me, neither what I have said nor what I have done, thou hast not laid them to thy heart, as thou wouldst have done if thou hadst feared me." They were hardened in their sin by the patience and forbearance of God.

IV. Here is God's resolution to call them to an account (v. 12): "I will declare thy righteousness, which thou makest thy boast of, and let the world see, and thyself too, to thy confusion, that it is all a sham. I will declare thy works, they shall not profit thee, nor turn to any account."

Verses 13–16

I. God shows how insufficient idols and creatures were to succour those that worshipped them (v. 13): "When thou criest in thy distress and callest for help, let thy companies deliver thee, thy idol-gods, the troops of the confederate forces which thou hast relied so much upon, let them deliver thee; expect no other relief than what they can give." The wind shall carry them all away; they have made themselves as chaff, and therefore the wind will of course hurry them away.

II. He shows that there was a sufficiency, an all-sufficiency, in him. "He that puts his trust in me, and in me only, he shall be happy, both for soul and body, for this world and the other." Those that trust in God's providence take the best course to secure their secular interests. They shall possess the land, as much of it as is good for them. Those that trust in God's grace take the best course to secure their sacred interests. They shall inherit my holy mountain. They shall enjoy the privileges of the church on earth, and be brought at length to the joys of heaven; and no wind shall carry them away. More particularly,

1. The captives, that trust in God, shall be released (v. 14): They shall say (that is, the messengers of his word, and all the ministers of his providence, in that great event shall say), Cast you up, cast you up, prepare the way. When God's time shall have come for their deliverance the way of bringing it about shall be made plain and obstacles shall be removed. This refers to the provision which the gospel, and the grace of it, have made for our ready passage through this world to a better. The way of religion is now cast up; it is a highway; ministers' business is to direct people in it.

2. The contrite, that trust in God, shall be revived, v. 15. God's glory appears here very bright, (1) In his greatness and majesty: He is the high and lofty One that inhabits eternity. He is the high and lofty One, and there is no creature like him, nor any to be compared with him. The language likewise intimates his sovereign dominion over all and the incontestable right he has to give both law and judgment to all. He is both immortal and immutable. There is an infinite rectitude in his nature. His name is holy, and all that desire to be acquainted with him must know him as a holy God. "I dwell in the high and holy place, and will have all the world to know it." Whoever have any business with God must direct to him as their Father in heaven, for there he dwells. Though he is thus high yet he has respect unto the lowly; he that rides on the heavens by his name JAH stoops to concern himself for poor widows and fatherless, Ps. lxviii. 4, 5. (2) In his grace and mercy. He has a tender pity for the humble and contrite. If they be his people, he will not overlook them though they are poor and despised and trampled upon by men; but he here refers to the temper of their mind; he will have a tender regard to those who, being in affliction, accommodate themselves to their affliction, and bring their mind to their condition. With these God will dwell. He will visit them graciously, will converse with them by his word and Spirit, as a man does with those of his own family. He that dwells in the highest heavens dwells in the lowest hearts and inhabits sincerity as surely as he inhabits eternity. In these he delights. He will revive their heart and spirit, will speak to them, and work in them by the word and Spirit of his grace.

3. Those with whom he contends, if they trust in him, shall be relieved, and received into favour, v. 16. He will revive the heart of the contrite ones, for he will not contend for ever. It is not promised that he will never be angry with his people, for their sins are displeasing to him, or that he will never contend with them, for they must expect the rod; but he will not contend for ever. As he is not soon angry, so he is not long angry. "If I should contend for ever, the spirit would fail before me, even the souls which I have made." Though the Lord is for the body, yet he concerns himself chiefly for the souls of his people, that the spirit does not fail, nor its graces and comforts.

Verses 17–21

The body of the people of Israel, in this account of God's dealings with them, is spoken of as a particular person (v. 17, 18), but divided into two sorts, differently dealt with—some who were sons of peace, to whom peace is spoken (v. 19), and others who were not, who have nothing to do with peace, v. 20, 21.

I. The just rebukes which that people were brought under for their sin: For the iniquity of his covetousness I was wroth, and smote him. Covetousness was a sin that abounded. Those that did not worship images were yet carried away by this spiritual idolatry: for such is covetousness; it is making money the god, Col. iii. 5. Yet, covetous as they were, in the service of their idols they were prodigal, v. 6. And it is hard to say whether their profuseness in that or their covetousness in everything else was more provoking. Covetousness is an iniquity that is very displeasing to the God of heaven. He smote him, reproved him for it by his prophets, corrected him by his providence, punished him in those very things he so doted upon and was covetous of. God hid himself from him when he was under these rebukes. When we are under the rod, if God manifest himself to us, we may bear it the better; but if he hide himself from us, send us no prophets, speak to us no comfortable word, we are very miserable.

II. Their obstinacy and incorrigibleness under these rebukes: He went on frowardly in the way of his heart, in his evil way. See also how insufficient afflictions of themselves are to reform men, unless God's grace work with them.

III. God's wonderful return in mercy to them.

1. The greater part of them went on frowardly, but there were some among them that were mourners for the obstinacy of the rest; and God determines not to contend for ever with them. Such are the riches of divine mercy and grace, and so do they rejoice against judgment, that it follows, I have seen his ways and will heal him. Where sin has abounded grace much more abounds. God will first give him grace, and then, and not till then, give him peace: "I have seen his way, that he will never turn to me of himself, and therefore I will turn him." (1) God will heal him of his corrupt and vicious disposition. There is no spiritual disease so inveterate but almighty grace can conquer it. (2) God will lead him also. He goes on frowardly, as Saul, yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter, but God will lead him into a better mind, a better path. And then, (3) He will restore those comforts which he had forfeited, and for the return of which he had thus prepared him. There was a wonderful reformation wrought upon the captives in Babylon, and then a wonderful redemption wrought for them.

2. Now, as when that people went into captivity some of them were good figs, others of them bad figs, and accordingly their captivity was to them for their good or for their hurt (Jer. xxiv. 8, 9), so, when they came out of captivity, still some of them were good, others bad, and the deliverance was to them accordingly.

(1) To those among them that were good their return out of captivity was peace, a type of the peace which should be preached by Jesus Christ (v. 19): I create the fruit of the lips, peace. Creation is out of nothing, and this is surely out of worse than nothing, when God creates matter of praise for those that went on frowardly. In order to this, peace shall be published: Peace, peace to him that is afar off as well as to him that is near. Peace of conscience, a holy security and serenity of mind, after the many reproaches of conscience and agitations of spirit they had been under in their captivity. When he speaks peace to us, we must speak praises to him. This peace is itself of God's creating. It is the fruit of preaching lips and praying lips; it is the fruit of Christ's lips, Eph. ii. 17: He came and preached peace to you who were afar off, you Gentiles as well as to the Jews, who were nigh—to after-ages, who were afar off in time, as well as to those of the present age.

(2) To those among them that were wicked, though they might return with the rest, their return was no peace, v. 20. The wicked, wherever he is, in Babylon or in Jerusalem, carries about with him the principle of his own uneasiness. The wicked would not be healed by the grace of God and therefore shall not be healed by his comforts. They are always like the sea in a storm, for they carry about with them, [1] Unmortified corruptions. They are not cured and their ungoverned lusts and passions make them like the troubled sea. [2] Unpacified consciences. They are under a frightful apprehension of guilt and wrath, like Cain, who always dwelt in the land of shaking. It is a certain truth, what this prophet had said before (ch. xlviii. 22), and here repeats (v. 21), There is no peace to the wicked, no reconciliation to God, while they go on still in their trespasses.

CHAP. LVIII

The prophet has his commission renewed to reprove the sinners in Zion, ver. 1. It is intended for admonition and warning to all hypocrites, and is not to be confined to those of any one age. Some refer it primarily to those at that time when Isaiah prophesied; see chap. xxxiii. 14; xxix. 13. Others to the captives in Babylon, the wicked among them. They thought to shelter themselves with their external performances, particularly their fastings, which they kept up in Babylon, and for some time after their return to their own land, Zech. vii. 3, &c. Others think it is principally intended against the hypocrisy of the Jews, especially the Pharisees before and in our Saviour's time: they boasted of their fastings, but Christ (as the prophet here) showed them their transgressions (Matt. xxiii). Observe, I. The plausible profession of religion which they made, ver. 2. II. The boasts they made of that profession, and the blame they laid upon God for taking no notice, ver. 3. III. The sins they are charged with, which spoiled the acceptableness of their fasts, ver. 4, 5. IV. Instructions given them how to keep fasts aright, ver. 6, 7. V. Precious promises made to those who do so keep fasts, ver. 8–12. VI. The like precious promises made to those that sanctify sabbaths aright, ver. 13, 14.

Verses 1–2

When our Lord Jesus promised to send the Comforter he added, When he shall come he shall convince (John xvi. 7, 8); for conviction must prepare for comfort. God had appointed this prophet to comfort his people (ch. xl. 1); here he appoints him to convince them, and show them their sins.

I. He must tell them how bad they really were, v. 1. 1. He must deal faithfully and plainly with them. Though they are called the people of God and the house of Jacob, do not flatter them, but show them their transgressions, what sins are committed by them which they do not acknowledge to be sins; though in some things they are reformed, in other things they are still as bad as ever. 2. He must cry aloud, and not spare, not spare them, though he get their ill-will by it and get himself an ill name, yet he must not spare.

II. He must acknowledge how good they seemed to be, notwithstanding (v. 2): Yet they seek me daily. They pleaded that they could see no transgressions for they were diligent and constant in attending on God's worship—and what more would he have of them? Now,

1. He owns the fact to be true. As far as hypocrites do that which is good, they shall not be denied the praise of it. It is owned that they have a form of godliness. (1) They go to church, and observe their hours of prayer: They seek me daily. (2) They love to hear good preaching: They delight to know my ways, as Herod, who heard John gladly. (3) They seem to take pleasure in the exercises of religion. They delight in approaching to God, not for his sake to whom they approach, but for the sake of some pleasing circumstance, the company, or the festival. (4) They are inquisitive concerning their duty and seem desirous only to know it: They ask of me the ordinances of justice, the rules of piety in the worship of God, the rules of equity in their dealings with men, both which are ordinances of justice. (5) They appear to the eye of the world as if they made conscience of doing their duty: They are as a nation that did righteousness and forsook not the ordinances of their God; others took them for such, and they themselves pretended to be such. Men may go a great way towards heaven and yet come short; may go to hell with a good reputation. But,

2. He intimates that this was so far from being a cover for their sin that really it was an aggravation of it.

Verses 3–7

I. The pleasure which these hypocrites conceived against God (v. 3): Wherefore have we fasted, say they, and thou seest not? Thus they went in the way of Cain, who was angry at God, and resented it as a gross affront that his offering was not accepted. They magnify their own performances: "We have fasted, and afflicted our souls; we have not only sought God daily (v. 2), but have kept certain times of more solemn devotion." Some think this refers to the yearly fast (which was called the day of atonement), others to occasional fasts. The Pharisee (Luke xviii. 12) said I fast twice in the week. They thought God should take great notice of them, for their services. They charge God with injustice and partiality, and seem resolved to throw up their religion, and justify themselves in doing so with this, that they had found no profit in praying to God, Job xxi. 14, 15; Mal. iii. 14.

II. The true reason why God did not accept their fastings, nor answer the prayers they made on their fast-days; it was because they did not fast aright. They fasted indeed, but they did not, as the Ninevites, turn everyone from his evil way; but in the day of their fast, they went on to find pleasure, that is, to do whatsoever seemed right in their own eyes, making their inclinations their law. 1. They were as covetous and unmerciful as ever: "You exact all your labours from your servants, and will neither release them according to the law nor relax the rigour of their servitude. You exact all your dues, your debts" (so some read it); you are as rigorous and severe in extorting what you demand from those that are poor as ever you were, though it was at the close of the yearly fast that the release was proclaimed. 2. They were contentious and spiteful (v. 4): Behold, you fast for strife and debate. When they proclaimed a fast they pretended to search for those sins which provoked God, and under that pretence perhaps particular persons were falsely accused, as Naboth in the day of Jezebel's fast, 1 Kings xxi. 12. Thus, instead of judging themselves, which is the proper work of a fast-day, they condemned one another. They fasted for strife, with emulation which should make the most plausible appearance on a fast-day. Now while they thus continued in sin, God would not allow them the use of such solemnities: "You shall not fast at all if you fast as you do this day, causing your voice to be heard on high. Bring me no more of these empty, noisy, vain oblations," ch. i. 13.

III. Plain instructions given concerning the true nature of a religious fast.

1. In general, a fast is intended, (1) For the honouring and pleasing of God. (2) For the humbling and abasing of ourselves. A fast is a day to afflict the soul; if it do not express a genuine sorrow for sin, and do not promote a real mortification of sin, it is not a fast.

2. It concerns us therefore to enquire, on a fast-day, what it is that will be acceptable to God, and afflictive to our corrupt nature.

(1) We are here told negatively what is not the fast that God has chosen. [1] It is not enough to put on a melancholy aspect, to bow down the head like a bulrush that is withered and broken: as the hypocrites, that were of a sad countenance, and disfigured their faces, that they might appear unto men to fast, Matt. vi. 16. The publican, whose heart was truly humbled, would not so much as lift up his eyes to heaven (Luke xviii. 13); but when it was only mimicked, as here, it was justly ridiculed: it is but hanging down the head like a bulrush. [2] It is not enough to do penance, to mortify the body a little, while the body of sin is untouched. Wilt thou call this a fast? No, it is but the shadow of a fast.

(2) We are here told positively what is the fast that God has chosen. It is not afflicting the soul for a day (as some read it, v. 5); it must be the business of our whole lives. It is here required, [1] That we be just to those with whom we have dealt hardly (v. 6): To loose the bands of wickedness, the bands which we have wickedly tied, and by which others are bound. "Let the prisoner for debt that has nothing to pay be discharged, let the vexatious action be quashed, let the servant that is forcibly detained beyond the time of his servitude be released, and thus break every yoke; not only let go those that are wrongfully kept under the yoke, but break the yoke of slavery itself." [2] That we be charitable to those that stand in need of charity, v. 7. Contribute to the rescue and ransom of those that are oppressed by others, to the release of captives and the payment of the debts of the poor. This then, is the fast that God has chosen. First, To provide food for those that want it. It is to break thy bread to the hungry. It must be thy bread, that which is honestly got, the bread of thy allowance. We must deny ourselves, that we may have to give to him that needeth. This is the true fast, to break thy bread to the hungry, to give them loaves and not to put them off with scraps. Secondly, To provide lodging for those that want it: It is to take care of the poor that are cast out. "If they suffer unjustly do not only pay for their lodging, but, which is a greater act of kindness, bring them to thy own house. Be not forgetful to entertain strangers: for thou mayest entertain Christ himself. I was a stranger and you took me in." Thirdly, To provide clothing for those that want it: "When thou seest the naked, that you cover him; hide not thyself from thy own flesh." Some understand it of a man's own relations. Others understand it more generally; all that partake of the human nature are to be looked upon as our own flesh, for have we not all one Father?

Verses 8–12

Precious promises for those to feast freely and cheerfully who keep the fast that God has chosen.

I. A further account of the duty to be done (v. 9, 10). 1. We must abstain from all acts of violence and fraud. "Those must be taken away from the midst of thee, from the midst of thy person, out of thy heart" (so some); "thou must not only refrain from the practice of injury, but mortify in thee all inclination towards it." Or from the midst of thy people. Those in authority must do all they can to prevent oppression in all within their jurisdiction. They must not only break the yoke (v. 6), but take away the yoke; they must likewise forbear threatening (Eph. vi. 9) and take away the putting forth of the finger, to point at those that are poor and in misery, and so to expose them to contempt. And let them not speak vanity, flattery to one another, but let all conversation be governed by sincerity. 2. We must abound in all acts of charity and beneficence. We must give freely and cheerfully, and from a principle of charity. We must draw out our soul to the hungry (v. 10), not only draw out the money, but do this from the heart with a tender affection to such as we see to be in misery. Let the heart go along with the gift; for God loves a cheerful giver, and so does a poor man too. When our Lord Jesus healed and fed the multitude it was as having compassion on them. We must give plentifully and largely, so as not to tantalize, but to satisfy, the afflicted soul.

II. A full account of the blessings and benefits which attend the performance of this duty. God will surprise them with the return of mercy after great affliction, which shall be as welcome as the light of the morning after a long and dark night (v. 8): Then shall thy light break forth as the morning and (v. 10) thy light shall rise in obscurity. Those that are cheerful in doing good God will make cheerful in enjoying good; and this also is a special gift of God, Eccles. ii. 24. Those that have helped others out of trouble will obtain help of God when it is their turn. Good works shall be recompensed with a good name; this is included in that light which rises out of obscurity. "Thy righteousness shall go before thee as thy vanguard, to secure thee from enemies that charge thee in the front, and the glory of the Lord shall be thy rearward, the gathering host, to bring up those of thee that are weary and are left behind, and to secure thee from the enemies, that, like Amalek, fall upon thy rear." Good people are safe on all sides. Their defence is their righteousness, and the glory of the Lord, that is, as some suppose, Christ. He it is that is our rearward, on whom alone we can depend for safety when our sins pursue us and are ready to take hold on us. "Then shalt thou call, on thy fast-days, which ought to be days of prayer, and the Lord shall answer, shall give thee the things thou callest to him for; thou shalt cry when thou art in any distress or sudden fright, and he shall say, Here I am." Wherever they are praying, God says, "Here I am hearing: I am in the midst of you." He is nigh unto them in all things, Deut. iv. 7. The Lord shall guide thee continually. While we are here, in the wilderness of this world, we have need of continual direction from heaven. To a good man God gives not only wisdom and knowledge, but joy; he is satisfied in himself with the testimony of his conscience and the assurances of God's favour. These will satisfy thy soul, will put gladness into thy heart, even in the drought of affliction; these will make fat thy bones, will give thee that pleasure which will be a support to thee as the bones to the body. "Thou shalt be like a watered garden, fruitful in graces and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not either in droughts or in frosts." As a spring of water, though it is continually sending forth its streams, is yet always full, so the charitable man abounds in good as he abounds in doing good, and is never the poorer for his liberality. "Those that hereafter shall be of thee, thy posterity, shall be serviceable to their generation, as thou art to thine." They shall build the old waste places, which had lain long desolate. This was fulfilled when the captives, after their return, repaired the cities of Judah, and many of those in Israel. They shall carry on and finish that good work which was begun long before. They shall raise up to the top that building the foundation of which was laid long since and has been for many generations in the rearing. This was fulfilled when the building of the temple was revived after it had stood still for many years, Ezra v. 2. They shall have the blessing and praise of all about them: "Thou shalt be called the repairer of the breach." "Thou shalt be the restorer of paths, safe and quiet paths, not only to travel in, but to dwell in, so safe and quiet that people shall make no difficulty of building their houses by the roadside." The sum is that, if they keep such feasts as God has chosen, he will settle them again in their former peace and prosperity, and there shall be none to make them afraid.

Verses 13–14

Great stress was always laid upon the due observance of the sabbath day, and it was particularly required from the Jews when they were captives in Babylon, because by keeping that day, in honour of the Creator, they distinguished themselves from the worshippers of the gods that have not made the heavens and the earth. See ch. lvi. 1, 2.

I. How the sabbath is to be sanctified (v. 13); this law of the sabbath is still binding to us on our Lord's day.

1. Nothing must be done that puts contempt upon the sabbath day. We must turn away our foot from the sabbath, from trampling upon it; we must turn away our foot from doing our pleasure on that holy day, that is, from living at large, and taking a liberty to do what we please on sabbath days, without the control and restraint of conscience. On sabbath days we must not walk in our own ways (that is, not follow our callings), not find our own pleasure (that is, not follow our sports and recreations); nay, we must not speak our own words, for we must make religion the business of the day. We must speak of divine things as we sit in the house and walk by the way. In all we say and do we must put a difference between this day and other days.

2. We must call it a delight, not a task and a burden. We must not only count it a delight, but call it so. We must call it so to God, in thanksgiving for it. We must call it so to others, to invite them to come and share in the pleasure of it; and we must call it so to ourselves, that we may not entertain the least thought of wishing the sabbath gone that we may sell corn.

II. The reward of sabbath-sanctification, v. 14.

1. We shall have the comfort of it; the work will be its own wages. If we call the sabbath a delight, then shall we delight ourselves in the Lord; he will more and more manifest himself to us. If we go about duty with cheerfulness, we shall go from it with satisfaction.

2. We shall have the honour of it: I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, which denotes not only a great security, but great dignity. Those that honour God and his sabbath he will thus honour. If God by his grace enable us to live above the world, and so to manage it as not to be hindered by it, then he makes us to ride on the high places of the earth.

3. We shall have the profit of it: I will feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father, that is, with all the blessings of the covenant and all the precious products of Canaan (which was a type of heaven), for these were the heritage of Jacob.

CHAP. LIX

In this chapter we have sin appearing exceedingly sinful, and grace appearing exceedingly gracious; and, as what is here said of the sinner's sin (ver. 7, 8) is applied to the general corruption of mankind (Rom. iii. 15), so what is here said of a Redeemer (ver. 20) is applied to Christ, Rom. xi. 26. I. This people had themselves stopped the current of God's favours to them, ver. 1–8. II. They are told what the judgments were which they had brought upon their own heads (ver. 9–11) and what the sins were which provoked God to send those judgments, ver. 12–15. III. It is here promised, that notwithstanding this, God would work deliverance for them (ver. 16–19), and would reserve mercy in store for them and entail it upon them, ver. 20, 21.

Verses 1–8

The mistake of those who had been quarrelling with God because they had not the deliverances wrought for which they had been fasting and praying, ch. lviii. 3.

I. It was not owing to God. He was still as able to help as ever: His hand is not shortened, his power is not lessened. God can reach as far as ever and with as strong a hand as ever, that has not waxed weak nor is it at all shortened. Has the Lord's hand waxed short? (says God to Moses, Num. xi. 23). No, it has not; he will not have it thought so. Neither length of time nor strength of enemies, no, nor weakness of instruments, can shorten or straiten the power of God. He was still as ready and willing to help as ever in answer to prayer: His ear is not heavy, that it cannot hear. More is implied than is expressed; not only his ear is not heavy, but he is quick of hearing. Even before they call he answers, ch. lxv. 24. If your prayers be not answered it is not because God is weary of hearing prayer, but because we are weary of praying, not because his ear is heavy when we speak to him, but because our ears are heavy when he speaks to us.

II. They stood in their own light and put a bar in their own door. Your iniquities have kept good things from you, Jer. v. 25.

1. The mischief sin does. It hinders God's mercies; it is a partition wall between us and God. Sin hides his face from us (which denotes great displeasure, Deut. xxxi. 17). Sin in its consequences is exceedingly hurtful, separating us from God, and so separating us not only from all good, but to all evil (Deut. xxix. 21).

2. The prophet shows how many and great their iniquities were, according to the charge given him (ch. lviii. 1) to show God's people their transgressions. He must begin with their thoughts, for there all sin begins: Their thoughts are thoughts of iniquity, v. 7. Their imaginations are so (v. 4): They conceive mischief and then they bring forth iniquity. Though it is in pain perhaps that the iniquity is brought forth, through the oppositions of Providence and the checks of their own consciences, yet, when they have compassed their wicked purpose, they look upon it with as much pride as if it were a man-child born into the world; thus, when lust has conceived, it bringeth forth sin, James i. 15. This is called (v. 5) hatching the cockatrice's egg and weaving the spider's web. The spider's web is a weak insignificant thing, which the besom sweeps away in an instant: such are the thoughts which worldly men entertain, building castles in the air. They hatch the eggs of the cockatrice or adder, which are poisonous and produce venomous creatures; such are the thoughts of the wicked who delight in doing mischief. He that eats of their eggs (that is, has any dealings with them) dies (that is, he is in danger of having some mischief or other done him), and that which is crushed, or which begins to be hatched, breaks out into a viper, which you meddle with at your peril. Out of this abundance of wickedness in the heart their mouth speaks, and yet it does not always speak out, but for the more effectually compassing the mischievous design, it is covered with much fair speech (v. 3): Your lips have spoken lies; and again (v. 4), They speak lies, pretending kindness where they intend mischief. Your tongue has muttered perverseness. Backbiters are called whisperers. They were guilty of shedding innocent blood: Your hands are defiled with blood (v. 3); blood is defiling; it leaves an indelible stain of guilt upon the conscience, which nothing but the blood of Christ can cleanse. Their feet ran to this evil. They made haste to shed innocent blood. With other iniquities are their fingers defiled (v. 3); they make everything their own that they can lay their hands on. They trust in vanity (v. 4); they depend upon their arts to enrich themselves, and their deceiving others will but deceive themselves. The act of violence is in their hands, according to the arts of violence that are in their heads and the thoughts of violence in their hearts. No methods are taken to redress these grievances and reform these abuses (v. 4): None calls for justice. When justice is not done there is blame to be laid not only upon the magistrates, but upon the people. Private persons ought to contribute to the public good by discovering secret wickedness. Truth is opposed, and there is not any that pleads for it, not any that has the courage to confront a prosperous fraud. The way of peace is as little regarded as the way of truth; they know it not, that is, they never study the things that make for peace. There is no judgment in their goings; they have not any sense of justice in their dealings. Those that practise iniquity trust in vanity, v. 4. Their webs, which they weave with so much art and industry, shall not become garments, neither shall they cover themselves, either for shelter or for ornament, with their works, v. 6. There is nothing to be got by sin, and so it will appear when profit and loss come to be compared. Those paths of iniquity are crooked paths (v. 8), which will perplex them, but will never bring them to their journey's end.

Verses 9–15

Sin is the great mischief-maker. Here it seems to be spoken by the people to God, as an acknowledgment of their humble submission to the justice of God's proceedings.

I. They acknowledge that God had contended with them, v. 9–11. 1. They were in distress, oppressed by their enemies, and God did not appear for them, to plead their just and injured cause: "Judgment is far from us, neither does justice overtake us, v. 9. Though, as to our persecutors, we are sure that we have right on our side, and they are the wrong-doers, yet we have not done justice to one another, and therefore God suffers our enemies to deal thus unjustly with us." 2. Their expectations were sadly disappointed: We wait for light as those that wait for the morning, but behold obscurity; we look for judgment, but there is none (v. 11); we look for salvation, because God (we think) has promised it, and we have prayed for it with fasting; but still we walk in darkness. 3. They were at their wits' end (v. 10): We grope for the wall like the blind. Those that love darkness rather than light shall have their doom accordingly. 4. They sunk into despair. We are in desolate places as dead men. The state of the Jews in Babylon is represented by dead and dry bones (Ezek. xxxvii. 12) and the explanation of the comparison there (v. 11) explains this text: Our hope is lost; we are cut off for our parts. We roar like bears; the sorrow of others was silent, and preyed more upon their spirits: We mourn sore like doves, like doves of the valleys.

II. They acknowledge that they had provoked God, v. 12–15. 1. They owned that they had sinned. We are witnesses against ourselves: As for our iniquities, we know them, though we may have foolishly endeavoured to cover them. 2. They owned the evil of sin; it is transgressing and lying against the Lord, v. 13. The sins of God's people are upon this account worse than the sins of others, that in transgressing they lie against the Lord; they misrepresent him, perfidiously break covenant with him, which is lying against him. 3. They owned that there was a general decay of moral honesty; and those who were false to their God were unfaithful to one another. They spoke oppression, though it was a revolt from truth. They conceived and uttered words of falsehood. Many a word of falsehood is uttered in haste, for want of consideration; but these were conceived and uttered, were uttered deliberately and of malice prepense. They were words of falsehood, and yet they are said to be uttered from the heart, because they agreed with the malice and wickedness of the heart, and were the natural language of that; it was a double heart, Ps. xii. 2. 4. They owned that that was not done which might have been done to reform the land and to amend what was amiss, v. 14. "Judgment, that should run in its course like a river, like a mighty stream, is turned away backward, a contrary course. The administration of justice has become but a cover to the greatest injustice. Justice stands afar off, even from our courts of judicature. Truth is fallen in the street, yea, truth fails in common conversation, so that one knows not whom to believe nor whom to trust." 5. They owned that there was a prevailing enmity to those that were good: He that does evil goes unpunished, but he that departs from evil makes himself a prey. It is crime with them for a man not to do as they do, and they treat him as an enemy who will not partake with them in their wickedness. He that departs from evil is accounted mad; so the margin reads. 6. They owned that all this could not but be displeasing to the God of heaven. Though it was done secretly, and gilded over with specious pretences, yet it could not be concealed from his all-seeing eye. Though the sin displeased him, he would soon have been reconciled to the sinners upon their returning from their evil way.

Verses 16–21

Sin abounded in the former part of the chapter; grace does much more abound in these verses.

I. Why God wrought salvation, notwithstanding their provocations. It was purely for his own name's sake.

1. He took notice of their weakness and wickedness: He saw that there was no man that would do anything for the support of religion and virtue among them. Most were wicked, and those that were not so were weak. There was no intercessor, none to intercede with God (v. 16), no advocate to speak a good word for those who were made a prey because they kept their integrity, v. 15. They complained that God did not appear for them (ch. lviii. 3); but God with much more reason complains that they did nothing for themselves.

2. He engaged his own strength and righteousness for them. They shall be saved. The work of reformation (that is the first and principle article of the salvation) shall be wrought by the immediate influences of the divine grace on men's consciences. When God stirred up the spirit of Cyrus, and brought his people out of Babylon, not by might, nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts, then his own arm, which is never shortened, brought salvation. Divine justice, which by their sins they had armed against them, through grace appears for them. Though they can expect no favour as due to them, yet he will, in righteousness, punish the enemies of his people; see Deut. ix. 5. Not for thy righteousness, but for the wickedness of these nations they are driven out. In our redemption by Christ, since we had no righteousness of our own to produce, he brought in a righteousness by the merit and mediation of his own Son (it is called the righteousness which is of God by faith, Phil. iii. 9). He put on righteousness as a breastplate, securing his own honour, as a breastplate does the vitals, and put a helmet of salvation upon his head.

When righteousness is his coat of arms, salvation is his crest. In allusion to this, among the pieces of a Christian's armour we find the breastplate of righteousness, and for a helmet the hope of salvation (Eph. vi. 14–17; 1 Thess. v. 8), and it is called the armour of God, because he wore it first and so fitted it for us. Because they have no spirit or zeal to do anything for themselves, God will put on the garments of vengeance for clothing, and clothe himself with zeal as a cloak; he will make his justice upon the enemies of his church and people to appear evident.

II. The salvation that shall be wrought by the righteousness of God himself.

1. There shall be a present temporal salvation wrought for the Jews in Babylon, or elsewhere in distress and captivity. This is promised (v. 18, 19) as a type of something further. It is here promised, (1) That God will reckon with his enemies and will render to them according to their deeds, to the enemies of his people abroad, to the enemies of justice and truth at home, for they also are God's enemies; he will deal with both as they have deserved, according to former retributions; as he has rendered to his enemies formerly, fury to his adversaries, recompense to his enemies; his fury shall not exceed the rules of justice. Even to the islands, that lie most remote, if they have appeared against him, he will repay recompense; for his hand shall find out all his enemies (Ps. xxi. 8), and his arrows reach them. (2) That, whatever attempts the enemies of God's people may afterwards make to disturb their peace, they shall be brought to nought: When the enemy shall come in like a flood, then the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him, and so (as the margin reads it) put him to flight. (3) That all this should redound to the glory of God and the advancement of religion in the world (v. 19). This had its full accomplishments in gospel times, when many came from the east and west, to fill up the places of the children of the kingdom that were cast out, when there were set up eastern and western churches, Matt. viii. 11.

2. There shall be a more glorious salvation wrought out by the Messiah in the fulness of time. The two great promises relating to that salvation:

(1) That the Son of God shall come to us to be our Redeemer (v. 20). The coming of Christ as the Redeemer is the summary of all the promises both of the Old and New Testament, and this was the redemption in Jerusalem which the believing Jews looked for, Luke ii. 38. Christ is our Goël, our next kinsman, that redeems both the person and the estate of the poor debtor. [1] The place where this Redeemer shall appear: He shall come to Zion, for there, on that holy hill, the Lord would set him up as his King, Ps. ii. 6. Zion was a type of the gospel church. [2] The persons that shall have the comfort of the Redeemer's coming, knowing that their redemption draws nigh. He shall come to those that turn from ungodliness in Jacob, but to those only that turn from transgression, that repent, and reform.

(2) That the Spirit of God shall come to us to be our sanctifier, v. 21. But the promise is made to a single person—My Spirit that is upon thee, being directed either, [1] To Christ as the head of the church, who received that he might give. Or, [2] To the church; and so it is a promise of the continuance and perpetuity of the church in the world to the end of time, parallel to those promises that the throne and seed of Christ shall endure for ever, Ps. lxxxix. 29, 36; xxii. 30. Instead of the fathers shall be the children. It shall be kept up—henceforth and for ever, even unto the end of the world. The Spirit that was upon Christ shall always continue in the hearts of the faithful; there shall be some in every age on whom he shall work, and in whom he shall dwell, and thus the Comforter shall abide with the church for ever, John xiv. 16. There shall be some in every age who, believing with the heart unto righteousness, shall with the tongue make confession unto salvation. On these foundations the church is built, stands firmly, and shall stand for ever, Christ himself being the chief corner-stone.

CHAP. LX

This whole chapter is a part of God's covenant with his church. The long continuance of the church, even unto the utmost ages of time, was there promised, and here the large extent of the church, even unto the utmost regions of the earth. It is here promised, I. That the church shall be enlightened, ver. 1, 2. II. That it shall be enlarged, ver. 3–8. III. That the new converts shall be greatly serviceable to the church, ver. 9–13. IV. That the church shall be in great honour among men, ver. 14–16.

V. That it shall enjoy a profound peace and tranquillity, ver. 17, 18. VI. That, the members of it being all righteous, the glory and joy of it shall be everlasting, ver. 19–22. Now this has some reference to the peaceable and prosperous condition which the Jews were in after their return into their own land; but it looks further, and was to have its full accomplishment in the kingdom of the Messiah, the enlargement of that kingdom by the bringing in of the Gentiles into it, and the spiritual blessings in heavenly things by Christ Jesus with which it should be enriched.

Verses 1–8

It is here promised that the gospel temple shall be very light and very large.

I. It shall be very light: Thy light has come. When the Jews returned out of captivity they had light and gladness, and joy and honour; they then were made to know the Lord and to rejoice in his great goodness. 1. What this light is, and whence it springs: The Lord shall arise upon thee (v. 2), the glory of the Lord (v. 1) shall be seen upon thee. When God appears to us, then the glory of the Lord rises upon us as the morning light; when he appears for us, then his glory is seen upon us. When Christ arose as the sun of righteousness, and in him the day-spring from on high visited us, then the glory of the Lord was seen upon us, the glory as of the first-begotten of the Father. 2. What a foil there shall be to this light: Darkness shall cover the earth; but, though it be gross darkness, that shall overspread the people, yet the church shall have light at the same time. 3. What is the duty which the rising of this light calls for: "Arise, shine; not only receive this light, and" (as the margin reads it) "be enlightened by it, but reflect this light: arise and shine with rays borrowed from it."

II. It shall be very large. When the Jews were settled in their own land, after their captivity, many of the people of the land joined themselves to them; but we must look further, to the bringing of the Gentiles into the gospel church, not their flocking to one particular place. There is no place now that is the centre of the church's unity; but the promise respects their flocking to Christ, and coming by faith, and hope, and holy love, into that family which is named from him, Eph. iii. 15. You have come unto Mount Zion, to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, which serves for a key to this prophecy, Eph. ii. 19.

1. What shall invite such multitudes to the church: "They shall come to thy light and to the brightness of thy rising," v. 3. This light which discovers so much of God and his goodwill to man, by which life and immortality are brought to light, this shall invite all the serious well-affected part of mankind to come and join themselves to the church. The purity and love of the primitive Christians, their heavenly-mindedness, and patient sufferings, were the brightness of the church's rising, which drew many into it.

2. What multitudes shall come to the church. Great numbers shall come, Gentiles (or nations) of those that are saved. Nations shall be discipled (Matt. xxviii. 19). They come from all parts (v. 4): Lift up thy eyes round about, and see them coming, devout men out of every nation under heaven, Acts ii. 5. Sons and daughters shall come in the most dutiful manner, as thy sons and thy daughters, resolved to be of thy family. Those that would enjoy the dignities and privileges of Christ's family must submit to the discipline of it.

3. What they shall bring with them and what advantage shall accrue to the church by their accession to it. The merchants shall write holiness to the Lord upon their merchandise and their hire, as ch. xxiii. 18. "The abundance of the sea (the fish, the pearls) or that which is imported by sea, shall all be converted to thee and to thy use." The wealth of the rich merchants shall be laid out in works of piety and charity. The mighty men of the nations shall employ their might in the service of the church: "The forces of the Gentiles shall come unto thee, to guard thy coasts, and fight thy battles." The camels and dromedaries that bring gold and incense, those of Midian and Sheba, shall bring the richest commodities of their country, not to trade with, but to honour God with. This was in part fulfilled when the wise men of the east came to Christ, and presented to him treasures of gold, frankincense, and myrrh, Matt. ii. 11. Great numbers of sacrifices shall be brought to God's altar, and, though brought by Gentiles, shall find acceptance, v. 7. Kedar was famous for flocks, and probably the fattest rams were those of Nebaioth; these shall come up with acceptance on God's altar. This was fulfilled when by the decree of Darius the governors beyond the rivers were ordered to furnish the temple at Jerusalem with bullocks, rams, and lambs, for the burnt-offering of the God of heaven, Ezra vi. 9.

4. How God shall be honoured by the increase of the church! When they bring their gold and incense it shall be to show forth the praises of the Lord, v. 6. The church is the house of God's glory, where he manifests his glory to his people and receives that homage by which they do honour to him. And it is for the glory of this house that the Gentiles shall bring their offerings to it (v. 7).

5. How the church shall herself be affected with this increase of her numbers, v. 5. "Thou shalt see and flow together" (or flow to and fro). There shall be a mixture of fear with this joy: "Thy heart shall fear, doubting whether it be lawful to go in to the uncircumcised and eat with them." Peter was so impressed with this fear that he needed a vision and voice from heaven to help him over it, Acts x. 28. "When this fear is conquered thy heart shall be so enlarged that thou shalt have room in it for all the Gentile converts." These converts flocking to the church shall be greatly admired (v. 8): Who are these that fly as a cloud? The conversion of souls is flying like a cloud in great multitudes, yet with great unanimity, as a cloud flying on the wings of the wind. They shall fly as doves to their windows; on the wings of the harmless dove, which flies low, denoting innocency and humility. They fly to Christ, to the church, as doves, by instinct, to their own windows, to their own home.

Verses 9–14

The promises made to the church are repeated for the encouragement of the Jews after their return out of captivity, but looking further, to the enlargement and advancement of the gospel church.

I. God will be very gracious and propitious to them. "All shall now make court to thee, for in my wrath I smote thee, while thou wast in captivity, but now in my favour have I had mercy on thee, and therefore have all this mercy in store for thee."

II. Many shall be brought into the church, even from far countries (v. 9): Surely the isles shall wait for me, shall welcome the gospel. The ships of Tarshish, transport-ships, shall carry the ministers of the church to remote parts, to preach the gospel. They live at such a distance that they cannot bring their flocks, so turned them into money to bring their silver and gold with them.

III. Those that come into the church shall be welcome. "Therefore thy gates shall be open continually (v. 11), not only because thou hast no reason to fear thy enemies, but because thou hast reason to expect thy friends." It is usual with us to leave our doors open, or leave someone ready to open them, all night, if we look for a child or a guest to come in late. The gate of mercy is always open, night and day, or shall soon be opened to those that knock.

IV. All that are about the church shall be made in some way or other serviceable to it. So here (v. 10), "Even the sons of strangers, that have neither knowledge of thee nor kindness for thee, shall build up thy wall, and their kings shall in that and other things minister unto thee." This was fulfilled when the king of Persia, and the governors of the provinces by his order, were aiding Nehemiah in building the wall about Jerusalem. Even those that do not belong to the church may be a protection to it, for (v. 12), The nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish.

V. There shall be abundance of beauty added to the ordinances of divine worship (v. 13): The glory of Lebanon, the strong and stately cedars that grow there, shall come unto thee, as of old to Solomon, when he built the temple (2 Chron. ii. 16), and with them shall be brought other timber, proper for the carved work. The temple, the place of God's sanctuary, shall be not only rebuilt, but beautified. It was likewise adorned with goodly stones and gifts (Luke xxi. 5), yet so slightly did Christ speak of them there that we must suppose it to have its full accomplishment in the beauties of holiness.

VI. The church shall appear truly great and honourable, v. 14. The people of the Jews, after their return out of captivity, by degrees became more considerable. This prophecy is further fulfilled when those that have been enemies to the church are wrought upon by the grace of God to see their error: "The sons of those that afflicted thee, if not they themselves, yet their children, shall crouch to thee, shall beg pardon for their folly and beg an interest in thy favour and admission into thy family," 1 Sam. ii. 36. The poor oppressed ones of the church shall have an opportunity of doing good to those who have done evil to them and saving those alive who have afflicted and despised them. It is a pleasure to a good man, and he accounts it an honour, to show mercy to those with whom he has found no mercy.

Verses 15–22

The happy and glorious state of the church is further foretold, referring ultimately to the Christian church under the type of that little gleam of outward peace which the Jews sometimes enjoyed after their return out of captivity.

I. Compared with what it had been.

1. She had been despised, but now she should be honoured, v. 15, 16. Jerusalem had been forsaken and hated. But now it shall be the joy of good people for many generations. Yet considering how short Jerusalem's excellency was, and how short it came of the vast compass of this promise, we must look for the full accomplishment of it in the perpetual excellencies of the gospel church, and the glorious privileges and advantages of the Christian religion. She shall find herself countenanced by her neighbours. The nations, and their kings, that are brought to embrace Christianity, shall lay themselves out for the good of the church. "Thou shalt suck the milk of the Gentiles, not suck their blood (that is not the spirit of the gospel); thou shalt suck the breast of kings, who shall be to thee as nursing fathers." She shall find herself countenanced by her God: "Thou shalt know that I the Lord am thy Saviour and thy Redeemer, shalt know it by experience." They before knew the Lord to be their God; now they know him to be their Saviour, their Redeemer.

2. She had been impoverished, but now she shall be enriched, v. 17. Those, who were raised out of the dust, instead of brass money in their purses have gold, and instead of iron vessels in their houses have silver ones. So shall the spiritual glory of the New Testament church exceed the external pomp and splendour of the Jewish economy. When we had baptism in the room of circumcision, the Lord's supper in the room of the passover, and a gospel ministry in the room of a Levitical priesthood, we had gold instead of brass. Sin turned gold into brass when Rehoboam made brazen shields instead of the golden ones he had pawned; but God's favour, when that returns, will turn brass again into gold.

3. She had been oppressed by her own princes (ch. lix. 14); but now all the grievances of that kind shall be redressed (v. 17): "I will make thy officers peace. They shall be peace, that is, they shall sincerely seek thy welfare and by their means thou shalt enjoy good."

4. She had been insulted by her neighbours, invaded, and plundered; but now it shall be so no more (v. 18): "Violence shall no more be heard in thy land; but every man shall peaceably enjoy his own. There shall be no wasting nor destruction, but thy walls shall be called salvation and thy gates shall be praise."

II. Compared with what it would be.

In the close of this chapter we are directed to look further yet, as far forward as to the glory and happiness of heaven, under the type and figure of the flourishing state of the church on earth. As the prophets sometimes insensibly pass from the blessings of the Jewish church to the spiritual blessings of the Christian church, which are eternal, so sometimes they rise from the church militant to the church triumphant, where, and where only, all the promised peace, and joy, and honour will be in perfection. 1. God shall be all in all in the happiness here promised (v. 19): The sun and the moon shall be no more thy light. "Idolaters worshipped the sun and moon (which some have thought the most ancient and plausible idolatry); but these shall be no more thy light, shall no more be idolized, but the Lord shall be to thee a constant light in the night of adversity as well as in the day of prosperity." 2. The happiness here promised shall know no change (v. 20): "Thy sun shall no more go down, but it shall be eternal sunshine with thee; that shall not be thy sun which is sometimes eclipsed, often clouded, and will certainly set and leave thee in the dark, in the cold, but he shall be a sun, who is himself the Father of all lights, with whom there is no variableness, nor shadow of turning," James i. 17. The comforts and joys that are in heaven, the glories provided for the soul, as the light of the sun, and those prepared for the glorified body too, as the light of the moon, shall never know the least cessation. And the days of thy mourning shall be ended. 3. Those that are entitled to this happiness shall never be put out of the possession of it (v. 21). And they shall be all the righteous together who shall replenish the New Jerusalem. And, because they are all righteous, therefore they shall inherit the land for ever, for nothing but sin can turn them out of it. 4. The glory of the church: "They shall appear to be the branch of my planting, the work of my hands, and I will own them as such." 5. They will appear the more glorious, and God will be the more glorified in them, if we compare what they are with what they were (v. 22): "A little one shall become a thousand and a small one a strong nation." The captives that returned out of Babylon strangely multiplied, and became a strong nation. The Christian church was a little one, a very small one at first—the number of their names was once but 120; yet it became a thousand. When they come to heaven, and look back upon the smallness of their beginning, they will wonder how they got thither. It may seem to be delayed, but, as the Lord will do it, so he will hasten it; he will do it in the time appointed by his wisdom, though not in the time prescribed by our folly. And this is really hastening it; for, though it seem to tarry, it does not tarry if it come in God's time.

CHAP. LXI

I. We find the grace of Christ under the type and figure of Isaiah's province, which was to foretell the deliverance of the Jews out of Babylon, ver. 1–3. II. We think we find the glories of the church of Christ, its spiritual glories, described under the type of the Jews' prosperity after their return. It is promised 1. That the decays of the church shall be repaired, ver. 4. 2. That those from without shall be made serviceable to the church, ver. 5. 3. That the church shall be a royal priesthood, maintained by the riches of the Gentiles, ver. 6. 4. That she shall have honour and joy in lieu of all her shame and sorrow, ver. 7. 5. That her affairs shall prosper, ver. 8. 6. That posterity shall enjoy these blessings, ver. 9. 7. That righteousness and salvation shall be the eternal matter of the church's rejoicings and thanksgiving, ver. 10, 11.

Verses 1–3

He that is the best expositor of scripture has given us the best exposition of these verses, even our Lord Jesus himself, who read this in the synagogue at Nazareth (perhaps it was the lesson for the day) and applied it entirely to himself, saying, This day is this scripture fulfilled in your ears (Luke iv. 17, 18, 21). As Isaiah was directed to proclaim liberty to the Jews in Babylon, so was Christ, God's messenger, to publish a more joyful jubilee to a lost world.

I. How he was fitted and qualified for this work: The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, v. 1. The prophets had the Spirit of God moving them at times, both instructing them what to say and exciting them to say it. Christ had the Spirit always resting on him without measure. When he entered upon the execution of his prophetical office the Spirit, as a dove, descended upon him, Matt. iii. 16. This Spirit he communicated to those whom he sent to proclaim the same glad tidings, saying to them, when he gave them their commission, Receive you the Holy Ghost.

II. How he was appointed and ordained to it: The Spirit of God is upon me, because the Lord God has anointed me. Hence the Redeemer was called the Messiah, the Christ, because he was anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows. He has sent me.

III. What the work was to which he was appointed and ordained.

1. He was to be a preacher, was to execute the office of a prophet. He must preach good tidings (so gospel signifies) to the meek, to the penitent, and humble, and poor in spirit; to them the tidings of a Redeemer will be indeed good tidings.

2. He was to be a healer. He was sent to bind up the broken-hearted. Those whose hearts are broken for sin, who are truly humbled under the sense of guilt and dread of wrath, are furnished in the gospel of Christ with that which will make them easy and silence their fears.

3. He was to be a deliverer. He was sent as a prophet to preach, as a priest to heal, and as a king to issue out proclamations: (1) Proclamations of peace to his friends: He shall proclaim liberty to the captives (as Cyrus did to the Jews in captivity) and the opening of the prison to those that were bound. Whereas, by the guilt of sin, we are bound over to the justice of God, sold for sin, Christ lets us know that he has made satisfaction to divine justice for that debt, that his satisfaction is accepted, and if we will plead that, and make over ourselves and all we have to him, we may by faith sue out our pardon; there is, and shall be, no condemnation to us. And whereas, by the dominion of sin in us, we are bound under the power of Satan, Christ lets us know that he has conquered Satan, and provided for us grace sufficient to enable us to shake off the yoke of sin and to loose ourselves from those bands of our neck. The son is ready by his Spirit to make us free. This is the gospel proclamation, and it is like the blowing of the jubilee-trumpet, which proclaimed the great year of release (Lev. xxv. 9, 40), in allusion to which it is here called the acceptable year of the Lord, because it publishes his free grace, and an acceptable year because it brings glad tidings to us, and what cannot but be very acceptable to those who know the capacities and necessities of their own souls. (2) Proclamations of war against his enemies. Christ proclaims the day of vengeance of our God, [1] On sin and Satan, death and hell, and all the powers of darkness, to be destroyed in order to our deliverance; these Christ triumphed over in his cross. [2] On those of the children of men that stand it out against those fair offers.

4. He was to be a comforter, and so he is a preacher, healer, and deliverer; he is sent to comfort all who mourn, and who, mourning, seek to him, and not to the world, for comfort. As blessings out of Zion are spiritual blessings, so mourners in Zion are holy mourners, such as carry their sorrows to the throne of grace. To such as these Christ has appointed by his gospel, and will give by his Spirit (v. 3), those consolations which will not only support them under their sorrows, but turn them into songs of praise. He will give them, (1) Beauty for ashes. Here is an elegant paronomasia in the original: He will give them pheer—beauty, for epher—ashes; he will turn their sorrow into joy as quickly and as easily as you can transpose a letter; for he speaks, and it is done. (2) The oil of joy, which makes the face to shine, instead of mourning, which disfigures the countenance and makes it unlovely. (3) The garments of praise, such beautiful garments as were worn on thanksgiving-days, instead of the spirit of heaviness, dimness, or contraction—open joys for secret mournings.

5. He was to be a planter; for the church is God's husbandry. All that Christ does for us is to make us God's people, and some way serviceable to him as living trees, planted in the house of the Lord, and flourishing in the courts of our God; that others also may take occasion from God's favour shining on his people, and his grace shining in them, to praise him, and that he may be for ever glorified in his saints.

Verses 4–9

Promises are here made to the Jews now returned out of captivity which are to be extended to the gospel church through grace delivered out of spiritual thraldom.

I. It is promised that their houses shall be rebuilt (v. 4), that their cities shall be raised out of the ruins. The setting up of Christianity in the world repaired the decays of natural religion and raised up those desolations both of piety and honesty which had been for many generations the reproach of mankind. An unsanctified soul is like a city that is broken down, but by the power of Christ's gospel and grace it is fitted to be a habitation of God through the Spirit.

II. Those that were servants, working for their oppressors, shall now have servants to do their work. Strangers, and the sons of the alien, shall keep their sheep, till their ground, and dress their gardens. Strangers shall feed your flocks, v. 5.

III. They shall be released and honourably employed (v. 6): "While the strangers are keeping your flocks, you shall be keeping the charge of the sanctuary; instead of being slaves to your task-masters, you shall be named the priests of the Lord, a high and holy calling." Those whom God sets at liberty he sets to work; he delivers them out of the hands of their enemies that they may serve him, Luke i. 74, 75; Ps. cxvi. 16. But his service is perfect freedom. And the gospel church is a royal priesthood, 1 Pet. ii. 9.

IV. The wealth and honour of the Gentile converts shall redound to the benefit and credit of the church, v. 6. Those that were strangers shall become fellow-citizens with the saints. 1. They shall eat the riches of the Gentiles honourably presented to them, as gifts brought to the altar. 2. They shall boast themselves in their glory. Whatever was the honour of the Gentile converts before their conversion, it shall turn to the reputation of the church to which they have joined themselves; and whatever is their glory after their conversion—their holy zeal, their patient suffering, and that blessed change which divine grace has made in them—shall be very much for the glory of God.

V. They shall have abundance of comfort, v. 7. The Jews were thus privileged after their return; they were in a new world, and now knew how to value their liberty. Much more do all those rejoice whom Christ has brought into the glorious liberty of God's children, especially when the privileges of their adoption shall be completed in the resurrection of the body. 1. They shall rejoice in their portion. Though the houses, as well as their temple, be much inferior, yet they shall be in their land, their own land, the holy land, Immanuel's land, and therefore they shall rejoice. 2. Everlasting joy shall be unto them which shall last much longer than the captivity had lasted. Yet we must look for the accomplishment of this promise in the spiritual joy which believers have in God and the eternal joy they hope for in heaven. 3. This shall be a double recompense to them, for all the reproach and vexation they have lain under in the land of their captivity: "For your shame you shall have double honour, and in your land you shall possess double wealth; the blessing of God upon it. You shall be owned not only as God's sons, but as his first-born (Exod. iv. 22), and therefore entitled to a double portion." As the miseries of their captivity were so great that in them they are said to have received double for all their sins (ch. xl. 2), so the joys of their return shall be so great that in them they shall receive double for all their shame. The former is applicable to the fulness of Christ's satisfaction, in which God received double for all our sins; the latter to the fulness of heaven's joys, in which we shall receive more than double for all services and sufferings. Job's case illustrates this: when God turned again his captivity, he gave him twice as much as he had before.

VI. God will be a God in covenant with them (v. 8): I will direct their work in truth. God by his providence will order their affairs for the best. As a reason both of this and of the foregoing promise, those words come in, in the former part of the verse, I the Lord love judgment. He loves that judgment should be done among men, both between magistrates and subjects and between neighbour and neighbour, and therefore he hates all injustice. If men do not do justice, he loves to do judgment himself in giving redress to those that suffer wrong and punishing those that do wrong. It is a truth that ritual services will never atone for the violation of moral precepts, nor will it justify any man's robbery to say, "It was for burnt-offerings," or Corban—It is a gift.

VII. God will entail a blessing upon their posterity (v. 9): Their seed (the children of those persons that are now the blessed of the Lord, or the church's seed) shall be accounted to the Lord for a generation, Ps. xxii. 30. 1. They shall be known among the Gentiles, shall distinguish themselves, especially by that brotherly love by which all men shall know them to be Christ's disciples. God shall dignify them, by making them the blessings of their age and instruments of his glory. 2. God shall have the glory of this, for all that see them shall see so much of the grace of God in them, that they shall acknowledge them to be the seed which the Lord has blessed and doth bless.

Verses 10–11

We are here taught to rejoice with holy joy, to God's honour, 1. In the beginning of this good work, the clothing of the church with righteousness and salvation, v. 10. Upon this account I will greatly rejoice in the Lord. The first gospel song begins like this, My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour, Luke i. 46, 47. The salvation God wrought for the Jews, and that reformation which appeared among them, made them look as glorious as if they had been clothed in robes of state. Christ has clothed his church with an eternal salvation by clothing it with the righteousness both of justification and sanctification. Observe how these two are put together; those, and those only, shall be clothed with the garments of salvation hereafter that are covered with the robe of righteousness now. Such is the beauty of God's grace in those that are clothed with the robe of righteousness. 2. In the progress and continuance of this good work, v. 11. It is not like a day of triumph, which is glorious for the present, but is soon over. The church rejoices to think that these inestimable blessings shall both spring for future ages and spread to distant regions. They shall spring forth for ages to come, as the fruits of the earth which are produced every year. As the garden enclosed causes the things that are sown in it to spring forth in their season, so constantly will the Lord God cause righteousness and praise to spring forth, by virtue of the covenant of grace. Though it may sometimes be winter with the church, when those blessings seem to wither and do not appear, yet the root of them is fixed, a spring-time will come, when they shall flourish again. They shall spread far, and spring forth before all the nations.

CHAP. LXII

The business of prophets was both to preach and pray. I. The prophet determines to apply constantly to this business, ver. 1. II. God appoints him and others of his prophets to continue for the encouragement of his people during the delays of their deliverance, ver. 6, 7. III The promises of the great things God would do for the Jews after their return out of captivity and for the Christian church when it shall be set up in the world. 1. The church shall be made honourable in the eyes of the world, ver. 2. 2. It shall appear to be very dear to God, precious and honourable in his sight, ver. 3–5. 3. It shall enjoy great plenty, ver. 8, 9. 4. It shall be released out of captivity and grow up again into a considerable nation, particularly favoured by heaven, ver. 10–12.

Verses 1–5

I. What he will do for the church. A prophet, as he is a seer, so he is a spokesman. He will not hold his peace; he will not rest. 1. What the prophet's resolution is: He will not hold his peace. He will continue instant in preaching. And he will continue instant in prayer. 2. What is the principle of this resolution—for Zion's sake, and for Jerusalem's, not for the sake of any private interest of his own, but for the church's sake, because he has an affection and concern for Zion, and it lies near his heart. It is God's Zion and his Jerusalem, and it is therefore dear to him, because it is so to God. 3. He resolves to continue this importunity—till the promise of the church's righteousness and salvation, given in the foregoing chapter, be accomplished. His prophecies will continue speaking of these things, and there shall in every age be a remnant that shall continue to pray for them. Then the church's righteousness and salvation will go forth as brightness, and as a lamp that burns, a light not only to the eyes but to the feet, and to the paths of those who before sat in darkness and in the shadow of death.

II. What God will do for the church. 1. The church shall be greatly admired. When that righteousness which is her salvation, her praise, and her glory, shall be brought forth, the Gentiles shall see it. "Even kings shall see and be in love with the glory of thy righteousness" (v. 2). 2. She shall be truly admirable. God is the fountain of honour and from him the church's honour comes: "Thou shalt be called by a new name, and those about thee shall have new thoughts of thee." Two names God shall give her: (1) He shall call her his crown (v. 3): Thou shalt be a crown of glory in the hand of the Lord, not on his head (as adding any real honour or power to him, as crowns do to those that are crowned with them), but in his hand, as a glory and beauty to him. "Thou shalt be a crown o glory and a royal diadem, through the hand, the good hand, of thy God upon thee. (2) He shall call her his spouse, v. 4, 5. This is a yet greater honour, considering what a forlorn condition she had been in. She was called forsaken and her land desolate during the captivity, like a woman reproachfully divorced or left a disconsolate widow. Such was the state of religion in the world before the preaching of the gospel. Instead of those two names of reproach, she shall be called by two honourable names. She shall be called Hephzi-bah, which signifies, My delight is in her, a proper name for a wife. God by his grace has wrought that in his church which makes her his delight, she being refined, and reformed, and brought home to him. She shall be called Beulah, which signifies married, whereas she had been desolate. She shall be married. Her sons shall heartily espouse the land of their nativity. Thy sons shall marry thee, that is, they shall live with thee and take delight in thee. When they were in Babylon, they seemed to have espoused that land, Jer. xxix. 5–7. But now they shall again marry their own land, as a young man marries a virgin. Her God will take pleasure in his church: As the bridegroom rejoices over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee.

Verses 6–9

Two things are here promised to Jerusalem:

I. Plenty of the means of grace—abundance of good preaching and good praying (v. 6, 7). Provision is made,

1. That ministers may do their duty as watchmen. He would set watchmen on their walls who should never hold their peace. They must take all opportunities to give warning to sinners, in season, out of season, and must never betray the cause of Christ by a treacherous or cowardly silence. They must never hold their peace at the throne of grace; must pray, and not faint.

2. That people may do their duty. Let them not think it enough that their watchmen pray for them, but let them pray for themselves. God's professing people must be a praying people, must be public-spirited in prayer.

II. Plenty of all other good things, v. 8. Their corn had been meat for their enemies. Here was a double grievance, that they themselves wanted that which was necessary to the support of life, whilst their enemies were strengthened by it. God is said to give their corn to their enemies, as the just punishment of their abuse of plenty. The wine which they had laboured for, strangers drank to gratify their lusts. But see the great fulness and satisfaction they should now be restored to (v. 9): Those that have gathered it shall eat it, and praise the Lord. We must gather what God gives, with care and industry; we must eat it freely and cheerfully. We must serve him with our abundance, use it in works of piety and charity, eat it and drink it in the courts of his holiness, where the altar, the priest, and the poor must all have their share. The Lord has sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength, that he will do this for his people. It is a great satisfaction to those who build their hopes on God's promise to be sure that what he has promised he is able to perform, Rom. iv. 21.

Verses 10–12

This, like passages before, refers to the deliverance of the Jews out of Babylon, and to the great redemption wrought out by Jesus Christ, and the proclaiming of gospel grace and liberty through him. 1. Way shall be made for this salvation, v. 10. The gates of Babylon shall be thrown open, the way from Babylon to the land of Israel shall be prepared; causeways shall be made and cast up through wet and miry places, and the stones gathered out from places rough and rocky. Thus John Baptist was sent to prepare the way of the Lord, Matt. iii. 3. 2. Notice shall be given of this salvation, v. 11, 12. It shall be proclaimed to the captives that they are set at liberty. Let it be said to Zion, for her comfort, Behold, thy salvation comes (that is, thy Saviour, who brings salvation). It follows, they shall be called, The holy people, and the redeemed of the Lord. The work before him, which shall be wrought in them and upon them, shall denominate them a holy people, cured of their inclination to idolatry and consecrated to God only; and the reward with him, the deliverance wrought for them, shall denominate them the redeemed of the Lord. Jerusalem shall then be called, Sought out, a city not forsaken. She shall be sought out, visited, as much as ever. When Jerusalem is called a holy city, then it is called sought out; for holiness draws respect. But this being proclaimed to the end of the world must have a reference to the gospel of Christ. It is published immediately to the church, but is echoed to every nation: Behold, thy salvation cometh. Christ is not only the Saviour, but the salvation itself. Christians shall be called saints (1 Cor. i. 2), the holy people, for they shall be called the redeemed of the Lord.

CHAP. LXIII

I God coming towards his people in ways of mercy and deliverance, and this is to be joined to the close of the foregoing chapter, where it was said to Zion, "Behold, thy salvation comes"; for here it is shown how it comes, ver. 1–6. II. God's people meeting him with their devotions; and this part of the chapter is carried on to the close of the next. 1. A thankful acknowledgment of the great favours God has bestowed upon them, ver. 7. 2. The magnifying of these favours (ver. 8), his compassionate concern for them (ver. 9), their unworthiness (ver. 10), and former mercies, ver. 11–14. 3. A very humble prayer to God to appear for them in their present distress, pleading God's mercy (ver. 15), their relation to him (ver. 16), their desire towards him (ver. 17), and the insolence of their enemies, ver. 18, 19.

Verses 1–6

A glorious victory is obtained by the providence of God over the enemies of Israel. The victory is obtained over the Edomites who had triumphed in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans (Ps. cxxxvii. 7) who cut off those who, making their way as far as they could from the enemy, escaped to them (Obad. 12, 13), and who were therefore reckoned with when Babylon was. Yet this victory over Edom is put as an instance or specimen of the like victories obtained over other nations that had been enemies to Israel. But this is not all: It is a victory obtained by the grace of God in Christ over our spiritual enemies. We find the garments dipped in blood adorning him whose name is called The Word of God, Rev. xix. 13.

In this representation of the victory we have,

I. An admiring question put to the conqueror, v. 1, 2, by the church, or by the prophet in the name of the church. He sees a mighty hero returning in triumph from a bloody engagement, and makes bold to ask him two questions: 1. Who he is. He observes him to come from the country of Edom, in such apparel as was glorious to a soldier, besmeared with blood and dirt. He observes that he does not come as one either frightened or fatigued, but that he travels in the greatness of his strength. The question, Who is this? perhaps means: Art thou for us or for our adversaries? 2. The other question is, "Wherefore art thou red in thy apparel? What hard service hast thou been engaged in, that thou carriest with thee these marks of toil and danger?" Is it possible that one who has such majesty should be employed in the servile work of treading the wine-press?

II. An admirable answer returned by him.

1. He tells who he is: I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save. He is the Saviour. He speaks in righteousness, and will therefore make good every word that he has spoken. He is mighty to save, able to bring about the promised redemption.

2. He tells how he came to appear in this hue (v. 3): I have trodden the wine-press alone.

(1) He gains the victory purely by his own strength, v. 3. But his people, for whom the salvation was to be wrought, were weak and helpless, desponding and listless, and had no heart to do anything (v. 5): "I looked, and there was none to help, none to uphold, none that had the courage to join with Cyrus against their oppressors; therefore my arm brought about the salvation; not by created might or power, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts, my own arm." God can help when all other helpers fail; that is his time to help. But this is most fully applicable to Christ's victories over our spiritual enemies, which he obtained by a single combat. He trod the wine-press alone, and triumphed over principalities and powers in himself, Col. ii. 15. When he entered the lists with the powers of darkness, all his disciples forsook him and fled.

(2) He undertakes the war purely out of his own zeal. God wrought salvation for the oppressed Jews because he was very angry with the oppressing Babylonians, angry at their idolatries, their pride and cruelty, and the injuries they did to his people. Our Lord Jesus wrought out our redemption in a holy zeal for the honour of his Father and the happiness of mankind, and a holy indignation at the daring attempts Satan had made upon both. He had a zeal against his and his people's enemies: The day of vengeance is in my heart (v. 4). He had a zeal for his people, and for all that he designed to make sharers in the intended salvation: "The year of my redeemed has come, the year appointed for their redemption." With what pleasure he speaks of his people; they are his redeemed; they are his own, dear to him. Though their redemption is not yet wrought out, yet he calls them his redeemed, because it shall as surely be done as if it were done already.

(3) He will obtain a complete victory over them all. Much is already done; for he now appears red in his apparel. In the destruction of the antichristian powers we meet with abundance of bloodshed (Rev. xiv. 20; xix. 13), which yet, according to the dialect of prophecy, may be understood spiritually, and doubtless so may this here.

Verses 7–14

The prophet is here making a thankful recognition of God's dealings with his church all along, before he comes, in the latter end of this chapter and in the next, as a watchman upon the walls, earnestly to pray to God for his compassion towards her in her present deplorable state.

I. Here is a general acknowledgment of God's goodness to them all along, v. 7. He mentions the kindness of God, his loving-kindness; so plenteous are the springs of divine mercy, that he speaks of it in the plural number—his loving-kindnesses. He mentions his praises, that is, the thankful acknowledgements of his loving-kindness. He speaks of the goodness that is from God, all that the Lord has bestowed on us, relating to life and godliness, in our personal and family capacity. We must bless God for the mercies enjoyed by others as well as for those enjoyed by ourselves. God does good because he is good; what he bestowed upon us must be traced up to the original; it is according to his mercies (not according to our merits) and according to the multitude of his loving-kindnesses.

II. The steps of God's mercy to Israel ever since it was formed into a nation. When he brought them out of Egypt and took them into covenant he said, 'Surely they are my people, children that will not lie," that will not dissemble with God in their covenantings. So he was their Saviour out of the bondage of Egypt, and many a time since he had been their Saviour. The principle that moved him to work salvation for them was in his love and in his pity. This is strangely expressed here: In all their affliction he was afflicted; thus far he sympathizes with them, that he takes what injury is done to them as done to himself. Their cries move him (Exod. iii. 7), as if he were pained in their pain. Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? God is so far from afflicting willingly (Lam. iii. 33) that, if they humble themselves he is afflicted in their affliction, as tender parents are in the case of a sick child. There is another reading of these words in the original: In all their affliction there was no affliction; though they were in great affliction, yet it was so altered by the grace of God for their good, and it was so allayed and balanced with mercies, they were so wonderfully supported and it ended so well, that it was in effect no affliction. The troubles of the saints are not afflictions, but medicines; saints are enabled to call them light, and but for a moment, and, with an eye to heaven as all in all, to make nothing of them. The highest angel in heaven, even the angel of his presence, is not thought too great to be sent on this errand. Thus the little ones' angels are said to be those that always behold the face of our Father, Matt. xviii. 10. But this is rather to be understood of Jesus Christ, the eternal Word, that angel of whom God spoke to Moses (Exod. xxiii. 20, 21), whose voice Israel was to obey. He is the angel of the covenant, God's messenger to the world, Mal. iii. 1. He is the angel of God's face, for he is the express image of his person; and the glory of God shines in the face of Christ. He that was to work out the eternal salvation wrought out the temporal salvations. He not only redeemed them out of their bondage, but he bore them and carried them all the days of old; in the wars they made upon the nations he stood by them, and though they were peevish, he bore with them, Acts xiii. 18. But they rebelled. They revolted from their allegiance to God and took up arms against him: They rebelled, and vexed his Holy Spirit with their unbelief and murmuring. The ungrateful rebellions of God's children against him are a vexation to his Holy Spirit. Thereupon he justly withdrew his protection. He who had been so much their friend was turned to be their enemy and fought against them, by one judgment after another, both in the wilderness and after their settlement in Canaan. Sin makes God an enemy, and makes him angry who was all love and pity. Sinners wilfully lose him for a friend. This refers especially to those calamities that were brought upon them by their captivity in Babylon for their idolatries and other sins. Then he remembered the days of old, v. 11.

1. This may be understood either of the people or of God. (1) We may understand it of the people. Israel then (spoken of as a single person) remembered the days of old, and reasoned, Where are all the wonders that our fathers told us of? "Where is he that brought them up out of Egypt? Is he not as able to bring us up out of Babylon? Where is the Lord God of Elijah? Where is the Lord God of our fathers?" Their fathers were a provoking people and yet found him a pardoning God; and why may not they find him so if they return to him? They use it as a plea with God in prayer for the turning again of their captivity, like that ch. li. 9, 10. (2) We may understand it of God; he put himself in mind of the days of old, of his covenant with Abraham (Lev. xxvi. 42). "Why should not I appear for them now as I did for their fathers, who were as undeserving, as ill-deserving, as they are?" He might have said, "I have delivered them formerly, but they have again brought trouble upon themselves (Prov. xix. 19); therefore I will deliver them no more," Judges x. 13. But mercy turns the argument the other way: "I have formerly delivered them and therefore will now."

2. Which way soever we take it, whether the people plead it with God or God with himself, these verses call to mind what God did by Moses for his people, especially in bringing them through the Red Sea. God led them by the right hand of Moses (v. 12) and the wonder-working rod was in his hand. It was not Moses that led, any more than it was Moses that fed them (John vi. 32), but God by Moses. God was the owner of the flock, but Moses was a shepherd under him, inured to labour and patience, and so fitted for this pastoral care, by his being trained up to keep the flock of his father Jethro. Herein he was a type of Christ the good shepherd, that lays down his life for his sheep. He put his holy Spirit within him; the Spirit of God was among them, and not only his providence, but his grace, did work for them. He carried them safely through the Red Sea. He divided the water before them (v. 12), so that it gave them not only passage, but protection, a wall on either side. He led them through the deep as a horse in the wilderness, or in the plain (v. 13). If God make us a way, he will make it plain and level. He brought them safely to a place of rest: As a beast goes down into the valley, carefully and gradually, so the Spirit of the Lord caused him to rest. Many a time in their march through the wilderness they had resting-places provided for them, v. 14. And at length they were made to rest finally in Canaan, and the Spirit of the Lord gave them that rest according to the promise. God did it with his glorious arm, the arm of his gallantry, or bravery; so the word signifies.

Verses 15–19

This prayer, continued to the end of the next chapter, is an affectionate, importunate, pleading prayer. It is calculated for the time of the captivity. As they had promises, so they had prayers, prepared for them against that time of need. Some good interpreters think this prayer looks further, and that it expresses the complaints of the Jews under their last rejection from God and destruction by the Romans.

I. The petitions they put up to God. Look down from heaven, and behold, v. 15. Look down from the habitation of thy holiness and of thy glory. God's holiness is his glory. Heaven is his habitation, the throne of his glory (v. 17): "Return; change thy way towards us, return in mercy, and let us have thy gracious presence with us." God's people dread nothing more than his departures from them and desire nothing more than his returns to them.

II. The complaints they made to God. 1. That they were given up to themselves, and God's grace did not recover them, v. 17. It is a strange expostulation, Why hast thou made us to err from thy ways; thou hast hardened our heart from thy fear. Some make it to be the language of those that were impious and profane; when the prophets reproved them for the error of their ways, they with a daring impudence charged their sin upon God, made him the author of it. But I rather take it to be the language of those that lamented the unbelief and impenitence of their people, not accusing God of being the author of their wickedness, but complaining of it to him. They owned that they had erred from God's ways, that their hearts had been hardened from his fear, and this was the cause of all their errors from his ways; or from his fear may mean from the true worship of God. Now this they complain of, as their great misery and burden, that God had for their sins permitted them to err from his ways and had justly withheld his grace, so that their hearts were hardened from his fear. When they ask, Why hast thou done this? it is not as charging him with wrong, but lamenting it as a sore judgment. God had caused them to err and hardened their hearts (v. 10) by a judicial sentence. Their troubles had alienated many of them from God, and prejudiced them against his service; their afflictions were their temptations, and to many of them invincible ones. 2. That they were given up to their enemies (v. 18): Our adversaries have trodden down thy sanctuary. They complained not so much of the adversaries treading down their houses and cities as of their treading down God's sanctuary, because thereby God was immediately affronted, and they were robbed of the comforts they valued most.

III. The pleas for mercy and deliverance. 1. They pleaded the tender compassion God used to show to his people, v. 15. The most prevailing arguments in prayer are those that are taken from God himself. It cannot be that divine zeal, which is infinitely wise and just, should be cooled, that divine strength, which is infinite, should be weakened. Has God, who so often remembered to be gracious, now forgotten to be so? Has he in anger shut up his tender mercies? It can never be. 2. They pleaded God's relation to them as their Father (v. 16): Thy tender mercies are not restrained, for they are the tender mercies of a father. However it be, yet God is good; for he is our Father. When the father is dead his sons come to honour and he knows it not, Job xiv. 21. "But thou, O Lord! art our Father still (the fathers of our flesh may call themselves ever-loving; but they are not ever-living; it is God only that is the immortal Father, that always knows us, and is never at a distance from us), and therefore our Redeemer from everlasting is thy name, the name by which we will know and own thee. We are so degenerate and corrupt that Abraham and Israel would not own us for their children, yet we fly to thee as our Father. Abraham cast out his son Ishmael; Jacob disinherited his son Reuben and cursed Simeon and Levi; but our heavenly Father, in pardoning sin, is God, and not man," Hos. xi. 9. 3. They pleaded that he was their Lord: "We are thy servants; what service we can do thou art entitled to, and therefore we ought not to serve strange kings and strange gods: Return for thy servants' sake." We are the tribes of thy inheritance, not only thy servants, but thy tenants. Wilt thou suffer thy own servants and tenants to be thus abused? 4. They pleaded that they had had but a short enjoyment of the land of promise and the privileges of the sanctuary (v. 18): The people of thy holiness have possessed it but a little while. From Abraham to David were but fourteen generations, and from David to the captivity but fourteen more (Matt. i. 17), and that was but a little while in comparison with the promise of the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession (Gen. xvii. 8). 5. They pleaded that those who had their land were such as were strangers to God. "Thou never didst bear rule over them, nor did they ever yield thee any obedience. Will God suffer those that do not stand in any relation to him to trample upon those that do?"

CHAP. LXIV

This chapter goes on with that pathetic pleading prayer. I. They pray that God would appear in some remarkable manner for them against his and their enemies, ver. 1, 2. II. They plead what God had formerly done, and was always ready to do, for his people, ver. 3–5. III. They confess that they had deserved the judgments they were now under, ver. 6, 7. IV. They refer themselves to the mercy of God as a Father, and submit themselves to his sovereignty, ver. 8. V. They earnestly pray for the pardon of sin and the turning away of God's anger, ver. 9–12.

Verses 1–5

Here, I. The petition is that God would appear wonderfully for them now, v. 1, 2. When God works some extraordinary deliverance for his people he is said to shine forth, to show himself strong; so, here, they pray that he would rend the heavens and come down. This is applicable to the second coming of Christ, when the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout. They desire that the mountains might flow down at thy presence, that the fire of thy wrath may even dissolve the rockiest mountains and melt them as metal in the furnace, which is made liquid; so the melting fire burns, v. 2. Let things be put into a ferment, in order to a glorious revolution in favour of the church: As the fire causes the waters to boil. They desire that this may tend to the glory of God, may make his name known, not only to his friends, but to his adversaries, that they may know it and tremble at his presence. God's name, if it be not a stronghold for us, into which we may run and be safe, will be a stronghold against us, out of the reach of which we cannot run and be safe.

II. The plea is that God had appeared wonderfully for his people formerly.

1. They plead what he had done for his people Israel when he brought them out of Egypt, v. 3. He then did terrible things in the plagues of Egypt, which they looked not for. Then he came down upon Mount Sinai in such terror as made that and the adjacent mountains to flow down at his presence, to skip like rams (Ps. cxiv. 4). Some refer this to the defeat of Sennacherib's powerful army, which was as surprising an instance of the divine power as the melting down of rocks and mountains would be.

2. They plead the provision he has made for the safety and happiness of his people.

(1) It is very rich, v. 4. Men have not heard nor seen what God has prepared for those that wait for him. It is all that goodness which God has laid up for those that fear him, and wrought for those that trust in him, Ps. xxxi. 19. Much of it was concealed in former ages; they knew it not, because the unsearchable riches of Christ were hidden in God, were hidden from the wise and prudent; but in latter ages they were revealed by the gospel; so the apostle applies this (1 Cor. ii. 9), for it follows (v. 10), But God has revealed them unto us by his Spirit. That which men had not heard since the beginning of the world they should hear before the end of it. It cannot be fully comprehended by the human understanding; it is spiritual, and will far outdo our expectations. Even the present peace of believers, much more their future bliss, surpasses all expression, Phil. iv. 7. We must infer from God's works of wondrous grace, as well as from his works of wondrous power, from the kind things, as well as from the great things, he does, that there is no god like him.

(2) It is very ready (v. 5): "Thou meetest him that rejoices and works righteousness, meetest him with that good which thou hast prepared for him (v. 4), and dost not forget those that remember thee in thy ways." What communion there is between a gracious God and a gracious soul! We must be cheerful in doing our duty, we must rejoice and work righteousness, must delight ourselves in God and sing at our work. This intimates the friendship, fellowship, and familiarity to which God admits his people. He will anticipate them with the blessings of his goodness, will rejoice to do good to those that rejoice in working righteousness, and wait to be gracious to those that wait for him. He meets his penitent people with a pardon, as the father of the prodigal met his returning son, Luke xv. 20. He meets his praying people with an answer of peace, while they are yet speaking, ch. lxv. 24.

3. They plead the unchangeableness of God's favour and the stability of his promise: "Behold, thou hast many a time been wroth with us because we have sinned, and we have been under the tokens of thy wrath; but in those, those ways of thine, the ways of mercy in which we have remembered thee, in those is continuance," or in those thou art ever. And by this continuance of the covenant we hope to be saved, for its being an everlasting covenant is all our salvation.

Verses 6–12

The Lamentations of Isaiah—the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans and the sin of Israel that brought that destruction.

I. The people of God in their affliction confess and bewail their sins. Now that they were under divine rebukes for sin they had nothing to trust to but the mere mercy of God.

1. There was a general corruption of manners among them (v. 6): We are all as an unclean thing, or as an unclean person, as one overspread with a leprosy, who was to be shut out of the camp. Even all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags. "The best of our persons are so; we are all corrupt and polluted. The best of our performances are so. There is not only a general corruption of manners, but a general defection in the exercises of devotion."

2. There was a general coldness of devotion among them, v. 7. Prayer was in a manner neglected: "There is none that calls on thy name, none that seeks to thee for grace to reform us, or for mercy to relieve us and take away the judgments which our sins have brought upon us." If there was here and there one that called on God's name, it was with a great deal of indifferency: There is none that stirs up himself to take hold of God. To pray is to take hold of God, by faith to take hold of the promises God has made of his goodwill to us—to take hold of him as he that wrestles takes hold of him he wrestles with. But when we take hold of God it is as the boatman with his hook takes hold on the shore, as if he would pull the shore to him, but really it is to pull himself to the shore; so we pray, not to bring God to our mind, but to bring ourselves to his. Those that would take hold of God in prayer must stir up themselves to do it; all that is within us must be employed in the duty (and all little enough), our thoughts fixed and our affections flaming.

II. They acknowledge their afflictions to be the fruit and product of their own sins and God's wrath. "We are all as an unclean thing, and therefore we do all fade away as a leaf (v. 6), we not only wither and lose our beauty, but we fall and drop off" (so the word signifies) "as leaves in autumn; our profession of religion withers, and we grow dry and sapless; and then our iniquities like the wind have taken us away and hurried us into captivity, as the winds in autumn blow off, and then blow away, the faded withered leaves," Ps. i. 3, 4.

III. They claim relation to God as their God, and humbly plead it with him (v. 8): "But now, O Lord! thou art our Father. Foolish and careless as we are, poor and despised by our enemies, yet still thou art our Father; to thee therefore we return in our repentance." God is their Father, he gave them their being, formed them into a people, shaped them as he pleased: "We are the clay and thou our potter, therefore we will hope that you who madest us wilt newmake us, new-form us, though we have unmade and deformed ourselves: We are all as an unclean thing, but we are all the work of thy hands, therefore forsake us not," Ps. cxxxviii. 8. We are thy people; and should not a people seek unto their God? ch. viii. 19. We are thine; save us, Ps. cxix. 94.

IV. They are importunate with God for the turning away of his anger and the pardoning of their sins (v. 9). They pray that God would be reconciled to them, and then they can be easy whether the affliction be continued or removed: "Be not wroth to extremity, but let thy anger be mitigated by the clemency and compassion of a father."

V. The lamentable condition they were in. 1. Their own houses were in ruins, v. 10.. The cities of Judah were destroyed by the Chaldeans and the inhabitants of them were carried away. Thy holy cities are a wilderness. The cities of Judah are called holy cities, for the people were unto God a kingdom of priests, therefore they lamented the ruins of them. Even "Zion is a wilderness; the city of David itself lies in ruins; Jerusalem, that was beautiful, has become the scorn and scandal of the whole earth; that noble city is a heap of rubbish." 2. God's house was in ruins, v. 11. This they lament most of all, that the temple was burnt with fire. It was their holy and beautiful house; the holiness of it was in their eye the greatest beauty of it, and consequently the profanation of it was the saddest part of its desolation. It was the place where their fathers praised God with their sacrifices and songs; what a pity is it that that should lie in ashes which had been for so many ages the glory of their nation! All their pleasant things were laid waste, all those things which were employed by them in the service of God; not only the furniture of the temple, the altars and table, but the sabbaths, and all their religious feasts, which they used to keep with gladness.

VI. They conclude by humbly arguing with God concerning their present desolations (v. 12): Wilt thou refrain thyself for these things? When we are abused we hold our peace, because vengeance does not belong to us. When God is injured in his honour it may justly be expected that he should speak in the vindication of it; his people prescribe not what he shall say, but their prayer is (as here) Ps. lxxxiii. 1, "Keep not thou silence, O God! Speak for the conviction of thy enemies, speak for the comfort and relief of thy people; for wilt thou afflict us for ever?" God has said that he will not contend for ever, and therefore his people may depend upon it that their afflictions shall be neither to extremity nor to eternity, but light and for a moment.

CHAP. LXV

The conclusion of this evangelical prophecy, the last two chapters of which direct us to look as far forward as the new heavens and the new earth, the new world which the gospel dispensation should bring in. And why should it seem absurd that the prophet here should speak of that to which all the prophets bore witness? 1 Pet. i. 10, 11. The rejection of the Jews, and the calling in of the Gentiles, are often mentioned in the New Testament as that which was foreseen and foretold by the prophets, Acts x. 34; xiii. 40; Rom. xvi. 26. In this chapter we have, I. The anticipating of the Gentiles with the gospel call, ver. 1. II. The rejection of the Jews for their obstinacy and unbelief, ver. 2–7. III. The saving of a remnant by bringing them into the gospel church, ver. 8–10. IV. The judgments of God that should pursue the rejected Jews, ver. 11–16. V. The blessings reserved for the Christian church, ver. 17–25. But these things are here prophesied of under the figure of the difference God would make between some and others of the Jews after their captivity, between those that feared God and those that did not.

Verses 1–7

The apostle Paul has told us what was the event pointed at, namely, the calling in of the Gentiles and the rejection of the Jews, by the preaching of the gospel, Rom. x. 20, 21. And he observes that herein Esaias is very bold in foretelling it to the Jews, who would take it as a gross affront to their nation.

I. It is here foretold that the Gentiles, who had been afar off, should be made nigh, v. 1. Paul reads it thus: I was found of those that sought me not; I was made manifest to those that asked not for me. 1. Those who had long been without God in the world shall now be set seeking him; those who had not said, Where is God my maker? shall now begin to enquire after him. With what pleasure does the great God here speak of his being sought. For there is great joy in heaven over sinners who repent. 2. God shall anticipate their prayers with his blessings: I am found of those that sought me not. This happy acquaintance and correspondence between God and the Gentile world began on his side. Though in after-communion God is found of those that seek him (Prov. viii. 17), yet in the first conversion he is found of those that seek him not; for therefore we love him because he first loved us. 3. God gave the advantages of a divine revelation to those who had never made a profession of religion: I said, Behold me, behold me to those who were not called by my name, as the Jews for many ages had been. Christ said, Behold me, behold me with an eye of faith: look unto me, and be you saved.

II. It is here foretold that the Jews, who had long been a people near to God, should be cast off and set at a distance, v. 2. The apostle applies this to the Jews in his time, Rom. x. 21: But to Israel he saith, All day long I have stretched forth my hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people.

1. How the Jews were courted by the divine grace. God himself, by his prophets, by his Son, by his apostles, stretched forth his hands to them. God spread out his hands to them, as one reasoning and expostulating with them. When Christ was crucified his hands were spread out and stretched forth, as if he were preparing to receive returning sinners. He waited to be gracious, and was not weary of waiting; even those that came in at the eleventh hour of the day were not rejected.

2. They contemned the invitation; they were invited to the wedding-supper, and would not come, but rejected the counsel of God against themselves. The world shall see that it was not for nothing that they were rejected of God. They were very wilful. Right or wrong they would do as they had a mind. God had told them his thoughts, what his mind and will were, but they would walk after their own thoughts, would do what they thought best. This was God's complaint of them all along—they grieved him, they vexed his Holy Spirit, as if they would contrive how to make him their enemy. The prophet speaks more particularly of their iniquities and the iniquities of their fathers, as the ground of God's casting them off, v. 7. The most provoking iniquity of their fathers was idolatry. This was the sin that brought them into captivity, and, though the captivity pretty well cured them of it, yet, when the final ruin of that nation came, that was again brought into the account against them. Perhaps there were many, long after the captivity, who, though they did not worship other gods, married strange wives. They forsook God's temple, and sacrificed in gardens or groves, doing it in their own way, for they liked not God's institutions. They forsook God's altar, and burnt incense upon bricks, altars of their own contriving in comparison with the golden altar which God appointed them. "They used necromancy, or consulting with the dead, and, in order to that, they remained among the graves, and lodged in the monuments." They violated the laws of God about their meat, and broke through the distinction between clean and unclean before it was taken away by the gospel. They ate swine's flesh. And the broth, or pieces, of other forbidden meats, called here abominable things, was in their vessels, and was made use of for food. The forbidden meat is called an abomination, and those that meddle with it are said to make themselves abominable, Lev. xi. 42, 43. Perhaps this is here put figuratively for all forbidden pleasures. But those who thus take a pride in venturing upon the borders of sin are in danger of falling into the depths of it. The iniquity of the Jews in our Saviour's time was their pride and hypocrisy, that sin of the scribes and Pharisees against which Christ denounced so many woes, v. 5. They say, "Stand by thyself, keep to thy own companions, but come not near to me, lest thou pollute me; touch me not, for I am holier than thou." These are a smoke in my nose, such a smoke as comes not from a quick fire, which soon becomes glowing and pleasant, but from a fire of wet wood, which burns all the day, and is nothing but smoke. The proof against them is plain: Behold, it is written before me, v. 6. The iniquity of their fathers shall come against them; not but that their own sin deserved whatever judgments God brought upon them, and much heavier; and this they owned, Ezra ix. 13. Your iniquities and the iniquities of your fathers together, the one aggravating the other, shall be measured into their bosom.

Verses 8–10

This is expounded by St. Paul, Rom. xi. 1–5, where, when, upon occasion of the rejection of the Jews, it is asked, Hath God then cast away his people? he answers, No; for at this time there is a remnant according to the election of grace. This prophecy has reference to that distinguished remnant. Some of the Jews shall be brought to embrace the Christian faith, shall be added to the church, and so be saved. And our Saviour has told us that for the sake of these elect the days of the destruction of the Jews should be shortened, and a stop put to the desolation, Matt. xxiv. 22.

I. This is illustrated here by a comparison, v. 8. When a vine is so withered that there seems to be no sap nor life in it, and the dresser of the vineyard is inclined to cut it down, yet, if ever so little of the juice of the grape be found, though but in one cluster, a stander-by interposes, and says, Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it; there is life in the root. Sometimes God spares whole cities and nations for the sake of a few.

II. Those that shall make up this saving remnant. 1. They are such as serve God. It is for my servants' sake (v. 8), and they are my servants that shall dwell there, v. 9. God's faithful servants serve their generation. 2. They are such as seek God, make it the business of their lives to call upon him.

III. An account of the mercy God has in store for them. The remnant shall have a happy settlement again in their own land, as a seed out of Jacob; and these typify the remnant of Jacob that shall be incorporated into the gospel church by faith. They shall inherit my mountains, the holy mountains on which Jerusalem and the temple were built. They shall have a green pasture for their flocks, v. 10. Sharon and the valley of Achor shall again be well replenished with cattle. They shall recover possession of the whole land. Gospel-ordinances are the fields and valleys where the sheep of Christ shall go in and out and find pasture (John x. 9), and where they are made to lie down (Ps. xxiii. 2), as Israel's herds in the valley of Achor, Hos. ii. 15.

Verses 11–16

The different states of the godly and wicked, of the Jews that believed and of those that still persisted in unbelief.

I. The fearful doom of those that persisted in their idolatry after the deliverance out of Babylon, and in infidelity after the preaching of the gospel of Christ.

1. The doom is here threatened: "I will number you to the sword as sheep for the slaughter, and there shall be no escaping; you shall all bow down to it," v. 12.

2. The sins that number them to the sword. (1) Idolatry was the ancient sin (v. 11): "You are those who, instead of serving me as my people, forsake the Lord, and cast him off to embrace other gods, who forget my holy mountain to burn incense upon the mountains of your idols (v. 7), and have deserted the one only living and true God." They prepared a table for that troop of deities which the heathen worship and poured out drink-offerings to that numberless number of them; for those that thought one God too little never thought scores and hundreds sufficient. (2) Infidelity was the sin of the later Jews (v. 12): When I called, you did not answer, which refers to the same that v. 2 did, and that is applied to those who rejected the gospel. Our Lord Jesus himself called (he stood and cried, John vii. 37), but they would not answer. It is not strange that those who will not be persuaded to choose that which is good persist in their choice of that which is evil.

II. The aggravation of this doom, from the consideration of the happy state of those that were brought to repentance and faith. The blessedness of those that serve God, and the woeful condition of those that rebel against him, are here set the one over-against the other, that they may serve as a foil to each other, v. 13–16. It will add to the grief of those that perish to see the happiness of God's servants and especially to think that they might have shared in their bliss if it had not been their own fault. The difference of their states lies in two things.

1. In point of comfort and satisfaction. God's servants shall want nothing that is good for them. But those who set their hearts upon the world, shall be hungry and thirsty, always empty, always craving; for it is not bread; it surfeits, but it satisfies not. God's servants shall rejoice and sing for joy of heart. Heaven will be a world of everlasting joy to all that are now sowing in tears. But, on the other hand, those that forsake the Lord shut themselves out from all true joy, for they shall be ashamed of their vain confidence, and their own righteousness, and the hopes they had built thereon.

2. In point of honour and reputation, v. 15, 16. The memory of the just is, and shall be, blessed, but the name of the wicked shall rot. The name of the idolaters shall be for a curse to God's chosen, that is, for a warning to them. The name of God's chosen shall become a blessing: He shall call his servants by another name. The children of the covenant shall be called Christians; and to them, under that name, all the promises and privileges of the new covenant shall be secured. This other name shall not be confined to one nation, but with it men shall bless themselves in the earth, all the world over. God shall have servants out of all nations. They shall bless themselves in the God of truth. They shall give honour to God both in their prayers and in their solemn oaths. This is a part of the homage we owe to God; we must bless ourselves in him, that is, we have enough to make us happy, and can desire no more, if we have him for our God. Worldly people bless themselves in the abundance they have of this world's goods (Ps. xlix. 18; Luke xii. 19); but God's servants bless themselves in him, as a God all-sufficient for them. They shall give honour to him as the God of truth, the God of the Amen (so the word is); some understand it of Christ, in whom all the promises are yea and amen, 2 Cor. i. 20. They shall give him honour as the author of this blessed change, who has made them to forget their former troubles, the remembrance of them being swallowed up in their present comforts.

Verses 17–25

If these promises were in part fulfilled when the Jews, after their return out of captivity, were settled in peace in their own land and brought as it were into a new world, yet they were to have their full accomplishment in the gospel church. In the graces and comforts which believers have in and from Christ we are to look for this new heaven and new earth. It is in the gospel that old things have passed away and all things have become new, and by it that those who are in Christ are new creatures, 2 Cor. v. 17. It was a mighty and happy change that was described v. 16, that the former troubles were forgotten; but here it rises much higher: even the former world shall be forgotten and shall no more come into mind. When God is reconciled to us, which gives us a new heaven, the creatures too are reconciled to us, which gives us a new earth.

I. There shall be new joys. All the church's friends, and all that belong to her, shall rejoice (v. 18): You shall be glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create. I create Jerusalem a rejoicing and her people a joy. The church shall not only rejoice but be rejoiced in. The prosperity of the church shall be a rejoicing to God himself, who has pleasure in the prosperity of his servants (v. 19): I will rejoice in Jerusalem's joy, and will joy in my people; for in all their affliction he was afflicted. There shall be no allay of this joy: The voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her. The former occasions of grief shall not return. But in heaven it shall have a full accomplishment; there all tears shall be wiped away.

II. There shall be new life, v. 20. Untimely deaths by the sword or sickness shall be no more known as they have been, v. 19. Believers through Christ shall be satisfied with life, though it be ever so short on earth. Even the child shall be reckoned to die a hundred years old, for he shall rise again at full age, shall rise to eternal life. And, as for old men, it is promised that they shall fill their days with the fruits of righteousness, which they shall still bring forth in old age. An old man who is wise, and good, and useful, may truly be said to have filled his days. Old men who have their hearts upon the world have never filled their days. Unbelievers shall be unsatisfied and unhappy in life, though it be ever so long. The sinner, though he live to be a hundred years old, shall be accursed, and his long life is but a long reprieve. So that the matter is not great whether our lives on earth be long or short, but whether we live the lives of saints or the lives of sinners.

III. There shall be a new enjoyment of the comforts of life. Whereas before it was very uncertain and precarious, now it shall be otherwise; they shall build houses and inhabit them, shall plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them, v. 21, 22. Strangers shall not break in upon them, to expel them, as sometimes they have done: My elect shall wear out, or long enjoy, the work of their hands; it is honestly got, and it will wear well; it is the work of their hands, which they themselves have laboured for, and not the bread of idleness, or bread of deceit. If we live to enjoy it long, it is the gift of God's providence, for that is here promised: As the days of a tree are the days of my people; as the days of an oak (ch. vi. 13), whose substance is in it, though it cast its leaves; though it be stripped every winter, it lasts many years; as the days of the tree of life; so the LXX.

IV. There shall be a new generation rising up in their stead to inherit and enjoy these blessings (v. 23): They shall not labour in vain, for they shall not only enjoy the work of their hands themselves, but they shall leave it with satisfaction to those that shall come after them. God will make their children that rise up comforts to them; they shall have the joy of seeing them walk in the truth. He will make the times that come after comfortable to their children.

V. There shall be a good correspondence between them and their God (v. 24): Even before they call, I will answer. God will anticipate their prayers with the blessings of his goodness. The father of the prodigal met him in his return. God's readiness to hear prayer appears much more in the grace of the gospel than it did under the law.

VI. There shall be a good correspondence between them and their neighbours (v. 25): The wolf and the lamb shall feed together. God's people, though they are as sheep in the midst of wolves, shall be unhurt; for God will not so much break the power of their enemies as formerly, but he will turn their hearts, will alter their dispositions by his grace. When Paul, who had been a persecutor of the disciples (and who, being of the tribe of Benjamin, ravened as a wolf, Gen. xlix. 27) joined himself to them and became one of them, then the wolf and the lamb fed together. Men shall be changed: The lion shall no more be a beast of prey, but shall eat straw like the bullock, shall know his owner, and his master's crib, as the ox does. When those that lived by spoil and rapine to enrich themselves, right or wrong, are brought by the grace of God to live by honest labour—when those that stole steal no more, but work with their hands the thing that is good—then this is fulfilled, that the lion shall eat straw like the bullock. Satan shall be chained, the dragon bound; for dust shall be the serpent's meat again. That great enemy has glutted himself with the precious blood of saints, who by his instigation have been persecuted, and with the precious souls of sinners, who by his instigation have ruined themselves forever; but now he shall be confined to dust, according to the sentence, On thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat, Gen. iii. 14. Christ shall reign as Zion's King till all the enemies of his kingdom be made his footstool.

CHAP. LXVI

The first verse of this chapter is applied by Stephen to the dismantling of the temple by the planting of the Christian church (Acts vii. 49, 50), which may serve as a key to the whole chapter. I. The contempt God puts upon ceremonial services in comparison with moral duties, ver. 1–4. II. The salvation God will in due time work for his people out of the hands of their oppressors (ver. 5), speaking terror to the persecutors (ver. 6) and to the persecuted, a speedy and complete deliverance (ver. 7–9), a joyful settlement (ver. 10, 11), the accession of the Gentiles to them, ver. 12–14. III. The terrible vengeance which God will bring upon the enemies of his church and people, ver. 15–18. IV. The happy establishment of the church upon large and sure foundations, ver. 19–24. And we may well expect that this evangelical prophet, in the close of his prophecy, should look as far forward as to the latter days, to the last day, to the days of eternity.

Verses 1–4

I. The temple is slighted in comparison with a gracious soul, v. 1, 2. The prophets and Christ foretold the ruin of the temple, that God would leave it and then it would soon be desolate. After it was destroyed by the Chaldeans it soon recovered itself and the ceremonial services were revived with it; but by the Romans it was made a perpetual desolation, and the ceremonial law was abolished with it. Heaven is the throne of God's glory and government. The earth is his footstool, on which he stands, overruling all the affairs of it according to his will. If God has so bright a throne, so large a footstool, where then is the house they can build unto God, that can be the residence of his glory, or where is the place of his rest? What satisfaction can the Eternal Mind take in a house made with men's hands? If he required a house for himself to dwell in, he would have made one himself when he made the world; he had no need of a temple made with hands. He would not heed it as he would a humble, penitent, gracious heart. He has a heaven and earth of his own making, and a temple of man's making; but he overlooks them all, that he may look with favour to him that is poor in spirit, humble and serious, self-abasing and self-denying, whose heart is truly contrite for sin, penitent for it, and in pain to get it pardoned. Such a heart is a living temple for God; he dwells there, and it is the place of his rest; it is like heaven and earth, his throne and his footstool.

II. Sacrifices are slighted when they come from ungracious hands. The sacrifice of the wicked is not only unacceptable, but it is an abomination to the Lord (Prov. xv. 8); this is largely shown here, v. 3, 4. The carnal Jews, after their return out of captivity, grew very loose in the service of God; they brought the torn, and the lame, and the sick for sacrifice (Mal. i. 8, 13), and this made their services abominable to God. He that kills an ox for his own table is welcome to do it; but he that now kills it for God's altar, is as if he slew a man; he that does it does in effect set aside Christ's sacrifice. He that sacrifices a lamb, if it be a corrupt thing, and not the best he has, affronts God, instead of pleasing him; it is as if he cut off a dog's neck, a creature in the eye of the law so vile that, whereas an ass might be redeemed, the price of a dog was never to be brought into the treasury, Deut. xxiii. 18. He that offers an oblation, a meat-offering or drink-offering, is as if he thought to make atonement with swine's blood, a creature that must not be eaten nor touched, the broth of it was abominable (ch. lxv. 4), much more the blood of it. He that burns incense to God, and so puts contempt upon the incense of Christ's intercession, is as if he blessed an idol. Their wickedness made their sacrifices detestable. They had chosen their own ways, the ways of their own wicked hearts, and their souls delighted in their abominations. They were vicious and immoral, chose the way of sin rather than the way of God's commandments, and this made their sacrifices offensive to God, ch. i. 11–15. They turned a deaf ear to all the warnings of divine justice and all the offers of divine grace. They chose their own ways, therefore, says God, I also will choose their delusions. They have made their choice, and now I will make mine; they have taken what course they pleased with me, and I will take what course I please with them. They shall be deceived by those vain confidences with which they have deceived themselves. God will make their sin their punishment; they shall be hurried into ruin by their own delusions.

Verses 5–14

The prophet, having denounced God's judgments against a hypocritical nation, that made a jest of God's word, here turns his speech to those that trembled at his word, to comfort and encourage them; they shall not be involved in the judgments that are coming upon their unbelieving nation. The word of God has comforts in store for those that by true humiliation for sin are prepared to receive them. There were those (v. 4) who, when God spoke, would not hear; but, if the heart tremble at the word, the ear will be open to it.

I. God will plead their just but injured cause against their persecutors (v. 5): Your brethren that hated you said, Let the Lord be glorified. But he shall appear to your joy. The apostles were Jews by birth, and yet even in the cities of the Gentiles the Jews they met were their most bitter and implacable enemies and stirred up the Gentiles against them. Their brethren, who should have loved them and encouraged them for their work's sake hated them, and cast them out of their synagogues. Our Saviour explains this, and seems to have reference to it, John xvi. 2. They shall put you out of their synagogues, and whosoever kills you will think that he does God service. They were encouraged under these persecutions: "Let your faith and patience hold out yet a little while; your enemies hate you and oppress you, your brethren hate you and cast you out, but your Father in heaven loves you, and will appear for you when no one else will or dare." This was fulfilled when, upon the signals given of Jerusalem's approaching ruin, the Jews' hearts failed them for fear; but the disciples of Christ, whom they had hated and persecuted, lifted up their heads with joy, knowing that their redemption drew nigh, Luke xxi. 26, 28.

II. God's appearances for them will be such as will make a great noise in the world (v. 6): There shall be a voice of noise from the city, from the temple. Some make it the joyful and triumphant voice of the church's friends, others the lamenting voice of her enemies, fleeing in vain to the temple for shelter. These voices do but echo to the voice of the Lord, who is now rendering a recompence to his enemies. A confused noise was in the city and temple when Jerusalem, after a long siege, was at last taken by the Romans. Some think this prophecy was fulfilled in the prodigies that went before that destruction of Jerusalem, related by Josephus in his History of the Wars of the Jews (lib. 7. cap. 31), that the temple-doors flew open suddenly of their own accord, and the priests heard a noise of motion or shifting in the most holy place, and presently a voice, saying, Let us depart hence. And, some time after, one Jesus Bar-Annas went up and down the city, at the feast of tabernacles, continually crying, A voice from the east, a voice from the west, a voice from the four winds, a voice against Jerusalem and the temple, a voice against all this people.

III. God will set up a church for himself in the world (v. 7): Before she travailed she brought forth. This is to be applied to the deliverance of the Jews out of their captivity in Babylon, which was brought about very easily and silently, without any pain or struggle. The man-child of the deliverance is rejoiced in, and yet the mother was never in labour for it; before her pain came she was delivered. This altogether without precedent, unless in the story which the Egyptian midwives told of the Hebrew women (Exod. i. 19), that they were lively and were delivered ere the midwives came in unto them. But shall the earth be made to bring forth her fruits in one day? No, it is the work of some weeks in the spring to renew the face of the earth. Shall a land be brought forth in one day, or shall a nation be born at once? God does nothing abruptly. Yet, in this case, as soon as Zion travailed she brought forth. Cyrus's proclamation was no sooner issued than the captives were ready to make the best of their way to their own land. And the reason is given (v. 9), because it is the Lord's doing. If he bring to the birth in preparing his people for deliverance, he will cause to bring forth in the accomplishment of the deliverance. When everything is ready, shall not I then give strength to bring forth. Does God cause mankind, and all the species of living creatures, to propagate, and replenish the earth, and will he restrain Zion? Will he not make her fruitful in a blessed offspring to replenish the church? But this was a figure of the setting up of the Christian church in the world, and the replenishing of that family with children to be named from Jesus Christ. When the Spirit was poured out, multitudes were converted in a little time and with little pains. The success of the gospel was astonishing. The same day that the Spirit was poured out there were 3,000 souls added to the church, so mightily grew the word of God and prevailed.

IV. Their present sorrows shall shortly be turned into abundant joys, v. 10, 11. The church's friends are such as love her, and mourn with her and for her. Those that have a sincere affection for the church have a cordial sympathy with her. They are encouraged: Rejoice with her, and again and again I say, Rejoice. Jerusalem shall have cause to rejoice; the days of her mourning shall be at an end. "You that mourned for her in her sorrows cannot but from the same principle rejoice with her in her joys." We must suck and be satisfied with the breasts of her consolations. The word of God, the covenant of grace (especially the promises of that covenant), the ordinances of God, and all the opportunities of conversing with him, are the breasts, which the church calls and counts the breasts of her consolations. We must take pleasure in our relation to God and communion with him. Whatever is the glory of the church must be our glory and joy, particularly her purity, unity, and increase.

V. He who gives them this call to rejoice will give them cause to do so and hearts to do so, v. 12–14. I will extend peace to her (that is, all good to her) like a river that runs in a constant stream. The gospel brings with it, wherever it is received in its power, such peace as this, which shall go on like a river, supplying souls with all good and making them fruitful, as a river does the lands it passes through. The glory of the Gentiles shall come to them like a flowing stream. God shall be glorified in all, and that ought to be more the matter of our joy than anything else (v. 14): The hand of the Lord shall be known towards his servants, he will at the same time make known his indignation towards his enemies. God's mercy and justice shall both be manifested. God will not only give them cause to rejoice, but will speak comfort to their hearts. Their country shall be their tender nurse: You shall be carried on her sides, under her arms, as little children are, and shall be dandled upon her knees. The great Shepherd gathers the lambs in his arms and carries them in his bosom, and so must the under-shepherds, that they may not be discouraged. God will himself be their powerful comforter: As one whom his mother comforts, when he is sick or in sorrow, so will I comfort you; not only with the rational arguments which a prudent father uses, but with the tender affections and compassions of a loving mother. They shall feel the blessed effects of this comfort in their own souls (v. 13). This was fulfilled in the wonderful satisfaction which Christ's disciples had in the success of their ministry. Christ tells them (John xvi. 22), Your heart shall rejoice and your joy no man taketh from you. Then your bones, that were dried and withered, shall recover a youthful strength and vigour and shall flourish like a herb.

Verses 15–24

These verses have a dark side towards the enemies of God's kingdom, and a bright side towards his faithful loyal subjects. Probably they refer to the Jews in captivity in Babylon, of whom some hated to be reformed, and therefore should be ruined by the calamity (Jer. xxiv. 9); others were sent thither for their good, and should in due time get well through it. But doubtless the prophecy looks further, to the judgment for which Christ did come once, and will come again.

I. Christ will appear to the confusion of all those that stand out against him. Sometimes he will appear in temporal judgments. The Jews that persisted in infidelity were cut off by fire and by his sword. The Lord then pleaded with all flesh; and, it being his sword with which they are cut off, they are called his slain. Idolaters will especially be contended with in the day of wrath, v. 17. Perhaps some of those who returned out of Babylon had their idols in their gardens, and there purified themselves when they went about their idolatrous rites, one after another, or, as we read it, behind one tree in the midst, behind Ahad or Ehad, some idol in honour of which they ate swine's flesh, and other abominations, as the mouse, or some other like animal. But the prophecy may refer to all those judgments which God will bring upon sinners, who are devoted to the world and the flesh: They shall be consumed together. God knows both what men do and with what design they do it.

II. He will appear to the comfort and joy of all that are faithful to him in the setting up of the kingdom of grace, the first-fruits of the kingdom of glory. The time shall come that he will gather all nations and tongues to himself, that they may come and see his glory as it shines in the face of Jesus Christ, v. 18. This was fulfilled when all nations were to be discipled and the gift of tongues was bestowed in order thereunto. The church had hitherto been confined to one nation and in one tongue only God was worshipped.

1. Some of the Jewish nation should, by the grace of God, be distinguished from the rest, and marked for salvation: I will not only set up a gathering ensign among them, but there shall be those among them on whom I will set a differencing sign. Though they are a corrupt degenerate nation, yet God will set apart a remnant of them, that shall be devoted to him, and a mark shall be set upon them, with such certainty will God own them, Ezek. ix. 4. Christ's sheep are marked.

2. Those who are themselves distinguished thus shall be commissioned to be sent to the nations to carry the gospel among them, and preach it to every creature. They shall be sent to the nations, several of which are here named, Tarshish and Pul, and Lud, &c. It is uncertain what countries are here intended. Tarshish signifies in general the sea, yet some take it for Tarsus in Cilicia. Pul is the name of one of the kings of Assyria; perhaps some part of that country might likewise bear that name. Lud is supposed to be Lydia, a warlike nation, famed for archers, Jer. xlvi. 9. Tubal, some think, is Italy or Spain; and Javan Greece, the Iones; and the isles of the Gentiles, peopled by the posterity of Japhet (Gen. x. 5), probably are the isles afar off. In Judah only was God known, and other countries sat in darkness, heard not the joyful sound, saw not the joyful light. It is a pity that any of the children of men should be at such a distance from their Maker as not to hear his name and see his glory. Those that are sent to the nations shall go upon God's errand, to declare his glory among the Gentiles. The Jews that shall be dispersed among the nations shall declare the glory of God's providence concerning their nation all along. Some out of the nations shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, entreating him to take notice of them, "for we will go with you, having heard that God is with you," Zech. viii. 23.

3. Many converts shall hereby be made, v. 20. They shall bring all your brethren (for proselytes ought to be owned and embraced as brethren) for an offering unto the Lord. Some shall come upon horses, because they came from far. Some shall come in chariots, and the aged, and sickly, and little children, shall be brought in litters or covered waggons, and the young men on mules and swift beasts. They shall spare no trouble nor charge to get to Jerusalem. They shall come, not as formerly they used to come to Jerusalem, to be offerers, but to be themselves an offering unto the Lord, which must be understood spiritually, or their being presented to God as living sacrifices, Rom. xii. 1. They shall be brought as the children of Israel bring an offering in a clean vessel, with great care that they be holy, purified from sin, and sanctified to God. It is said of the converted Gentiles (Acts xv. 9) that their hearts were purified by faith. The apostle says of all true Christians that they have come to Mount Zion, and the heavenly Jerusalem (Heb. xii. 22), which explains this passage, and shows that the meaning of all this parade is only that they shall be brought into the church by the grace of God, as carefully as if they were carried in chariots and litters.

4. A gospel ministry shall be set up in the church (v. 21): I will take of them (the Gentile converts) for priests and for Levites, to minister in holy things. Hitherto the priests and Levites were all taken from among the Jews and all of one tribe; but in gospel times God will take of the converted Gentiles to minister, to teach the people, to be the stewards of the mysteries of God as the priests and Levites were under the law, to be pastors and teachers (or bishops), to give themselves to the word and prayer, and deacons to serve tables, and, as the Levites, to take care of the outward business of the house of God, Phil. i. 1; Acts vi. 2–4. The apostles were all Jews, and so were the seventy disciples; the great apostle of the Gentiles was himself a Hebrew of the Hebrews; but, when churches were planted among the Gentiles, they had ministers who were of themselves, elders in every church (Acts xiv. 23, Tit. i. 5). God says, I will take of them, some of them. It is God's work originally to choose ministers by qualifying them and inclining them to the service, as well as by giving them their commission.

5. The church and ministry, being thus settled, shall be kept up in a succession from one generation to another, v. 22. The kingdom of the Messiah shall be a new world, ch. lxv. 17. Old things have passed away, behold all things have become new (2 Cor. v. 17), the old covenant of peculiarity is set aside, and a new covenant, a covenant of grace, established, Heb. viii. 13. New commandments are given relating both to heaven and earth, and new promises relating to both, and both together make a New Testament. It will be an abiding change, a new world that will be always new. The gospel dispensation is to continue to the end of time. It will be maintained in a seed that shall serve Christ: Your seed, and in them your name, shall remain; as one generation passes away, another shall come. The gates of hell, though they fight against the church, shall not prevail, nor wear out the saints of the Most High.

6. The public worship of God in religious assemblies shall be attended by all that are thus brought as an offering to the Lord, v. 23. This is described in expressions suited to the Old Testament dispensation, to show that though the ceremonial law should be abolished, and the temple service should come to an end, yet God should be still as regularly worshipped as ever. Heretofore only Jews went up to appear before God, and they were bound to attend only three times a year, and the males only; but now all flesh, Gentiles as well as Jews, women as well as men, shall come and worship before God, in his presence, though not in his temple at Jerusalem, but in assemblies dispersed all the world over, which shall be to them as the tabernacle of meeting was to the Jews. God will in them record his name, and, though but two or three come together, he will be among them, and bless them. There is no necessity of one certain place, as the temple was of old. Christ is our temple, in whom by faith all believers meet. But it is fit that there should be a certain time appointed, that the service may be done frequently, and a token thereby given of the spiritual communion which all Christian assemblies have with each other by faith, hope, and holy love. Where the Lord's day is weekly sanctified, and the Lord's supper monthly celebrated, and both duly attended, there the Christian new moons and sabbaths are observed.

7. Their thankful sense of God's distinguishing favour to them should be increased by the consideration of the destruction of those that persist in their impiety, v. 24. The wicked are men that have transgressed against God, not only broken his laws, but broken covenant with him. It may be meant especially of the unbelieving Jews that rejected the gospel of Christ. Their misery is represented by the spectacle of a field of battle, covered with the carcases of the slain, so that they are an abhorring to all flesh, nobody cares to come near them. Now this is accomplished in the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation by the Romans. It may refer likewise to the spiritual judgments that came upon the unbelieving Jews, which St. Paul looks upon, and shows us, Rom. xi. 8, &c. It will illustrate the joys and glories of the blessed to see that they were themselves as brands plucked out of that burning.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE BOOK OF THE PROPHET JEREMIAH

Concerning this prophet Jeremiah we may observe, I. That he began young, and therefore could say, from his own experience, that it is good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth, the yoke both of service and of affliction, Lam. iii. 27. Jerome observes that Isaiah, who had more years, had his tongue touched with a coal of fire, to purge away his iniquity (ch. vi. 7), but that when God touched Jeremiah's mouth, nothing was said of the purging of his iniquity (ch. i. 9), because of his tender years. II. That he continued long a prophet, some reckon fifty years, others above forty. He began in the thirteenth year of Josiah, that good king, but he continued through all the wicked reigns that followed. III. That he was a reproving prophet, sent in God's name to tell Jacob of their sins and to warn them of the judgments of God; and the critics observe that therefore his style is more plain and rough, and less polite, than that of Isaiah and some others of the prophets. Plain-dealing is best when we are dealing with sinners to bring them to repentance. IV. That he was a weeping prophet; so he is commonly called, not only because he penned the Lamentations, but because he was all along a mournful spectator of the sins of his people. V. That he was a suffering prophet. He was persecuted by his own people more than any of them, as we shall find in the story of this book; for he lived and preached just before the Jews' destruction by the Chaldeans, when their character seems to have been the same as it was just before their destruction by the Romans, when they killed the Lord Jesus, and persecuted his disciples, pleased not God, and were contrary to all men, for wrath had come upon them to the uttermost, 1 Thess. ii. 15, 16. The last account we have of him is that the remaining Jews forced him to go down with them into Egypt; whereas the current tradition is, among Jews and Christians, that he suffered martyrdom. Hottinger, out of Elmakin, an Arabic historian, relates that, continuing to prophesy in Egypt against the Egyptians and other nations, he was stoned to death; and that long after, when Alexander entered Egypt, he took up the bones of Jeremiah where they were buried in obscurity, and carried them to Alexandria, and buried them there. The prophecies of this book which we have in the first nineteen chapters seem to be the heads of the sermons he preached in a way of general reproof for sin; afterwards they are more particular, mixed with the history of his day, but not placed in due order of time. With the threatenings are intermixed many gracious promises of mercy to the penitent, of the deliverance of the Jews out of their captivity, and some that have a plain reference to the kingdom of the Messiah. Among the Aprocryphal writings an epistle is extant said to be written by Jeremiah to the captives in Babylon, warning them against the worship of idols, by exposing the vanity of idols and the folly of idolaters. It is in Baruch, ch. vi. But it is supposed not to be authentic; nor has it, I think, anything like the life and spirit of Jeremiah's writings. It is also related concerning Jeremiah (2 Mac. ii. 4) that, when Jerusalem was destroyed by the Chaldeans, he, by direction from God, took the ark and the altar of incense, and, carrying them to Mount Nebo lodged them in a hollow cave there and stopped the door; but some that followed him, and thought that they had marked the place, could not find it. He blamed them for seeking it, telling them that the place should be unknown till the time that God should gather his people together again.

CHAP. I

I. The general title of this book, with the time of Jeremiah's public ministry, ver. 1–3. II. The call of Jeremiah to the prophetic office, his modest objection against it answered, and an ample commission given him, ver. 4–10. III. The visions of an almond-rod and a seething-pot, signifying the approaching ruin of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, ver. 11–16. IV. Encouragement given to the prophet to go on undauntedly in his work, ver. 17–19.

Verses 1–3

The genealogy of this prophet and the chronology of this prophecy. He was the son of Hilkiah, one of the priests that were in Anathoth. Jeremiah signifies one raised up by the Lord. He was of the priests, and, as a priest, was authorized and appointed to teach the people; but to that appointment God added the extraordinary commission of a prophet. Ezekiel also was a priest. Thus God would support the honour of the priesthood at a time when, by their sins and God's judgments upon them, it was sadly eclipsed. He was of the priests in Anathoth, a city of priests, which lay about three miles from Jerusalem. Abiathar had his country house there, 1 Kings ii. 26. He began to prophesy in the thirteenth year of Josiah's reign, v. 2. Josiah, in the twelfth year of his reign, began a work of reformation, applied himself with all sincerity to purge Judah and Jerusalem from the high places, and the groves, and the images, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 3. And very seasonably was this young prophet raised up to assist the young king in that good work. Now, one would have expected when these two joined forces, such a prince, and such a prophet (as in a like case, Ezra v. 1, 2), and both young, such a complete reformation would be brought about as would prevent the ruin of the church and state; but it proved quite otherwise. In the eighteenth year of Josiah there were a great many of the relics of idolatry that were not purged out; for what can the best princes and prophets do to prevent the ruin of a people that hate to be reformed? And therefore Jeremiah continued to foretell the judgments that were coming upon them. Josiah and Jeremiah would have healed them. but they would not be healed. He continued to prophesy through the reigns of Jehoiakim and Zedekiah, each of whom reigned eleven years. He prophesied to the carrying away of Jerusalem captive (v. 3). He continued to prophesy after that, ch. xl. 1. From the thirteenth of Josiah to the captivity was just forty years. God, in this prophet, suffered their manners, their ill manners, forty years, and at length swore in his wrath that they should not continue in his rest.

Verses 4–10

I. Jeremiah's early designation to the office of a prophet (v. 4, 5): The word of the Lord came to him, and God told him, 1. That he had ordained him a prophet to the nations, the nation of the Jews in the first place, but to the neighbouring nations, to whom he was to send yokes (ch. xxvii. 2, 3) and whom he must make to drink of the cup of the Lord's anger, ch. xxv. 17. He is still, in his writings, a prophet to the nations (to our nation among the rest), to tell them what the national judgments are which may be expected for national sins. 2. That even in his eternal counsel, he had designed him to be so. This commission was given him in pursuance of the purpose God had purposed in himself concerning him, before he was born: "I knew thee, and I sanctified thee," that is, "I determined that thou shouldst be a prophet and set thee apart for the office." What God has designed men for he will call them to. Original endowment, not education, makes a prophet.

II. His modestly declining this honourable employment, v. 6. "Ah, Lord God! behold, I cannot speak to great men and multitudes, as prophets must; I cannot speak fluently; I cannot speak with any authority, for I am a child and my youth will be despised." It becomes us, when we have any service to do for God, to be afraid lest we mismanage it, and lest it suffer through our weakness.

III. The assurance God graciously gave him that he would stand by him and carry him on in his work.

1. He is a child; he shall be a prophet for all that (v. 7): "Thou hast God's precept, and let not thy being young hinder thee from obeying it. Go to all to whom I shall send thee and speak whatsoever I command thee." God was angry with Moses even for his modest excuses, Exod. iv. 14. Samuel delivered a message from God to Eli, when he was a little child. God can, when he pleases, make children prophets, and ordain strength out of the mouth of babes and sucklings.

2. Let him not object that he shall meet with much opposition; God will be his protector (v. 8): "Be not afraid of their faces; though they look big, and so think to outface thee. Thou speakest in the name of the King of kings, and by authority from him, and with that thou mayest face them down." Those that have messages to deliver from God must not be afraid of the face of man, Ezek. iii. 9.

3. God will enable him to speak as one that had acquaintance with God, v. 9. He having now a vision of the divine glory, the Lord put forth his hand, touched his mouth, and with that touch opened his lips. God not only put knowledge into his head, but words into his mouth; for there are words which the Holy Ghost teaches, 1 Cor. ii. 13. He must speak as one that had authority from God, v. 10. See, I have this day set thee over the nations and over the kingdoms. This sounds very great, and yet Jeremiah is a poor priest still; he is not set over the kingdoms as a prince to rule them by the sword, but as a prophet by the power of the word of God. Jeremiah was set over the nations, not to demand tribute from them, but to root out, and pull down, and yet withal to build and plant. He must attempt to reform the nations, to root out, and destroy idolatry and other wickednesses among them, vicious habits and customs which had long taken root, to throw down the kingdom of sin, that religion and virtue might be planted and built among them. He must set before them life and death, good and evil, ch. xviii. 7–10. He must assure those who persisted in their wickedness that they should be rooted out and destroyed, and those who repented that they should be built and planted.

Verses 11–19

I. God gives Jeremiah, in vision, a view of the principal errand he was to go upon, which was to foretell the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, for their sins, especially their idolatry.

1. He intimates to him that the people were ripening apace for ruin and that ruin was hastening apace towards him. He asks him, "Jeremiah, what seest thou? Look about thee, and observe now." "I see a rod, denoting affliction and chastisement, a correcting rod hanging over us; and it is a rod of an almond-tree, which is one of the forwardest trees in the spring, is in the bud and blossom quickly, when other trees are scarcely broken out." (In Hebrew it is called a hasty tree.) God explained it in the next words (v. 12): Thou hast well seen. God commended him that he was so observant as to be aware, though it was the first vision he ever saw, that it was a rod of an almond-tree. "Thou hast seen a hasty tree, which signifies that I will hasten my word to perform it." Jeremiah shall prophesy that which he himself shall live to see accomplished.

2. He intimates to him whence the intended ruin should arise. Jeremiah is a second time asked: What seest thou? and he sees a seething-pot upon the fire (v. 13), representing Jerusalem and Judah in great commotion, like boiling water, by reason of the descent which the Chaldean army made upon them; as boiling water evaporating and growing less and less. Now the face of the furnace over which this pot boiled, was towards the north, for thence the fire and the fuel were to come that must make the pot boil thus. So the vision is explained (v. 14). It had been long designed by the justice of God, and long deserved by the sin of the people, and yet hitherto the divine patience had restrained it, the enemies had intended it, and God had checked them; but now all restraints shall be taken off, and the evil shall break forth. Look for this storm to arise out of the north, whence fair weather usually comes, Job. xxxvii. 22. Sometimes the fiercest tempests come whence we expected fair weather. This is further explained v. 15, I will call all the families of the kingdoms of the north, saith the Lord. All the northern crowns shall unite under Nebuchadnezzar, and join with him in this expedition. God's summons shall be obeyed; those whom he calls shall come. The commanders of the troops of the several nations shall take their post in carrying on the siege of Jerusalem and the other cities of Judah.

3. He tells him plainly what was the cause of all these judgments; it was the sin of Jerusalem and of the cities of Judah (v. 16): I will pass sentence upon them (so it may be read) because of all their wickedness. They have forsaken God and have burnt incense to other gods, new gods, strange gods, and all false gods. Jeremiah was young, and perhaps did not know what abominable idolatries the children of his people were guilty of; but God tells him that he might himself be satisfied in the equity of the sentence which in God's name he was to pass upon them.

II. God encourages Jeremiah. A great trust is committed to him. He is sent as a herald at arms; for God is pleased to give warning of his judgments beforehand, that sinners may be awakened to meet him by repentance, and so turn away his wrath. With this trust Jeremiah has a charge given him (v. 17). He must be quick: Arise, and lose no time. He must be busy: Arise, and speak unto them in season, out of season. He must be bold: Be not dismayed at their faces, as before, v. 8.

1. In two things he must be faithful: (1) He must speak all that he is charged with: Speak all that I command thee. He must conceal nothing for fear of offending; he must declare the whole counsel of God. (2) He must not whisper it in a corner to a few particular friends, but he must appear against the kings of Judah, if they be wicked kings. He must not spare the priests thereof; though he himself was a priest, and was concerned to maintain the dignity of his order. He must appear against the people of the land, though they were his own people, as far as they were against the Lord.

2. Two reasons are here given why he should do thus: (1) Because he had reason to fear the wrath of God if he should be false: "Be not dismayed at their faces, so as to desert thy office, or shrink from the duty of it, lest I confound and dismay thee before them." The fear of God is the best antidote against the fear of man. It is better to have all the men in the world our enemies than God our enemy. (2) Because he had no reason to fear the wrath of men if he were faithful, v. 18. This young stripling of a prophet is made by the power of God as an impregnable city, fortified with iron pillars and surrounded with walls of brass; he sallies out upon the enemy in reproofs and threatenings, and keeps them in awe. They set upon him on every side; the kings and princes batter him with their power, the priests thunder against him with their church-censures, and the people of the land shoot their arrows at him, even slanderous and bitter words; but he shall keep his ground and shall still be a curb upon them (v. 19): They shall fight against thee, but they shall not prevail to destroy thee, for I am with thee to deliver thee.

CHAP. II

It is probable that this chapter was Jeremiah's first sermon after his ordination; and a most likely pathetic sermon. Let him not say, "I cannot speak, for I am a child"; for, God having touched his mouth and put his words into it, none can speak better. The scope of the chapter is to show God's people their transgressions, by way of reproof and conviction, that they might be brought to repent. The sin which they are most particularly charged with is idolatry. They are told, I. That this was ungrateful to God, ver. 1–8. II. That it was without precedent, that a nation should change their god, ver. 9–13. III. That hereby they had ruined themselves, ver. 14–19. IV. That they had broken their covenants and degenerated from their good beginnings, ver. 20, 21. V. That their wickedness was too bad to be excused, ver. 22, 23, 35. VI. That they persisted wilfully and obstinately in it, ver. 23, 25, 33, 36. VII. That they shamed themselves by their idolatry and should shortly be made ashamed of it when they should find their idols unable to help them, ver. 26–29, 37. VIII. That they had not been convinced and reformed by the rebukes of Providence, ver. 30. IX. That they had put a great contempt upon God, ver. 31, 32. X. That with their idolatries they had mixed the most unnatural murders, shedding the blood of the poor innocents, ver. 34.

Verses 1–8

I. A command given to Jeremiah to carry a message from God to the inhabitants of Jerusalem. Let a minister carefully compare what he has to deliver with the word of God, and see that it agrees with it, that he may be able to say, not only, The Lord sent me, but, He sent me to speak this. He must go from Anathoth, where he lived in a pleasant retirement, and in the study of the law, and make his appearance at Jerusalem, that noisy city, and cry in their ears: "Cry aloud, that all may hear. Go close to them, and cry in the ears of those that have stopped their ears."

II. The message he was commanded to deliver. He must upbraid them with their horrid ingratitude in forsaking a God who had been of old so kind to them.

1. God here puts them in mind of the favours he had of old bestowed upon them, when they were first formed into a people (v. 2): "I remember for thy sake, and I would have thee to remember it, and improve the remembrance of it for thy good; I cannot forget the kindness of thy youth and the love of thy espousals." This may be understood of the kindness they had for God; it was not such indeed as they had any reason to boast of, yet God is pleased to mention it, for, though it was but little love that they showed him, he took it kindly. When they believed the Lord and his servant Moses, when they sang God's praise at the Red Sea, when at the foot of Mount Sinai they promised, All that the Lord shall say unto us we will do and will be obedient, then was the kindness of their youth and the love of their espousals. When they seemed so forward for God he said, Surely they are my people, and will be faithful to me, children that will not lie. In two things appeared the kindness of their youth: (1) That they followed the direction of the pillar of cloud and fire in the wilderness; and for forty years went after God in the wilderness, and trusted him to provide for them, though it was a land that was not sown. This God took kindly. Thus, though Christ often chid his disciples, yet he commended them, at parting, for continuing with him, Luke xxii. 28. (2) That they set up the tabernacle among them. Israel was then holiness to the Lord. Thus they began in the spirit, and God puts them in mind of it, that they might be ashamed of ending in the flesh.

Or it may be understood of God's kindness to them; of that he afterwards speaks largely. When Israel was a child, then I loved him, Hos. xi. 1. [1] God appropriated them to himself. They were the first fruits of his increase, the first constituted church he had in the world; but the full harvest was to be gathered from among the Gentiles. [2] Having espoused them, he espoused their cause, and became an enemy to their enemies, Exod. xxiii. 22. Whoever offered any injury to the people of God did so at their peril. He had in a special manner a controversy with those that attempted to debauch them and draw them off from being holiness to the Lord; witness his quarrel with the Midianites about the matter of Peor, Num. xxv. 17, 18. [3] He brought them out of Egypt with a high hand and great terror (Deut. iv. 34), and yet with a kind hand and great tenderness led them through a vast howling wilderness (v. 6). In that darksome valley they walked forty years; but God was with them; and even there God prepared a table for them (Ps. xxiii. 4, 5), gave them bread out of the clouds and drink out of the rocks. All God's spiritual Israel must own their obligations to him for a safe conduct through the wilderness of this world, no less dangerous to the soul than that was to the body. [4] At length he settled them in Canaan (v. 7): I brought you into a plentiful country. They did eat the fruit thereof and the goodness thereof. I brought you into a land of Carmel (so the word is); Carmel was a place of extraordinary fruitfulness, and Canaan was as one great fruitful field, Deut. viii. 7. [5] God gave them the means of knowledge and grace, and communion with him; this is implied, v. 8.

2. He upbraids them with their ingratitude (v. 4). (1) He challenges them to produce any instance of his being unjust and unkind to them. He puts it fairly to them to show cause for their deserting him (v. 5): "What iniquity have your fathers found in me, or you either? Have you found God a hard master? You that have forsaken the ordinances of God, can you say that it was because they were a wearisome service. The disappointments you have met with were owing to yourselves, not to God. The yoke of his commandments is easy, and in the keeping of them there is great reward." Though he afflicts us, he does us no wrong; all the iniquity is in our ways. (2) He charges them with being unjust and unkind to him notwithstanding. "They have gone from me, nay, they have gone far from me." They have walked after vanity, that is, idolatry. They had with idolatry introduced all manner of wickedness. When they entered into the good land which God gave them they defiled it (v. 7), by defiling themselves. It was God's land, a holy land, Immanuel's land; but they made it an abomination. Having forsaken God they had no thoughts of returning to him again. Neither the people nor the priests made any enquiry after him, nor expressed any desire to recover his favour. The people said not, Where is the Lord? (v. 6). The priests said not, Where is the Lord? (v. 8). Those who should have instructed the people in the knowledge of God took no care to get the knowledge of him themselves. The scribes, who handled the law, did not know God nor his will. The pastors, who should have kept the flock from transgressing, were themselves ring-leaders in transgression: They have transgressed against me. The pretenders to prophecy prophesied by Baal, to confront the Lord's prophets.

Verses 9–13

The prophet shows their unparalleled fickleness and folly (v. 9): I will yet plead with you. Before God punishes sinners he pleads with them, to bring them to repentance. Now he pleads with those who persisted in that vain conversation received by tradition from their fathers, and with their children's children, that is, with all that in every age tread in their steps.

I. He shows that they acted contrary to the usage of all nations. Their neighbours were more firm and faithful to their false gods than they were to the true God. Let them survey the present state of the isles of Chittim, Greece, and the European islands, the countries that were more polite and learned, and of Kedar; and they should not find an instance of a nation that had changed their gods. Such a veneration had they for their gods, that though they were gods of wood and stone they would not change them for gods of silver and gold, no, not for the living and true God. We praise them not. But it may well be urged, to the reproach of Israel, that they, who were the only people that had no cause to change their God, were yet the only people that had changed him. The zeal and constancy of idolaters should shame Christians out of their coldness and inconstancy.

II. He shows that they acted contrary to the dictates of common sense, but changed for the worse, and made a bad bargain for themselves. 1. They parted from a God who made them truly glorious, for his glory had often appeared on their tabernacle. 2. They closed with gods that could do them no good, gods that do not profit their worshippers. Heaven itself is here called upon to stand amazed at the sin and folly of these apostates from God (v. 12, 13): Be astonished, O you heavens! at this. The meaning is that the conduct of this people towards God was, (1) Such as we may well wonder at, that ever men, who pretend to reason, should do a thing so very absurd. (2) Such as we ought to have a holy indignation at as impious, and a high affront to our Maker. "My people, whom I have taught, have committed two great evils, ingratitude and folly; they have acted contrary both to their duty and to their interest. They have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters, in whom they have an abundant and constant supply." God is their fountain of life, Ps. xxxvi. 9. There is in him an all-sufficiency of grace and strength; all our springs are in him. He has been to us a fountain of living-waters, over-flowing, ever-flowing, in the gifts of his favour. They have cheated themselves. They forsook their own mercies for lying vanities. They took a great deal of pains to hew themselves out cisterns, but they proved broken cisterns, so that they could hold no water. When they came to quench their thirst there they found nothing but mud and mire, and the filthy sediments of a standing lake. Such idols were to their worshippers. If we make an idol of any creature—wealth, or pleasure, or honour—if we make it our joy and love, we shall find it a cistern, which we take a great deal of pains to hew out and fill, and at the best it will hold but a little water, and that dead and flat. It is a broken cistern, that cracks in hot weather, so that the water is lost when we have most need of it, Job vi. 15. Let us therefore cleave to the Lord, he has the words of eternal life.

Verses 14–19

The folly of forsaking God had already cost them dear, for to this were owing all the calamities their country was now groaning under.

I. Their neighbours, who were their professed enemies, prevailed against them. 1. They were enslaved and lost their liberty (v. 14): Is Israel a servant? No; Israel is my son, my first-born, Exod. iv. 22. They are children; they are heirs, the seed of Abraham. They were designed for dominion, not for servitude. Why then is he spoiled of his liberty? Why is he used as a servant, as a home-born slave? Why does he make himself a slave to his lusts, to his idols, to that which does not profit? v. 11. What a thing is this, that such a birthright should be sold for a mess of pottage, such a crown profaned and laid in the dust! The princes made slaves of their subjects, and masters made slaves of their servants (ch. xxxiv. 11), and so made their country mean and miserable, which God had made happy and honourable. The neighbouring princes and powers broke in upon them, and made some of them slaves even in their own country, and perhaps sold others for slaves into foreign countries. For their iniquities they sold themselves, Isa. l. 1. We may apply this spiritually. Is the soul of man a servant? Is it a home-born slave? No, it is not. Why then is it spoiled? It is because it has sold its own liberty and enslaved itself to divers lusts and passions. 2. They were impoverished and had lost their wealth. God brought them into a plentiful country (v. 7), but all their neighbours made a prey of it (v. 15): Young lions roar aloud over him and yell. Sometimes one potent enemy, and sometimes another, and sometimes many in confederacy, fall upon him, and triumph over him. They carry off the fruits of his land, and make that waste, and burn his cities. 3. They were abused, and insulted over, and beaten by everybody (v. 16): "Even the children of Noph and Tahapanes, despicable people, not famed for military courage nor strength, have broken the crown of thy head." How calamitous the condition of Judah had been of late in the reign of Manasseh we find, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11. 4. All this was owing to their sin (v. 17): Hast thou not procured this unto thyself? By their sinful confederacies with the nations, and conformity to them in their idolatrous customs, they had made themselves contemptible. "Thou hast forsaken thy God at the time that he was leading thee by the way" (so it should be read).

II. Their neighbours, their pretended friends, helped them not, and this also was owing to their sin. 1. They did in vain seek to Egypt and Assyria for help (v. 18): "What hast thou to do in the way of Egypt? Thou art for drinking the waters of Sihor," that is, Nilus. "Thou reliest upon the fair promises they make thee. At other times thou art in the way of Assyria, going with all speed to fetch recruits thence, and thinkest to satisfy thyself with the waters of the river Euphrates; what hast thou to do there? What wilt thou get by applying to them? They shall help in vain, and what thou thoughtest a river will be but a broken cistern." 2. This also was because of their sin, v. 19. "Thy own wickedness shall correct thee, and then it is impossible for them to save thee; know and see that it is an evil thing that thou hast forsaken God, for it is that which makes thy enemies enemies indeed, and thy friends friends in vain." Sin is forsaking the Lord as our God; it is the soul's alienation from him. The cause of sin is because his fear is not in us. Sin is an evil that has no good in it. It is bitter; the wages of it is death, and death is bitter. As it is in itself evil and bitter, so it has a direct tendency to make us miserable: "Thy own wickedness shall correct thee, and thy backslidings shall reprove thee; the punishment will so inevitably follow the sin that the sin shall itself be said to punish thee. Thy own wickedness shall convince thee and stop thy mouth for ever and thou shalt be forced to own that the Lord is righteous."

Verses 20–28

I. The sin itself—idolatry. 1. They frequented the places of idol-worship (v. 20): "Upon every high hill and under every green tree, in the high places and the groves, thou wanderest, unsettled, and unsatisfied; but in all playing the harlot," spiritual whoredom, and commonly accompanied with corporal whoredom. 2. They made images for themselves, and gave divine honour to them (v. 26, 27); not only the common people, but even the kings and princes, the priests and prophets, were themselves so stupid as to say to a stock, "Thou art my father (that is, Thou art my god, the author of my being, to whom I owe duty and on whom I have a dependence)," and to a stone, to an idol made of stone, "Thou hast begotten me, or brought me forth; therefore protect me." What greater affront could men put upon God our Father that has made us? When these were first made the objects of worship they were supposed to be animated by some celestial power or spirit; but by degrees the thought of this was lost. In their imagination the very idol was supposed to be their father, and adored accordingly. 3. They multiplied these dunghill deities endlessly (v. 28): According to the number of thy cities are thy gods, O Judah! They could not agree in the same god. One city fancied one deity and another another.

II. The proof of this. They pretended that they would acquit themselves from this guilt, they washed themselves with nitre, and took much soap, v. 22. They pretended that they did not worship these as gods, but as demons, or that it was not divine honour that they gave them, but civil respect; thus they sought to evade the convictions of God's word. They said, I am not polluted, I have not gone after Baalim, v. 23. Because it was done secretly, and industriously concealed (Ezek. viii. 12), they thought it could never be proved upon them. "How canst thou deny the fact, and say, I have not gone after Baalim?" "It is imprinted deeply and stained before me"; so some read it. "Though thou endeavour to wash it out, as murderers to get the stain of the blood of the person slain out of their clothes, yet it will never be got out." See thy way in the valley (they had worshipped idols, not only on the high hills, but in the valleys, Isa. lvii. 5, 6), in the valley over against Beth-peor (so some), (Deut. xxiv. 6, Num. xxv. 3), but, if it mean any particular valley, surely it is the valley of the son of Hinnom, for that was the place where they sacrificed their children to Moloch and which therefore witnessed against them more than any other.

III. The aggravations of this sin with which they are charged.

1. God has done great things for them, and yet they revolted from him and rebelled against him (v. 20): Of old time I have broken thy yoke and burst thy bonds. These bonds of theirs which God had loosed should have bound them for ever to him.

2. They had promised fair, but had not made good their promise: "Thou saidst, I will not transgress."

3. They had wretchedly degenerated from what they were when God first formed them into a people (v. 21): I had planted thee a noble vine. Israel served the Lord, and kept close to him all the days of Joshua, and the elders that out-lived Joshua, Joshua xxiv. 31. The very next generation knew not the Lord, nor the works which he had done (Judges ii. 10), and so they were worse and worse till they became the degenerate plants of a strange vine.

4. They were violent and eager in the pursuit of their idolatries, and they would not be restrained either by the word of God or by his providence. They are compared to a swift dromedary traversing her ways, a female hunting (v. 23), and, to the same purport, a wild ass used to the wilderness (v. 24), not tamed by labour, and therefore very wanton, snuffing up the wind at her pleasure, on such an occasion who can turn her away? Who can hinder her from that which she lusts after? Those that seek her then will not weary themselves for her, but will have patience till she is big with young, and then they shall find her, and she cannot out-run them. Eager lust is a brutish thing, and those that will not be turned away are to be reckoned as brute-beasts. Let them not be looked upon as rational creatures. Idolatry is strangely intoxicating. Ephraim is joined to idols; let him alone. The time will come when the most fierce will be tamed; when distress and anguish come upon them, then their ears will be open to discipline.

5. They were obstinate in their sin, and, as they could not be restrained, so they would not be reformed, v. 25. He would certainly bring them into a miserable captivity, when they should be forced to travel barefoot, and when they would be denied fair water, so that their throat should be dried with thirst. Those that affect strange gods, and strange ways of worship, will justly be made prisoners to a strange king in a strange land. They said to those that would have persuaded them to repent and reform, There is no hope; no, never expect us to cast away our idols, for we have loved strangers, and after them we will go. But, as we must not despair of the mercy of God, but believe that sufficient for the pardon of our sins, though ever so heinous, if we repent and sue for that mercy, so neither must we despair of the grace of God, but believe that able to subdue our corruptions, though ever so strong, if we pray for and improve that grace. A man must never say There is no hope, as long as he is on this side hell.

6. They had shamed themselves by putting him away that would have helped them, v. 26–28. As the thief is ashamed when he is found, and brought to punishment, so are the house of Israel ashamed, not with a penitent shame for the sin they had been guilty of, but with a penal shame for the disappointment they met with in that sin. In their prosperity they had turned the back to God, but in the time of their trouble they will find no satisfaction but in applying to him; then they will say, Arise, and save us. To bring them to this shame, if so they might be brought to repentance, they are sent to the gods whom they served, Judges x. 14. They cried to God, Arise, and save us. God says of the idols, "Let them arise, and save thee, for thou hast no reason to expect that I should."

Verses 29–37

I. The truth of the charge was evident beyond contradiction (v. 29): "Wherefore will you plead with me? You know you have all transgressed, one as well as another; why then do you quarrel with me for contending with you?"

II. He heightens it from the consideration both of their incorrigibleness and of their ingratitude. They had been under divine rebukes of many kinds. God therein designed to bring them to repentance; but it was in vain. Their consciences were not awakened, nor their hearts softened. They received no instruction by the correction, were not made the better by it. They did not receive the correction, and so they were smitten in vain. They had not been wrought upon by the word of God which he had sent them in the mouth of his servants the prophets; they had killed the messengers for the sake of the message: "Your own sword has devoured your prophets like a destroying lion" (v. 31): "O generation!" (he speaks gently, O you men of this generation!) "see the word of the Lord, do not only hear it." As we are bidden to hear the rod (Micah vi. 9), for that has its voice, so we are bidden to see the word, for that has its visions, its views. It is written as with a sunbeam, so that he that runs may read it: Have I been a wilderness to Israel, a land of darkness? The service of God has not been either an unpleasant or an unprofitable service. God sometimes has led his people through a wilderness and a land of darkness, but he himself was then to them all that which they needed; he so fed them with manna, and led them by a pillar of fire, that it was to them a fruitful field and a land of light. They had grown intolerably insolent and imperious. They say, We are lords; we will come no more unto thee. It is absurd for us who are beggars to say, We are lords, that is, We are rich, and we will come no more to God.

III. He lays the blame of all their wickedness upon their forgetting God (v. 32): They have forgotten me; they have avoided all those things that would put them in mind of God. They had neglected him, days without number, time out of mind. How many days of our lives have passed without suitable remembrance of God! Who can number those empty days? They had not had such a regard to him as young ladies have to their fine clothes: Can a maid forget her ornaments or a bride her attire? No; they are ever and anon thinking and speaking of them.

IV. He shows them what a bad influence their sins had had upon others (v. 33): Why trimmest thou thy way to seek love? There is an allusion here to lewd women who recommend themselves by their ogling looks and gay dress, as Jezebel, who painted her face and tired her head. Thus they courted their neighbours into sinful confederacies with them and taught the wicked ones their ways of mixing God's institutions with their idolatrous customs. Those have a great deal to answer for who, by their fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, made wicked ones more wicked than otherwise they would be.

V. He charges them with the guilt of murder (v. 34): Also in thy skirts is found the blood of the souls, the life-blood of the poor innocents. The reference is to the children that were offered in sacrifice to Moloch; or it may be taken more generally for all the innocent blood which Manasseh shed, and with which he had filled Jerusalem (2 Kings xxi. 16). This blood was found not by secret search, not by digging (so the word is), but upon all these; it was above ground. This intimates that the guilt was avowed and barefaced.

VI. He overrules their plea of Not guilty (v. 35). I will plead with thee, and will convince thee of thy mistake. They conclude that God will immediately let fall his action and his anger shall be turned from them. This is very provoking, and God will convince them that his anger is just, and he will never cease his controversy till they, instead of justifying themselves, judge and condemn themselves.

VII. He upbraids them with the shameful disappointments they met with, in making creatures their confidence, while they made God their enemy, v. 36, 37. It was a piece of spiritual idolatry that they trusted in an arm of flesh and their hearts departed from the Lord. Why gaddest thou about so much to change thy way? Those that make God their hope, and walk in continual dependence upon him, need not gad about to change their way; for their souls may return to him, and repose in him, as their rest. They first trusted to Assyria, and, when that proved a broken reed, they depended upon Egypt, and that proved no better. Thou shalt be ashamed of Egypt, which thou now trustest in, as formerly thou wast of Assyria, who distressed them and helped them not, 2 Chron. xxviii. 20. Thy ambassadors or envoys shall return from Egypt disappointed, lamenting the desperate condition of their people. Or, Thou shalt go forth hence, that is, into captivity in a strange land, with thy hands upon thy head. "And Egypt, that thou reliest on, shall not be able to prevent it nor to rescue thee out of captivity." As there is no counsel or wisdom that can prevail against the Lord, so there is none that can prevail without him.

CHAP. III

In this chapter gracious invitations are given to return and repent, notwithstanding the multitude of their provocations, which are here specified, to show that as sin abounded grace did much more abound. Here, I. It is further shown how bad they had been, and yet how ready God was to receive them into his favour upon their repentance, ver. 1–5. II. The impenitence of Judah, ver. 6–11. III. Great encouragements are given to these backsliders to return and repent, and promises are made of great mercy which God had in store for them, ver. 12–19. IV. The charge renewed against them for their apostasy from God, and the invitation repeated, to which are here added the words, which they should make use of in their return to God, ver. 20–25.

Verses 1–5

These verses open a door of hope. God wounds that he may heal.

I. How basely this people had forsaken God and gone a-whoring from him. To have admitted one strange God among them would have been bad enough, but they were insatiable in their lustings after false worships: Thou hast played the harlot with many lovers, v. 1. They had sought opportunity for their idolatries and had sent about to enquire for new gods: In the high-ways hast thou sat for them. As the Arabian in the wilderness—the Arabian huckster (so some), that courts customers, or the Arabian thief (so others), that watches for his prey. They not only polluted themselves, but their land, with their whoredoms and with their wickedness (v. 2); for it became a national sin. And yet (v. 3), "Thou hadst a whore's forehead, a brazen face of thy own." Thou refusedest to be ashamed. Blushing is the colour of virtue, or at least a relic of it; but those that are past shame (we say) are past hope.

II. How gently God had corrected them for their sins. He only withheld the showers from them, and that only one part of the year.

III. How justly God might have refused ever to receive them again; this would have been but according to the known rule of divorces, v. 1. They say (Deut. xxiv. 4), that if a woman be once put away, and be joined to another man, her first husband shall never take her again to be his wife; such playing fast and loose with the marriage-bond would be a horrid profanation of that ordinance and would greatly pollute that land.

IV. How graciously he invites them to return to him. "Though thou hast been bad, yet return again to me," v. 1. God has not tied himself by the laws which he made for us, nor has he the peevish resentment that men have; he will be more kind to Israel than ever any injured husband was to an adulterous wife. He kindly directs them what to say to him (v. 4): "Wilt thou not from this time cry unto me? Now that thou hast been made to see thy sins (v. 2) and to smart for them (v. 3), wilt thou not now forsake them and return to me, saying, I will go and return to my first husband, for then it was better with me than now?" (Hos. ii. 7). He expects that they will claim relation to God, as theirs: Wilt thou not cry unto me, My father, thou art the guide of my youth? They will surely come towards him as a father, to beg his pardon for their undutiful behaviour to him. Or it may be taken more generally: "As my Father, thou art the guide of my youth." Youth needs a guide. In our return to God we must thankfully remember that he was the guide of our youth in the way of comfort; he shall be our guide henceforward in the way of duty.

Verses 6–11

The date of this sermon was in the days of Josiah, who set on foot a blessed work of reformation, in which he was hearty, but the people were not sincere.

The case of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah is here compared, the ten tribes that revolted from the throne of David and the temple of Jerusalem and the two tribes that adhered to both.

I. A short account of Israel, the ten tribes. She is called backsliding Israel because that kingdom was first founded in an apostasy from the divine institutions, both in church and state. They had played the harlot upon every high mountain and under every green tree (v. 6), that is, they had worshipped other gods in their high places and groves. God by his prophets had invited and encouraged them to repent and reform (v. 7): "After she had done all these things, for which she might justly have been abandoned, yet I said unto her, Turn thou unto me and I will receive thee." God sent his prophets among them, to call them to return to him, to the worship of him only, not insisting so much upon their return to the house of David, but pressing their return to the house of Aaron. We read not that Elijah, that great reformer, ever mentioned their return to the house of David. Notwithstanding this, they had persisted in their idolatries: But she returned not, and God saw it, v. 7, 8. He had therefore given them into the hands of their enemies (v. 8): When I saw (so it may be read) that for all the actions wherein she had committed adultery I must dismiss her, I gave her a bill of divorce. He scattered all their synagogues and the schools of the prophets and excluded them from laying any further claim to the covenant made with their fathers.

II. The case of Judah, the kingdom of the two tribes. She is called treacherous sister Judah, a sister because descended from the same common stock, Abraham and Jacob; but, as Israel had the character of a backslider, so Judah is called treacherous, because, though she professed to keep close to God when Israel had backslidden (she adhered to the kings and priests that were of God's own appointing), yet she proved treacherous. Israel's captivity was intended for Judah's admonition; but it had not the designed effect. Judah thought herself safe because she had Levites to be her priests and sons of David to be her kings. She defiled the land, and made it an abomination to God; for she committed adultery with stones and stocks, with the basest idols, those made of wood and stone. In the reigns of Manasseh and Amon, all the country was corrupted. God tried whether they would be good in a good reign, but the evil disposition was still the same: They returned not to me with their whole heart, but feignedly, v. 10. Josiah went further in destroying idolatry than the best of his predecessors had done, and he turned to the Lord with all his heart and with all his soul (2 Kings xxiii. 25). The people were forced to an external compliance with him (2 Chron. xxxiv. 32, xxxv. 17); but they were not sincere in it, nor were their hearts right with God. For this reason God at that very time said, I will remove Judah out of my sight, as I removed Israel (2 Kings xxiii. 27). I know no religion without sincerity.

III. The case of these sister kingdoms is compared, and of the two Judah was the worse (v. 11). This comparative justification will stand Israel in little stead; what will it avail us to say, We are not so bad as others, when yet we are not really good ourselves? Judah was in two respects worse than Israel: 1. More was expected from Judah than from Israel; Judah vilified a more sacred profession, and falsified a more solemn promise, than Israel did. 2. Judah might have taken warning by the ruin of Israel and would not.

Verses 12–19

There is a great deal of gospel in these verses. The prophet is directed to proclaim these words towards the north, for they are a call to backsliding Israel, the ten tribes that were carried captive into Assyria, which lay north from Jerusalem. That way he must look to upbraid the men of Judah with their obstinacy in refusing to answer the calls given them. Backsliding Israel will sooner accept of mercy, and have the benefit of it, than treacherous Judah. And perhaps the proclaiming of these words towards the north looks as far forward as the preaching of repentance and remission of sins unto all nations, beginning at Jerusalem, Luke xxiv. 47.

I. Here is an invitation given to backsliding Israel, and in them to the backsliding Gentiles, to return unto God, the God from whom they had revolted (v. 12): Return, thou backsliding Israel. And again (v. 14): "Turn, O backsliding children! Come back to that good way, out of which you have turned aside." They are encouraged to return. "You have incurred God's displeasure, but return to me, and I will not cause my anger to fall upon you." They are directed how to return (v. 13): "Only acknowledge thy iniquity, own thyself in a fault and thereby take shame to thyself and give glory to God." This will aggravate the condemnation of sinners, that the terms of pardon and peace were brought so low, and yet they would not come up to them. If the prophet had told thee to do some great thing wouldst thou not have done it? How much more when he says, Only acknowledge thy iniquity? (2 Kings v. 13). We must own our actual sins: "That thou hast transgressed against the Lord thy God, hast affronted him and offended him." We must own the multitude of our transgressions: "That thou hast scattered thy ways to the strangers, run hither and thither in pursuit of thy idols, under every green tree. "You have not obeyed my voice; acknowledge that, and let that humble you more than anything else."

II. Here are precious promises made to these backsliding children, if they do return, which were in part fulfilled in the return of the Jews out of their captivity, but the prophecy is to have its full accomplishment in the gospel church, and the gathering together of the children of God that were scattered abroad: "Return, for, though you are backsliders, yet you are children; though a treacherous wife, yet a wife, for I am married to you (v. 14) and will not disown the relation." Thus God remembers his covenant with their fathers, Lev. xxvi. 42.

1. He promises to gather them together from all places whither they are dispersed and scattered abroad, John xi. 52, I will take you, one of a city, and two of a family, or clan; and I will bring you to Zion, v. 14. Of the many that have backslidden from God there are but few that return to him—one of a city and two of a country. Of those few, though dispersed, yet not one shall be lost. Though there be but one in a city, God will find out that one. God's chosen, scattered all the world over, shall be brought to the gospel church, that Mount Zion, the heavenly Jerusalem, that holy hill on which Christ reigns.

2. He promises to set those over them that shall be every way blessings to them (v. 15): I will give you pastors after my heart. (1) When a church is gathered it must be governed. "I will bring them to Zion to be under discipline, not as wild beasts, but as sheep, under the direction of a shepherd. I will give them pastors, that is, both magistrates and ministers." (2) It is well with a people when their pastors are after God's own heart, who shall make his will their rule in all their administrations, who rule for him, and, as they are capable, rule like him. (3) Those are pastors after God's own heart who feed the flock, not fleece the flocks, but who feed them with wisdom and understanding. Those who are not only pastors, but teachers, must feed them with the word of God, which is able to make us wise to salvation.

3. He promises that there shall be no more occasion for the ark of the covenant, which had been the token of God's presence with them; that shall be set aside (v. 16): When you shall be multiplied and increased in the land, when the kingdom of the Messiah shall be set up, then they shall say no more, The ark of the covenant of the Lord, because they shall have a pure spiritual way of worship set up, in which the whole ceremonial law shall be set aside, for Christ, the truth of all those types, exhibited to us in the word and sacraments of the New Testament, will be to us instead of all. But in the gospel temple Christ is the ark; he is the mercy-seat; and it is the spiritual presence of God in his ordinances that we are now to expect. Many expressions are here used concerning the setting aside of the ark, that it shall not come to mind, that they shall not remember it, that they shall not visit it, that none of these things shall be any more done; for the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth, John iv. 24.

4. He promises that the gospel church, here called Jerusalem, shall become eminent, v. 17. Two things shall make it famous: (1) God's special residence and dominion in it. It shall be called, The throne of the Lord—of his glory, of his government, and his grace. (2) The accession of the Gentiles to it. All the nations shall become subjects to that throne of the Lord which is there set up.

5. He promises that there shall be a wonderful reformation wrought in the church: They shall not walk any more after the imagination of their evil hearts. They shall not live as they list, but live by rules, according to the will of God. See what leads in sin—the imagination of our own evil hearts; sin is walking after that imagination, being governed by fancy and humour; converting grace takes us off from walking after our own inventions and brings us to be governed by religion and right reason.

6. That Judah and Israel shall be happily united in one body, v. 18. They were so in their return out of captivity and their settlement again in Canaan. This happy coalescence between Israel and Judah in Canaan was a type of the uniting of Jews and Gentiles in the gospel church, when, all enmities being slain, they should become one sheepfold under one shepherd.

III. Difficulty in the way of all this mercy.

1. God asks, How shall I do this for thee? Not as if God showed favour with reluctancy, but we are utterly unworthy of his favours, there is nothing in us to deserve them. How should we who are so mean and weak, so worthless and unworthy, and so provoking, ever be put among the children? To those whom God puts among the children he will give the pleasant land, the land of Canaan. It was a type of heaven, where there are pleasures for evermore. Who could expect a place in that pleasant land that has so often despised it (Ps. cvi. 24) and is so unfit for it?

2. He does himself return answer to this question: But I said, Thou shalt call me, My Father. God does himself answer all the objections. That he may put returning penitents among the children, he will give them the Spirit of adoption, teaching them to cry, Abba, Father (Gal. iv. 6). "Thou shalt call me, My Father; thou shalt return to me, and resign thyself to me as a father, and that shall recommend thee to my favour." He will put his fear in their hearts, that they may never turn from him, but may persevere to the end.

Verses 20–25

I. The charge against Israel for their treacherous departures, v. 20. They were joined to God by a marriage-covenant, but they broke that covenant, they dealt treacherously with God.

II. Their confession of the truth of this charge, v. 21. When God reproved them for their apostasy, there were some whose voice was heard upon the high places weeping and praying, humbling themselves before the God of their fathers, that they have perverted their way and forgotten the Lord their God. Sin is the turning aside to crooked ways. Forgetting the Lord our God is at the bottom of all sin. If men would remember God, they would not transgress.

III. The invitation God gives them to return to him (v. 22): Return, you backsliding children. He calls them children in tenderness and compassion to them, froward as children, yet his sons, whom though he corrects he will not disinherit. God bears with such children, and so must parents. When they are convinced of sin (v. 21), then they are invited to return, as Christ invites those to him that are weary and heavy-laden. The promise to those that return is, I will heal your backslidings. God will heal our backslidings by his pardoning mercy, his quieting peace, and his renewing grace.

IV. The ready consent they give to this invitation. This is an echo to God's call; as a voice returned from broken walls, so this from broken hearts. God says, Return; they answer, Behold, we come. It is an immediate answer. 1. They come devoting themselves to God as theirs: "Thou art the Lord our God. It is our sin and folly that we have gone from thee." 2. They come claiming succour from God only: "In vain is salvation hoped for from the hills and from the multitude of the mountains." They worshipped their idols upon hills and mountains (v. 6), but now they will have no more to do with them. Therefore, 3. They come depending upon God only as their God: In the Lord our God is the salvation of Israel. It is applicable to the great salvation from sin, which Jesus Christ wrought for us; that is the salvation of the Lord, his great salvation. 4. They come justifying God in their troubles and judging themselves for their sins, v. 24, 25. They impute all the calamities they had been under to their idols. Shame (the idol, that shameful thing) has devoured the labour of our fathers. True penitents have learned to call sin shame. True penitents have learned to call sin death and ruin. "It has devoured all those good things which our fathers laboured for and left to us; we have found from our youth that our idolatry has been the destruction of our prosperity." Of the labour of their fathers, which their idols had devoured, they mention particularly their flocks and their herds, their sons and their daughters. They take to themselves the shame of their sin and folly (v. 25): "We lie down in our shame, being unable to bear up under it; our confusion covers us, that is, both our penal and our penitential shame. We are sinners by descent: We and our fathers have sinned. We have sinned from our youth; we have continued in sin, have sinned even unto this day, though often called to repent and forsake our sins. We have not obeyed the voice of the Lord our God, commanding us, when we have sinned, to repent." All this seems to be the language of the penitents of the house of Israel (v. 20), of the ten tribes, either of those that were in captivity or those of them that remained in their own land. And the prophet takes notice of their repentance to provoke the men of Judah to a holy emulation.

CHAP. IV

It should seem that the first two verses of this chapter might better have been joined to the foregoing chapter, for they are directed to Israel, the ten tribes, encouraging them to hold their resolution, ver. 1, 2. The rest of the chapter concerns Judah and Jerusalem. I. They are called to repent and reform, ver. 3, 4. II. They are warned of the advance of Nebuchadnezzar and his forces against them, ver. 5–18. III. To affect them the more, the prophet does himself bitterly lament and sympathizes with his people in the calamities it brought upon them, ver. 19–31.

Verses 1–2

When God called to backsliding Israel to return (ch. iii. 22) they immediately answered, Lord, we return; now God here takes notice of their answer.

I. "Dost thou say, I will return? Then thou must return unto me; make a thorough work of it. Return to the instituted worship of the God of Israel." Thou must utterly abandon all sin, and not retain any of the relics of idolatry: Put away thy abominations out of my sight. Their idolatries were not only obvious, but offensive, to the eye of God. They must be put away out of his sight, because they were a provocation to the pure eyes of God's glory. They must not return to sin again; so some understand that, Thou shalt not remove, reading it, Thou shalt not, or must not wander. They must give unto God the glory due unto his name (v. 2): "Thou shalt swear, The Lord liveth. His existence shall be with thee the most sacred fact."

II. He encourages them to keep their resolutions. "If thou wilt return to me, then thou shalt return, that is, thou shalt be brought back out of thy captivity into thy own land again, as was of old promised," Deut. iv. 29; xxx. 2. They shall be blessings to others; for their returning to God again will be a means of others turning to him who never knew him. See Isa. lxv. 16. They shall bless themselves in the God of truth, and not in false gods, and in him shall they glory; they shall make him their glory.

Verses 3–4

The prophet here turns his speech, in God's name, to the men of the place where he lived. We have heard what words he proclaimed towards the north (ch. iii. 12), for the comfort of those that were now in captivity; let us now see what he says to the men of Judah and Jerusalem, who were now in prosperity, for their conviction and awakening. In these two verses he exhorts them to repentance and reformation, to prevent the desolating judgments that were ready to break in upon them.

I. The duties required of them,

1. They must do by their hearts as they do by their ground that they expect any good of; they must plough it up (v. 3): "Break up your fallow-ground. Plough to yourselves a ploughing (or plough up your plough land), that you sow not among thorns, that you may not labour in vain as you have been doing a great while. Put yourselves into a frame fit to receive mercy from God, and put away all that which keeps it from you, and then you may expect to receive mercy and to prosper in your endeavours to help yourselves." An unconvinced unhumbled heart is like fallow-ground, untilled, unoccupied. It is ground capable of improvement; but it is unfenced, unfruitful, overgrown with thorns and weeds, which are the natural product of the corrupt heart; and, if it be not renewed with grace, rain and sunshine are lost upon it, Heb. vi. 7, 8. We are concerned to get this fallow-ground ploughed up. We must search into our own hearts, must pluck up by the roots those corruptions which, as thorns, choke our endeavours.

2. They must do that to their souls which was done to their bodies when they were taken into covenant with God (v. 4): "Circumcise yourselves to the Lord, and take away the foreskins of your heart. Mortify the flesh and the lusts of it. Boast not of the circumcision of the body, for that is but a sign, and will not serve without the thing signified. It is a dedicating sign. Do that in sincerity which was done in profession by your circumcision; devote and consecrate yourselves unto the Lord."

II. The danger threatened. Repent and reform, lest my fury come forth like fire. That which is to be dreaded by us more than anything else is the wrath of God. It is the evil of our doings that kindles the fire of God's wrath against us. The consideration of the imminent danger should awaken us to sanctify ourselves to God's glory and to see to it that we be sanctified by his grace.

Verses 5–18

God's usual method is to warn before he wounds. In these verses God gives notice to the Jews of the general desolation that would shortly be brought upon them by a foreign invasion. This must be declared in all the cities of Judah and streets of Jerusalem, that all might hear and be either brought to repentance or left inexcusable.

I. The war proclaimed, and notice given of the advance of the enemy. It is published now, some years before, by the prophet, v. 5, 6. The trumpet must be blown, the standard must be set up, a summons must be issued to the people, to gather together and to draw towards Zion, either to guard it or expecting to be guarded by it. The militia must be raised and all the forces mustered. Those that are fit for service, must go into the defenced cities, to garrison them; those that are weak must retire, and not stay.

II. An express arrived with intelligence of the approach of the king of Babylon and his army. The enemy is here compared, 1. To a lion that comes up from his thicket, when he is hungry, to seek his prey, v. 7. The helpless beasts are terrified and so become an easy prey to him. Nebuchadnezzar is this roaring tearing lion, the destroyer of the nations, now on his way towards the land of Judah. The destroyer of the Gentiles shall be the destroyer of the Jews too, when they have by their idolatry made themselves like the Gentiles. He has gone forth from his place, from Babylon, against this land; the cities shall be laid waste, without inhabitants, shall be overgrown with grass as a field; so some read it. 2. To a drying blasting wind (v. 11), which spoils the fruits of the earth and withers them, such as comes out of the north, which drives away rain (Prov. xxv. 23). A black freezing wind. Wherever they go, it shall surround them. It is a wind of the high places in the wilderness that beats upon the tops of the hills or that carries all before it in the plain. It shall come in its full force towards the daughters of my people, that have been brought up so tenderly. Now this fierce wind shall come against them, not to fan, nor cleanse them, but a full wind (v. 12). This shall come to me, or rather for me; it shall come with commission from God and shall accomplish that for which he sends it. 3. To clouds and whirlwinds for swiftness, v. 13. The Chaldean army shall come up as clouds driven with the wind. The horses are swifter than eagles when they fly upon their prey. 4. To watchers and the keepers of a field, v. 15–17. The voice declares from Dan, furthest north of all the cities of Canaan. They received the news and transmitted it to Jerusalem. Now, what is the news? "Tell the nations, the cities of the ten tribes, that they may provide for their own safety; but publish it against Jerusalem, let them know that watchers have come from a far country, that is, soldiers, that will watch all opportunities to do mischief. They are coming in full career, and give out their voice against the cities of Judah. As keepers of a field surround it, to keep all out from it, so shall they surround the cities of Judah till they surrender. They are against her round about, compassing her in on every side." See Luke xix. 43.

III. The lamentable cause of this judgment. 1. They sinned against God; it was all owing to themselves: She has been rebellious against me, saith the Lord, v. 17. The Chaldeans were breaking in upon them, and it was sin that opened the gap at which they entered: Thy way and thy doings have procured these things unto thee (v. 18). Sin is the cause of all our troubles. 2. God was angry with them for their sin. It is the fierce anger of the Lord that makes the army of the Chaldeans thus fierce, v. 8. 3. In his just anger he condemned them to this punishment: Now also will I give sentence against them, v. 12.

IV. The lamentable effects of this judgment. The people that should fight shall despair and shall not have a heart to make the least stand against the enemy (v. 8): "For this gird yourself with sackcloth, lament and howl." Instead of girding on the sword, they will gird on the sackcloth. While the enemy is yet at a distance they will give up and cry, Woe unto us! for we are spoiled, v. 13. Judah and Jerusalem had been famed for valiant men; but see the effect of sin: by depriving men of their confidence towards God, it deprives them of their courage towards men. At that day the heart of the king shall perish, both his wisdom and his courage. His princes and privy-counsellors shall be as much in despair as he. The business of the priests was to encourage the people; they were to say, Fear not, and let not your hearts faint, Deut. xx. 2, 3. But now the priests themselves shall be astonished, and shall have no heart to put spirit into the people. Our Saviour foretells that at the last destruction of Jerusalem men's hearts should fail them for fear, Luke xxi. 26.

V. The prophet's complaint of the people's being deceived, v. 10. It is expressed strangely: Ah! Lord God, surely thou hast greatly deceived this people, saying, You shall have peace. We are sure that God deceives none. But, 1. The people deceived themselves with the promises that God had made, building upon them, though they took no care to perform the conditions on which those promises did depend. Thus they cheated themselves and then wickedly complained that God had cheated them. 2. The false prophets deceived them with promises of peace, which they made them in God's name, ch. xxiii. 17; xxvii. 9. 3. God had permitted the false prophets to deceive, and the people to be deceived by them, giving both up to strong delusions, to punish them for not receiving the truth in the love of it. 4. It may be read with an interrogation, "Hast thou indeed thus deceived this people? It is plain that they are greatly deceived, for they expect peace, whereas the sword reaches unto the soul." Now, was it God that deceived them? No, he had often given them warning of judgments, but their own prophets deceive them, and cry peace to those to whom the God of heaven does not speak peace. It is a pitiable thing to see people flattered into their own ruin, and promising themselves peace when war is at the door.

VI. The prophet's endeavour to undeceive them. 1. He shows them their wound. They might discover their punishment in their sin (v. 18): "This is thy wickedness, because it is bitter. It produces bitter grief that reaches unto the heart; the sword reaches to the soul," v. 10. 2. He shows them the cure, v. 14. "O Jerusalem! wash thy heart from wickedness, that thou mayest be saved." By Jerusalem he means each one of the inhabitants of Jerusalem; for every man has a heart of his own, and it is personal reformation that must help the public. Every one must return from his own evil way and cleanse his own evil heart. Reformation is absolutely necessary to salvation. No reformation is saving but that which reaches the heart. There will be no effectual reformation of manners without a reformation of the mind. In the latter part of the verse he reasons with them: How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee? Thoughts of iniquity or mischief, these are the evil thoughts that are the spawn of the evil heart, from which all other wickedness is produced, Matt. xv. 19. Some by vain thoughts here understand all those frivolous excuses with which they turned off the reproofs and calls of the word, and bolstered themselves up in their wickedness.

Verses 19–31

The prophet is here in an agony, and cries out like one upon the rack of pain. The expressions are pathetic enough to melt a heart of stone. My bowels! my bowels! I am pained at my very heart. A good man, in such a bad world as this is, cannot but be a man of sorrows. My heart makes a noise in me, through the tumult of my spirits, and I cannot hold my peace. It is not for himself, or any affliction in his family that he grieves thus; but it is purely upon the public account, it is his people's case that he lays to heart thus.

I. They are very sinful and will not be reformed, v. 22. These are the words of God himself. God calls them his people, though they are foolish. They have cast him off, but he has not cast them off, Rom. xi. 1. They are foolish, for they have not known me. They are wise to do evil, to plot mischief against the quiet in the land, wise to contrive the gratification of their lusts, and then to conceal and palliate them. But to do good they have no knowledge, no application of mind.

II. They are very miserable, and cannot be relieved.

1. He cries out, Because thou hast heard, O my soul! the sound of the trumpet, and seen the standard, both giving the alarm of war, v. 19, 21. He does not say, Thou hast heard, O my ear! but, O my soul! because it is by the spirit of prophecy that he sees it. His soul heard it from the words of God, as if he had heard it with his bodily ears. Though he foretold this calamity he was far from desiring the woeful day. He strove to awaken them to a holy fear, and so to prevent judgment by a true and timely repentance.

2. The destruction here foretold:

(1) It is swift and sudden. Destruction upon destruction is cried (v. 20), breach upon breach, one sad calamity treading upon the heels of another. The death of Josiah plucks up the floodgates; within three months after that his son and successor Jehoahaz is deposed by the king of Egypt; within two or three years after Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem and took it, and thenceforward he was continually making descents upon the land of Judah, till he completed the ruin in the destruction of Jerusalem: but suddenly were their tents spoiled and their curtains in a moment. The country was laid waste at first. The shepherds and all that lived in tents were plundered immediately; therefore we find the Rechabites, who dwelt in tents, upon the first coming of the army of the Chaldees into the land retiring to Jerusalem, Jer. xxxv. 11.

(2) This war continued, for the people were obstinate, and would not submit to the king of Babylon, but took all opportunities to rebel against him. This is complained of (v. 21): How long shall I see the standard? Shall the sword devour for ever?

(3) The whole land is spoiled, or plundered (v. 20); so it was at first, and at length it became a perfect chaos. The earth is without form, and void (v. 23), as it was Gen. i. 2. It is Tohu and Bohu, the words there used, as far as the land of Judæa goes. The heavens too are without light. This alludes to the darkness that was upon the face of the deep (Gen. i. 2). It was not only the earth that failed them, but heaven frowned upon them; and with their trouble they had darkness, for they could not see through their troubles. The smoke of their houses and cities which the enemy burnt, darkened the sun, so that the heavens had no light. Or it may be taken figuratively: The earth (that is, the common people) was impoverished and in confusion; and the heavens (that is, the princes and rulers) had no light, no wisdom in themselves, nor were any comfort to the people, nor a guide to them. The mountains trembled, and the hills moved lightly,

v. 24. The everlasting mountains seemed to be scattered, Hab. iii. 6. The mountains on which they had worshipped their idols, the mountains trembled, as if they had been conscious of the people's guilt. The hills moved lightly, as being eased of the burden of a sinful nation, Isa. i. 24. I beheld the cities, and, lo, there was no man to be seen; even the birds of the heavens, that used to fly about and sing among the branches, were no more seen or heard. The land of Judah had now become like the lake of Sodom, see Deut. xxix. 23. Lo, the fruitful place was a wilderness. The cities also and their gates and walls are broken down and levelled. Those that look no further than second causes impute it to the policy and fury of the invaders; but the prophet, who looks to the first cause, says that it is at the presence of the Lord. The nation shall be entirely ruined, for the whole land shall be desolate, corn land and pasture land shall all be laid waste (v. 27). The whole city shall flee for fear of the horsemen and bowmen. Rather than lie exposed to their fury, they shall go into the thickets, and they shall climb up upon the rocks, for every city shall be forsaken. It is a dismal idea of the approaching desolation; but in the midst of all these threatenings comes one comfortable word (v. 27): Yet will not I make a full end—for God will reserve a remnant. Jerusalem shall again be built and the land inhabited. This comes for the comfort of those that trembled at God's word.

(4) Their case was helpless and without remedy. God would not help them; so he tells them plainly, v. 28. They would not repent and turn back from their sins (ch. ii. 25), and therefore God will not repent and turn back from his judgments. They could not help themselves, v. 30, 31. They flattered themselves with hopes that they should find some means. But the prophet tells them that, when it comes to the setting to, they will be quite at a loss: When thou art spoiled, what wilt thou do? They will be despised by their allies whom they depended upon. He compares Jerusalem to a harlot abandoned by all the lewd ones that used to make court to her. She does what she can to make herself appear considerable among the nations, and a valuable ally. She compliments them by her ambassadors. She clothes herself with crimson, as if she were rich, and decks herself with ornaments of gold, as if her treasuries were still full. She rents her face with painting, puts the best colours she can upon her present distresses. But this painting, though it beautifies the face for the present, really rends it; spoils the skin, cracks it, and makes it rough. "And, after all, in vain shalt thou make thyself fair; all thy neighbours are sensible how low thou art brought; the Chaldeans will strip thee of thy crimson and ornaments." Here seems to be an allusion to the story of Jezebel, who thought, by making herself look fair and fine, to outface her doom, but in vain, 2 Kings ix. 30, 33. They will find their troubles to be like the pains of a woman in travail, which she cannot escape: I have heard the voices of the daughter of Zion, her groans echoing to the triumphant shouts of the Chaldean army, v. 15. Zion, since her neighbours refuse to pity her, bewails herself, fetching deep sighs (so the word signifies), and she spreads her hands, reaching them forth for succour.

CHAP. V

Reproofs for sin and threatenings of judgment are intermixed in this chapter: judgments are threatened, that the reproofs of sin might be the more effectual to bring them to repentance. I. The sins they are charged with: Injustice (ver. 1), hypocrisy in religion (ver. 2), incorrigibleness (ver. 3), the corruption and debauchery of both poor and rich (ver. 4, 5), idolatry and adultery (ver. 7, 8), treacherous departures from God (ver. 11), defiance of him (ver. 12, 13), and at the bottom of all this, want of the fear of God, ver. 20–24. In the close of the chapter they are charged with violence and oppression (ver. 26–28), to debauch the nation, ver. 30, 31. II. The judgments threatened are very terrible. A foreign enemy shall be brought in upon them (ver. 15–17), shall carry them away into captivity (ver. 19), and keep all good things from them, ver. 25. But, III. Here is an intimation twice given that God would not utterly destroy them, ver. 10, 18. This was the scope and purport of Jeremiah's preaching in the latter end of Josiah's reign and the beginning of Jehoiakim's.

Verses 1–9

I. A challenge to produce any one right honest man in Jerusalem, v. 1. Jerusalem had become like the old world, in which all flesh had corrupted their way. "Look in the streets, and in the broad places, where they keep their markets; see if you can find a man, a magistrate (so some), that executes judgment, and administers justice impartially." Truth has fallen in the street (Isa. lix. 14). If there were but ten righteous men in Sodom, if but one of a thousand, of ten thousand, in Jerusalem, it should be spared. "What do you make of those in Jerusalem that continue to make profession of religion—men for whose sakes Jerusalem may be spared?" No, they are not sincere in their profession (v. 2): They say, The Lord liveth, and will swear by his name only, but they swear falsely.

II. A complaint which the prophet makes to God of the wilfulness of these people. God had appealed to their eyes (v. 1); but here the prophet appeals to his eyes (v. 3): "Are not thy eyes upon the truth? Dost thou not see every man's true character? They have made their faces harder than a rock. Thou hast consumed them, hast corrected them severely; but they have refused to receive correction. They would not receive instruction by the correction."

III. The trial made both of rich and poor, and the bad character given of both.

1. The poor were ignorant. He found many that refused to return, for whom he was willing to make excuse (v. 4): "Surely, these are poor, they are foolish. They never had the advantage of a good education, nor have they wherewithal to help themselves now with the means of instruction." Prevailing ignorance is the lamentable cause of abounding impiety and iniquity. There are the devil's poor as well as God's, who, notwithstanding their poverty, might know the way of the Lord, so as to walk in it and do their duty, without being book-learned; but they are willingly ignorant.

2. The rich were insolent and haughty (v. 5): "I will get me to the great men, and see if I can find them more pliable to the word and providence of God. But though they know the way of the Lord and the judgment of their God, yet they are too stiff to stoop to his government: These have altogether broken the yoke and burst the bonds. They think themselves too big to be corrected even by the sovereign Lord of all himself. The poor are weak, the rich are wilful, and so neither do their duty."

IV. Some particular sins specified, which they were guilty of. Their transgressions indeed were many and they added to the number and grew more impudent in them, v. 6. Their spiritual whoredom gave that honour to idols which is due to God only. They have sworn to them (so it may be read), have joined themselves to them and covenanted with them. Their corporal whoredom: they had forsaken God and served idols, and those that dishonoured him were left to dishonour themselves and their own families. They committed adultery without sense of shame or fear of punishment, for they assembled themselves by troops in the harlots' houses and did not blush to be seen by one another. So impudent was their lust that they became beasts (v. 8); like high-fed horses, they neighed everyone after his neighbour's wife, v. 8.

V. God's wrath against them for the universal debauchery of their land. A foreign enemy shall break in and their country shall be as if it were overrun and perfectly mastered by a lion of the forest, or by a wolf of the evening, which comes out at night, when he is hungry, and is very fierce and ravenous, or by a leopard, which is very swift and cruel. The enemy shall watch over their cities to put the inhabitants to this sad dilemma—if they stay in, they are starved; if they stir out, they are stabbed: Everyone that goeth out thence shall be torn in pieces. And all this bloody work is owing to the multitude of their transgressions. It is sin that makes the slaughter. "Shall I not visit for these things? Can you think that a God of infinite purity will connive at such abominable uncleanness?" Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this? (v. 9). Not but that those who have been guilty of these sins have found mercy with God (Manasseh himself did), but nations, as such, being punishable only in this life, it would not be for the glory of God to let a nation pass without some manifest tokens of his displeasure.

Verses 10–19

I. The sin of this people dooms them to destruction, v. 10. The house of Israel and the house of Judah, though at variance with one another, both agreed to deal very treacherously against God. They forsook the worship of him, and played the hypocrite. They defied the judgments of God and his threatenings in the mouth of his prophets, v. 12, 13. Multitudes are ruined by being made to believe that God will not be strict: Neither shall we see sword nor famine. The prophets gave them fair warning, but they turned it off with a jest: "They do but talk so, because it is their trade. It is not the word of the Lord, but only the language of their melancholy fancy." They threaten the prophets: "They shall become wind, and thus shall it be done unto them. Do they frighten us with famine? Let them be fed with the bread of affliction." "Do they tell us of the sword? Let them perish by the sword," ch. ii. 30.

II. The punishment of this people for their sin. God turns to the prophet Jeremiah, who had been thus bantered: Behold, I will make my words in thy mouth fire. The word shall be fire and the people wood. Sinners by sin make themselves fuel. The enemy shall be brought upon them. God gives them their commission (v. 10): "Go you up upon her walls, mount them, trample upon them, tread them down. Walls of stone, before the divine commission, shall be but mud walls. You may take away her battlements, and leave the fenced fortified cities to lie open; for her battlements are not the Lord's; he will not protect and fortify them." What dreadful work these invaders should make is here described (v. 15): Lo, I will bring a nation upon you, O house of Israel! This nation of the Chaldeans is here said to be a remote nation; it is brought upon them from afar, and will make the longer stay, that the soldiers may pay themselves well for so long a march. It is a mighty nation, an ancient nation, that value themselves upon their antiquity and will therefore be the more imperious. It is a nation whose language thou knowest not; they spoke the Syriac tongue. The difference of language would make it the more difficult to treat with them of peace. "They shall not store up, but eat up thy harvest in the field and thy bread in the house, which thy sons and thy daughters should eat." They shall eat up thy flocks and herds, out of which thou hast taken sacrifices for thy idols; they shall not leave thee the fruits of thy vines and fig-trees. They shall impoverish thy fenced cities—those cities wherein thou trustedst to be a protection to the country."

III. An intimation of the tender compassion God has yet for them. The enemy is commissioned to destroy and lay waste, but must not make a full end, v. 10. "Even in those days, dismal as they are, I will not make a full end with you"; and, if God will not, the enemy shall not.

IV. The justification of God in these proceedings. As he will appear to be gracious in not making a full end, so he will appear to be righteous in coming so near it, v. 19. The people will say, Wherefore doth the Lord our God do all this unto us? As if against such a sinful nation there did not appear cause enough of action. The prophet is instructed what answer to give them. He must tell them that God does this against them for what they have done against him, and that they may read their sin in their punishment. Have they forgotten how often they served strange gods in their own land, and therefore is it not just with God to make them serve strangers in a strange land, Deut. xxviii. 47, 48.

Verses 20–24

The prophet, having reproved them, is here sent to them again upon another errand, which he must publish in Judah; to persuade them to fear God.

I. He complains of the shameful stupidity of this people. They are a foolish people and without understanding; they apprehend not the mind of God, though ever so plainly declared to them by his prophets, and by his providence (v. 21): They have eyes, but they see not, ears, but they hear not. They had intellectual faculties, but they did not employ them as they ought. Their wills were stubborn and unapt to submit to the rules of the divine law (v. 23): This people has a revolting and a rebellious heart. It is the corrupt bias of the will that besots the understanding. The character of this people is the true character of all people till the grace of God has wrought a change. We are foolish, slow of understanding, and have a revolting and a rebellious heart, not only revolting from him by a rooted aversion to that which is good, but rebellious against him by a strong inclination to that which is evil.

II. He ascribed this to the want of the fear of God. When he observes them to be without understanding he asks, "Fear you not me, saith the Lord, and will you not tremble at my presence?" (v. 22). When he observes that they have revolted and gone he adds this, as the cause of their apostasy (v. 24), Neither say they in their hearts, Let us now fear the Lord our God. Therefore bad thoughts come into their mind, because they will not admit and entertain good thoughts.

III. He suggests some of those things to possess us with a holy fear of God.

1. We must fear the Lord and his greatness, v. 22. Here is one instance: he keeps the sea within compass. Though the tides flow with a mighty strength twice every day, and if they should flow on would drown the world, though in a storm the billows dash to the shore with incredible force, yet they return, and no harm is done. This is the Lord's doing, and if it were not common, it would be marvellous in our eyes. A wall of sand shall be as effectual as a wall of brass to check the flowing waves, to teach us that a soft answer turns away wrath, and quiets a foaming rage, when grievous words, like hard rocks, do but exasperate. This bound is placed by a perpetual decree, and it sends us back to the creation of the world, when God divided between the sea and the dry land, Gen. i. 9, 10, Ps. civ. 6, &c., and Job xxxviii. 8, &c. It is a perpetual decree; it has had its effect to this day and shall still continue till day and night come to an end. Now this is a good reason why we should fear God; for we see that he is a God of universal sovereignty.

2. We must fear the Lord and his goodness, Hos. iii. 5. We must fear the Lord our God, that is, we must worship him, because he is continually doing us good:

he gives us both the former and the latter rain, the former a little after seed-time, the latter a little before harvest, and by this means he reserves to us the appointed weeks of harvest. In harvest mercies therefore God is to be acknowledged, his power, and goodness, and faithfulness, for they all come from him. And it is a good reason why we should fear him, that we may keep ourselves in his love.

Verses 25–31

I. The prophet shows them what mischief their sins had done them: "It is your sin that has withholden good from you, when God was ready to bestow it upon you." It is that which makes the heavens as brass and the earth as iron.

II. He shows them how great their sins were. When they had forsaken the worship of the true God, even moral honesty was lost among them: Among my people are found wicked men (v. 26), and so much the worse they were for being found among God's people. They were found (that is, caught) in the very act of their wickedness. As hunters or fowlers lay snares for their game, so did they lie in wait to catch men, and made a sport of it. They contrived ways of doing mischief to good people (whom they hated for their goodness), especially to those that faithfully reproved them (Isa. xxix. 21), or to those whose estates they coveted; so Jezebel ensnared Naboth for his vineyard. They were false and treacherous (v. 27): As a cage, or coop, is full of birds, and of food for them to fatten them for the table, so are their houses full of deceit, of wealth obtained by fraudulent practices. Whoever deals with them, they will cheat him if they can. Herein they overpass the deeds of the wicked, v. 28. Those that act by deceit, with a colour of law and justice, do more mischief perhaps than those wicked men (v. 26) that carry all before them by open force and violence. They prosper in these wicked courses and therefore their hearts are hardened in them. They have become great in the world; they have waxen rich, and thrive upon it. They are sleek and smooth: They shine; they look fair and gay; everybody admires them. And they pass by matters of evil (so some read the following words); they are not in trouble as other men, much less as we might expect bad men. When they had got power in their hands they did not do good with it. They judge not the cause, the cause of the fatherless, and the right of the needy And yet they prosper still; God layeth not folly to them. Certainly then the things of this world are not the best things, for oftentimes the worst men have the most of them; yet we are not to think that God allows of their practices. No; though sentence against their evil works be not executed speedily, it will be executed. There was a general corruption (v. 30, 31): A wonderful and horrible thing is committed in the land. The degeneracy of such a people, so privileged and advanced, was a wonderful thing, a horrible thing, to be detested. The leaders misled the people: The prophets prophesy falsely. Religion is never more dangerously attacked than under colour and pretence of divine revelation. The priests bear rule by their means; in grandeur and wealth, laziness and luxury. The people were well enough pleased to be so misled: "They are my people," says God, "and should have borne their testimony against the wickedness of their priests and prophets; but they love to have it so." They love to be ridden with a loose rein, and like those rulers very well that will not restrain their lusts.

III. He shows them how fatal the consequences of this would be. Shall not I visit for these things? Here, judgment is reasoning against mercy: Shall I not visit? We are sure that Infinite Wisdom knows how to accommodate the matter between them. Shall not my soul be avenged? Yes, without doubt, if the sinner repent not. What will you do in the end thereof? Those that walk in bad ways would do well to consider the tendency of them both to greater sin and utter ruin.

CHAP. VI

In this chapter, as before, we have, I. A prophecy of the invading of the land of Judah and the besieging of Jerusalem by the Chaldean army (ver. 1–6), the spoils they should make of the country (ver. 9), and the terror on that occasion, ver. 22–26. II. An account of those sins of Judah and Jerusalem which provoke God to bring this desolating judgment. Their oppression (ver. 7), their contempt of the word of God (ver. 10–12), their worldliness (ver. 13), the treachery of their prophets (ver. 14), their impudence in sin (ver. 15), their obstinacy against reproofs (ver. 18, 19), which made their sacrifices unacceptable to him (ver. 20), and for which he gave them up to ruin (ver. 21), but tried them first (ver. 27) and then rejected them as irreclaimable, ver. 28–30. III. Good counsel given them in the midst of all this, but in vain, ver. 8, 16, 17.

Verses 1–8

I. Judgment threatened against Judah and Jerusalem. The city saw no cloud gathering, but everything looked safe and serene: but the prophet tells them that they shall shortly be invaded by a foreign power from the north, which shall cause a general desolation. It is here foretold,

1. That the alarm should be loud and terrible. This is represented, v. 1. The children of Benjamin, in which tribe part of Jerusalem lay, are here called to shift for their own safety in the country; for the city (to which it was first thought advisible for them to flee, ch. iv. 5, 6) would soon be made too hot for them. They are told to send the alarm into the country, and to do what they can for their own safety: Blow the trumpet in Tekoa, a city which lay twelve miles north from Jerusalem. Set up a sign of fire (that is, kindle the beacons) in Beth-haccerem, the house of the vineyard, which lay on a hill between Jerusalem and Tekoa. This may be taken ironically: "When you have done your best, it will be a great destruction, for it is in vain to contend with God's judgments."

2. That the attempt upon them should be formidable. The daughter of Zion, on whom the assault is made, is compared to a comely and delicate woman (v. 2), and, not being accustomed to hardship, she will be the less able either to resist the enemy or to bear the destruction. The generals and their armies are compared to shepherds and their flocks (v. 3), in such numbers did they come, the soldiers following their leaders as sheep their shepherds. The shepherds easily make themselves masters of an open field, which lies common, owned by none, pitch their tents in it, and their flocks quickly eat it bare; so shall the Chaldean army easily break in upon the land of Judah, force for themselves a free quarter where they please, and in a little time devour all. God shall commission them to make this destruction. It is he that says (v. 4), Prepare you war against her; for he is the Lord of hosts, and he has said (v. 6), Hew you down trees, and cast a mount against Jerusalem. God has said, "This is the city to be visited by the divine justice, and this is the time of her visitation." They resolve to be very expeditious. Arise, let us go up at noon, though it be in the heat of the day; nay (v. 5), Arise, let us go up by night, though it be in the dark. "Let us go up, and let us destroy her palaces and make ourselves masters of the wealth that is in them."

II. The cause of this judgment is all for their wickedness; they have brought it upon themselves; they must bear the blame of it. They are thus oppressed because they have been oppressors; they have dealt hardly with one another, each in his turn, as they have had power and advantage, and now the enemy shall come and deal hardly with them all. Sin had become in a manner natural to them (v. 7): She casts out wickedness, in malice and mischievousness, as a fountain casts out her waters, plentifully and constantly. The cry of it had come up before God as that of Sodom: Before me continually are grief and wounds—the complaint of those that find themselves unjustly wounded in bodies or spirits, in estates or reputation. He that is the common Parent of mankind regards and resents, and sooner or later will revenge, the mischiefs and wrongs that men do to one another.

III. How to prevent this judgment. "Be thou instructed, O Jerusalem! v. 8. Receive the instruction given thee both by the law of God and by his prophets; be wise at length for thyself." Lest my soul depart, or be disjoined, from thee. This intimates what a tender affection and concern God had for them; his very soul had been joined to them, and nothing but sin could disjoin it. The God of mercy is loth to depart even from a provoking people, and is earnest with them by true repentance and reformation to prevent things coming to that extremity.

Verses 9–17

I. The ruin of Judah and Jerusalem is here threatened. We had before the haste which the Chaldean army made (v. 4, 5); now here we have the havoc. The enemy shall be insatiable in their thirst after treasure. They shall thoroughly glean the remnant of Israel as a vine; as the grape-gatherer, who is resolved to leave none behind, still turns back his hand into the baskets, to put more in. Perhaps the people, being given to covetousness (v. 13), had not observed that law of God which forbade them to glean all their grapes (Lev. xix. 10), and now they themselves shall be thoroughly gleaned. The children perish in the calamity which the fathers' sins have procured. The execution shall reach the assembly of young men, their merry meetings; they shall be cut off together. Even the husband with the wife shall be taken and the old with the full of days, whose deaths can contribute no more to their safety than their lives to their service. Their houses shall then be turned to others (v. 12). The prophet justifies himself in preaching thus terribly (v. 11): I am full of the fury of the Lord. He took no delight in threatening, but he could not contain himself; he was weary with holding in, but he was so full of power by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts that he must speak. The priest and the prophet have dealt falsely, have not told the people their faults and the danger they were in; they should have been their physicians, but they murdered their patients by giving them everything they had a mind to, and flattering them that they were in no danger (v. 14): They have healed the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly, soothing people in their sins, and giving them opiates to make them easy, while the disease was preying upon the vitals. They said, "Peace, peace—all shall be well", when there is no peace, because they went on in their daring impieties. Those are to be reckoned our false friends (that is, our worst and most dangerous enemies) who flatter us in a sinful way.

II. The sin of Judah and Jerusalem which provoked God to bring this ruin. 1. They would by no means bear to be told of their danger. God bids the prophet give them warning of the judgment coming (v. 9); "but," says, he "to whom shall I speak and give warning? I cannot speak that they may hear, for their ear is uncircumcised. The word of the Lord is unto them a reproach; the reproofs and the threatenings are so." Those reproofs that are counted reproaches, will certainly be turned into woes. 2. They were set upon the world, and carried away by the love of it (v. 13): "From the least of them even to the greatest, everyone is given to covetousness, greedy of filthy lucre," and this made them oppressive and violent (v. 6, 7). This hardened their hearts against the word of God and his prophets. 3. They were past shame. Their hearts were so hardened that they were not at all ashamed, neither could they blush, they had so brazened their faces. They resolved to face it out against God himself. Those that will not submit to a penitential shame shall not escape utter ruin: Therefore they shall fall among those that fall; they shall be made to tremble, because they would not blush. Those that sin and cannot blush for it are in an evil case now, and it will be worse with them shortly. At first they hardened themselves and would not blush, afterwards they were so hardened that they could not. They have lost the only good property which once blended itself with many bad ones, that is, shame for having done amiss.

III. The good counsel often given them in vain. God used to say to them, Stand in the ways and see. He would have them do as travellers who are in care to find the right way which will bring them to their journey's end, and therefore enquire for it. O that men would be thus wise for their souls. "Ask for the old paths, enquire of the former age (Job viii. 8), ask thy father, thy elders (Deut. xxxii. 7), and thou wilt find that the way of godliness has always been the way which God has owned and blessed and in which men have prospered. Ask for the old paths, the paths that the patriarchs travelled, Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob; and, as you hope to inherit the promises made to them, tread in their steps. Ask for the old paths, Where is the good way?" But there is an old way which wicked men have trodden, Job. xxii. 15. When we ask for the old paths, it is only to find out the good way. Note, The way of religion and godliness is a good old way, the way that all the saints in all ages have walked in. "When you have found out which is the good way, walk therein, and persevere in it." Some make this counsel to be given them with reference to the struggles between the true and false prophets. "Stand in the way," says God, "and enquire, which agrees with the written word and the usual methods of God's providence, which of these directs you to the good way, and do accordingly. Walk in the good old way and you will enjoy God and yourselves, and the way will lead you to true rest. You will find an abundant recompence at your journey's end." But they said, "We will not walk therein, we will not deny ourselves and our humours so far as to walk in it." Because they would not be ruled by fair reasoning, God, by less judgments threatens greater, and sends his prophets to frighten them with an apprehension of the danger they were in (v. 17): Also I set watchmen over you. This was the burden of their song; Hearken to the sound of the trumpet. God, in his providence, sounds the trumpet (Zech. ix. 14); the watchmen hear it (Jer. iv. 19), and they call upon others to hearken to it too. But they said, "We will not hearken; we will not heed, the prophets may as well save themselves and us the trouble."

Verses 18–30

I. God appeals to the whole world concerning the equity of his proceedings against Judah and Jerusalem (v. 18, 19): "Hear, you nations, and know particularly, O congregation of the mighty, the great men of the nations. Observe now Judah and Jerusalem; you all wonder that I should bring evil upon this people, that are in covenant with me, Wherefore has the Lord done thus to this land? Know then the evil brought upon them is the fruit of their thought. They thought to strengthen themselves by their alliance with foreigners, and by that they weakened and exposed themselves. That is the just punishment of their disobedience and rebellion. It is because they have not hearkened to my words nor to my law, but rejected it all. Therefore you cannot say that they have any wrong done them."

II. God rejects their plea, by which they insisted upon their services as sufficient to atone for their sins. It is a frivolous plea (v. 20): "To what purpose come there to me incense and sweet cane, to be burnt for a perfume on the golden altar? What care I for your burnt-offerings and your sacrifices?" Sacrifice and incense were appointed to direct them to a Mediator, and assist their faith in him. Where this good use was made of them they were acceptable, God had respect to them and to those that offered them. But when they were offered with an opinion that they purchased a license to go on in sin, far from being pleasing to God, they were a provocation to him.

III. He foretells the desolation. God designs their ruin because they hate to be reformed (v. 21): I will lay stumbling-blocks before this people, occasions of falling not into sin, but into trouble. God retards all the methods they take for their own safety. The parties of the enemy, were stumbling-blocks to them. The fathers and the sons together shall fall upon them; neither the fathers with their wisdom, nor the sons with their strength shall escape them. He will make the Chaldeans instruments. Babylon a great way northward, and some of the countries that were subject to the king of Babylon, must be employed in this service, v. 22, 23. It is a great nation, a warlike people. They lay hold on bow and spear, know how to use them. They ride upon horses, and therefore move the more swiftly, and in battle press the harder. They are cruel and have no mercy, their voice roars like the sea. They are set in array against thee, O daughter of Zion!

IV. He describes the consternation which Judah and Jerusalem should be in upon the approach of this formidable enemy, v. 24–26. "When we have but heard the fame thereof our hands wax feeble, and we have no heart to make any resistance; anguish has taken hold of us, and we are like a woman in travail." Sense of guilt dispirits men, upon the approach of trouble. They confine themselves to their houses: they would rather die tamely there than by fight or flight, to help themselves. They say one to another, "Go not forth into the field, nor walk by the way; it is at your peril if you do, for the sword of the enemy, and the fear of it, are on every side." The prophet calls upon them to lament: "O daughter of my people, hear thy God calling thee to mourning: do not only put on sackcloth for a day; do not only put ashes on thy head, but wallow thyself in ashes as parents mourn for an only son."

V. He constitutes the prophet a judge over this people that now stand upon their trial: I have set thee for a tower, or as a sentinel upon a tower, among my people, that thou mayest know, and try their way, v. 27. Thus God appeals to the prophet himself, and his own observation, that he might be fully satisfied in the equity of God's proceedings against them. God set him for a tower, but made him a fortress, a strong tower, gave him courage to bear the shock of their displeasure. He will find (v. 28): They are all grievous revolters, revolters of revolters (so the word is), the worst of revolters. They walk with slanders, backbiting one another. They are brass and iron, base metals. They were as silver and gold, but they have degenerated. As they are all revolters, so they are all corrupters, industrious to debauch others. It was in vain to think of reforming them, for various methods had been tried all to no purpose, v. 29, 30. He compares them to ore that was supposed to have some good metal in it, and was therefore put into the furnace by the refiner, but it proved all dross. God by his prophets and by his providences had used means to refine this people, but it was all in vain. By a series of afflictions, they had been kept in a constant fire, but all to no purpose. The bellows have been kept so near the fire, to blow it, that they are burnt with the heat of it. The lead, which was then used in refining silver, as quicksilver is now, is consumed of the fire, and has not done its work. The founder melts in vain; his labour is lost, for the wicked are not plucked away, no care is taken to cast out of communion those who, being corrupt, are in danger of infecting others. Doom is passed upon them (v. 30): Reprobate silver shall they be called, useless and worthless; they glitter as if they had some silver in them, but there is nothing of real goodness to be found among them; and the Lord has rejected them. God has no pleasure in the death and ruin of sinners. He did not reject them till he had used all proper means to reform them; nor abandon them as dross till it appeared that they were reprobate silver.

CHAP. VII

The prophet having in God's name reproved the people for their sins, 1. He shows them the invalidity of the plea that they had the temple of God among them and constantly attended the service, ver. 1–11. II. He reminds them of the desolations of Shiloh, and foretells that such should be the desolations of Jerusalem, ver. 12–16. III. He represents to the prophet their abominable idolatries, ver. 17–20. IV. He sets before the people that maxim that "to obey is better than sacrifice" (1 Sam. xv. 22), and that God would not accept the sacrifices of those that persisted in disobedience, ver. 21–28. V. He threatens to lay the land waste for their idolatry and impiety, ver. 29–34.

Verses 1–15

These verses begin another sermon, which is continued in the two following chapters, to reason them to repentance.

I. The orders given to the prophet: This was a word that came to him from the Lord, v. 1. 1. Where it must be preached—in the gate of the Lord's house, through which they entered into the outer court. It would affront the priests, and expose the prophets to their rage, but the prophet must not fear the face of man. 2. To whom it must be preached—to the men of Judah, that enter in at these gates to worship the Lord; probably it was at one of the three feasts, when all the males were to appear and not to appear empty.

II. The contents and scope of the sermon itself. It is delivered in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, who commands the world, but covenants with his people. The prophet here tells them,

1. What were the true words of God. In short, if they would repent and return to God, he would restore their peace, redress their grievances, and return to them in mercy (v. 3): Amend your ways and your doings. God shows them where and how they must amend, and promises to accept them: "I will cause you to dwell quietly and peaceably in this place, and a stop shall be put to that which threatens your expulsion." They must thoroughly amend; it must be a universal, constant, persevering reformation, not wavering, but constant. They must be honest and just in all their dealings. Those that had power must thoroughly execute judgment between a man and his neighbour, without partiality. They must not oppress the stranger, the fatherless, or the widow, nor protect those that did oppress. They must not shed innocent blood, and with it defile this place and the land wherein they dwelt. They must keep closely to the worship of the true God only: Neither walk after other gods; do not hanker after them. "Set about such a work of reformation with all speed, and I will cause you to dwell in this place, this temple; it shall continue your refuge, the place of your meeting with God and one another; and you shall never be turned out either from God's house or from your own." They shall enjoy it by covenant not by providence, but by promise. They shall not be disturbed for ever and ever; nothing but sin could throw them out. An everlasting inheritance in the heavenly Canaan is hereby secured to all that live in godliness and honesty.

2. What were the lying words of their own hearts, which they must not trust. He cautions them (v. 4): "Trust not in lying words. You are told in what way you may be safe, and happy; do not flatter yourselves that you may be so in any other way." Behold, it is plain that you do trust in lying words, notwithstanding what is said to you; you trust in words that cannot profit. Now these lying words were, "The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are these. Here he resides, here he is worshipped, here we meet three times a year to pay our homage to him as our King in his palace." This they thought was security enough. When the prophets told them how sinful they were, still they appealed to the temple. It was the cant of the times; it was in their mouths upon all occasions. The privileges of a form of godliness are often the pride and confidence of those that are strangers and enemies to the power of it. It is common for those that are furthest from God to boast themselves most of their being near to the church (Zeph. iii. 11). If they knew anything either of the temple of the Lord or of the Lord of the temple, they must think that to plead that in excuse of their sin was most unreasonable. God is a holy God; but this plea made him the patron of sin, v. 9, 10. "When you have done the worst you can against God, will you brazen your faces so far as to stand before him in this house which is called by his name—stand before him as suppliants expecting his favour? It is as if you should say, We are delivered to do all these abominations." Some take it thus: "You present yourselves before God with your sacrifices and sin-offerings, and then say, We are delivered, we are discharged from our guilt, when all this is but to blind the world, that you may the more easily do all these abominations. Has this house, which is called by my name and is a sign of God's kingdom, set up in opposition to the kingdom of sin and Satan—has this become a den of robbers in your eyes? Do you think it was built to be a refuge to malefactors?" Though the horns of the altar were a sanctuary to him that slew a man unawares, they were not so to a wilful murderer, Exod. xxi. 14; 1 Kings ii. 29. Behold, I have seen it, saith the Lord, have seen the real iniquity through the counterfeit piety. He shows them the insufficiency of this plea in the case of Shiloh. It is certain that Shiloh was ruined, though it had God's sanctuary in it, when by its wickedness it profaned that sanctuary (v. 12): Go you now to my place which was in Shiloh. There God set his name at the first, there the tabernacle was set up (Joshua xviii. 1), but those that attended the service of the tabernacle there corrupted both themselves and others, and from them arose the wickedness of his people Israel, and what came of it? Was it protected by its having the tabernacle in it? God forsook it (Ps. lxxviii. 60), sent his ark into captivity, cut off the house of Eli that presided there. Remember Lot's wife; remember Shiloh and the seven churches of Asia; and know that the ark and candlestick are movable things, Rev. ii. 5; Matt. xxi. 43. Jerusalem was now as sinful as ever Shiloh was (v. 13): "You have done all these works, you cannot deny it." God spoke, but they heard not, they never minded; he called them, but they answered not; they would not come at his call. Jerusalem shall shortly be as miserable as ever Shiloh was: Therefore I will do unto this house as I did to Shiloh, ruin it, and lay it waste, v. 14. "This house" (says God) "is called by my name, and therefore you may think that I should protect it; but the men of Shiloh thus flattered themselves and did but deceive themselves." He quotes another precedent (v. 15), the ruin of the kingdom of the ten tribes, who were the seed of Abraham, and yet their idolatries threw them out and extirpated them.

Verses 16–20

The temple and the service of it should not avail to prevent the judgment threatened. But there was the prophet's intercession for them; his prayers would do them more good than their own pleas: now that support is taken from those who have lost their interest in the prayers of God's ministers and people.

I. God here forbids the prophet to pray for them (v. 16): "The decree has gone forth, pray not thou for this people, that is, pray not for the preventing of this judgment threatened; they have sinned unto death, and therefore pray not for their life, but for the life of their souls," 1 John v. 16. God's prophets are praying men; Jeremiah foretold the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem, and yet prayed for their preservation. Even when we threaten sinners with damnation we must pray for their salvation, that they may turn and live. Jeremiah was persecuted, and reproached, by his people, and yet he prayed for them. God's praying prophets have a great interest in heaven. Those that will not regard good ministers' preaching cannot expect any benefit by their praying. If you will not hear us when we speak from God to you, God will not hear us when we speak to him for you.

II. He gives him a reason for this prohibition.

1. They are resolved to persist in their rebellion against God (v. 17): Seest thou not what they do openly and publicly, without either shame or fear, in the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem? This intimates that the sin was evident and that the sinners committed their wickedness even in the prophet's presence. He saw what they did, and yet they did it, which was an affront to him whose officer he was. Their idolatrous respects are paid to the queen of heaven, the moon, either in an image or in the original, or both. They worshipped it probably under the name of Ashtaroth, ch. xliv. 17, 19. They worshipped the creatures instead of him that made them, and the gifts instead of him that gave them. With the queen of heaven they worshipped other gods, for those that forsake the true God wander endlessly after false ones. To these deities of their own making they offer cakes for meat-offerings, and pour out drink-offerings. The children were sent to gather wood; the fathers kindled the fire to heat the oven, the women kneaded the dough with their own hands. Let us be instructed even by this bad example, in the service of our God. (1) Let us honour him with our substance, as those that have our subsistence from him, and eat and drink to the glory of him from whom we have our meat and drink. (2) Let us not decline the hardest services by which God may be honoured; for none shall kindle a fire on God's altar for nought. (3) Let our children be employed in doing something towards the keeping up of religious exercises. What is the direct tendency of this idolatry: "It is that they may provoke me to anger; they cannot design anything else in it. Is it because I am easily provoked? It is their own doing; and they alone shall bear it." Is it against God that they provoke him to wrath? It is malice against God, but it is impotent malice; it cannot hurt him: it will hurt themselves.

2. God is resolved to proceed in his judgments against them, and will not be turned back by the prophet's prayers (v. 20): Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, my anger and my fury shall be poured out upon this place. It shall reach both man and beast, like the plagues of Egypt, and shall destroy the trees of the field and the fruit of the ground, which they had prepared for Baal, and cakes to the queen of heaven. There is no extinguishing it: It shall burn and shall not be quenched; prayers and tears shall then avail nothing.

Verses 21–28

God, having shown the people that the temple would not protect them while they polluted it with their wickedness, here shows them that their sacrifices would not atone while they went on in disobedience. He speaks of their ceremonial service (v. 21): "Put your burnt-offerings to your sacrifices; add one sort of sacrifice to another; turn your burnt-offerings into peace-offerings, that you may eat flesh, but expect not any other benefit by them. Keep your sacrifices to yourselves, let them be served up at your own table, for they are no way acceptable at God's altars."

I. He shows them that obedience was the only thing he required of them, v. 22, 23. He appeals to the original contract, by which they were first formed into a people, when they were brought out of Egypt. God made them a kingdom of priests to himself, not that he might be regaled with their sacrifices, as the devils, whom the heathen worshipped, Deut. xxxii. 38. I spoke not to your fathers concerning burnt-offerings or sacrifices, at first. The precepts of the moral law were given before the ceremonial institutions; and those came afterwards, as trials of their obedience. The Levitical law begins thus: If any man of you will bring an offering, he must do so and so (Lev. i. 2, ii. 1), as if it were intended rather to regulate sacrifice than to require it. The condition of their being God's peculiar people was this (Exod. xix. 5), If you will obey my voice indeed. "Make conscience of the duties of natural religion, observe positive institutions from a principle of obedience, and then I will be your God and you shall be my people." "Let your conversation be regular; walk within the bounds I have set, and in all the ways that I have commanded you, and then it shall be well with you." The demand here is very reasonable, that we should be directed by Infinite Wisdom, that he that made us should command us, and that he should give us law who gives us our being.

II. He shows them that disobedience was the only thing for which he had a quarrel with them. 1. They set up their own will in competition with the will of God: They hearkened not to God and to his law; they inclined not their ear to attend to it, much less their hearts to comply with it. Their own counsels were their guide. The imagination of their evil heart, the appetites and passions of it, shall be a law to them. 2. They went backward, when they talked of making a captain, and returning to Egypt again, and would not go forward under God's conduct. They promised fair: All that the Lord shall say unto us we will do; but they drew back into the way of sin, and were worse than ever. 3. When God sent to them by the prophets, still they were disobedient. God had servants of his among them in every age, to tell them of their faults, whom he rose up early to send (as before, v. 13), but they were as deaf to the prophets as they were to the law (v. 26). Their practice and character were still the same. They are worse, and not better, than their fathers. Jeremiah can himself witness against them (v. 27): "Thou shalt speak all these words to them. They will not hearken to thee, nor heed thee. They will either give thee no answer at all or not an obedient answer; they will not come at thy call." The prophet must go to them and tell them (v. 28): "Say unto them, This is a nation that obeys not the voice of the Lord their God. They are notorious for their obstinacy; they sacrifice to the Lord, but they will not be ruled by him; they will not receive either the instruction of his word or the correction of his rod; they will not be reclaimed or reformed by either. They are false both to God and man."

Verses 29–34

I. A loud call to weeping and mourning. Jerusalem, that had been a joyous city must now take up a lamentation on high places (v. 29), where they had served their idols. In token both of sorrow and slavery, Jerusalem must now cut off her hair and cast it away; the word is peculiar to the hair of the Nazarites, which was the badge and token of their dedication to God. Jerusalem had been a city which was a Nazarite to God, but now must cut off her hair, be degraded, and separated from God, as she had been separated to him. It is time for those that have lost their holiness to lay aside their joy.

II. Just cause given for this great lamentation.

1. The sin of Jerusalem appears here very heinous (v. 30): The children of Judah have done evil in my sight; they have affronted me to my face. Here are two things charged upon them: (1) That they were impudent towards God and set him at defiance: They have set their abominations in the house that is called by my name, in the very courts of the temple, to pollute it, as if they would reconcile heaven and hell, God and Baal. They have particularly built the high places of Tophet, where the image of Moloch was set up, in the valley of the son of Hinnom, adjoining Jerusalem; and there they burnt their sons and their daughters in the fire, burnt them alive, to honour or appease those idols that were devils and not gods. Surely it was righteous judgment, because they had changed the glory of God into the similitude of a beast, that God gave them up to such vile affections that changed them into worse than beasts. God says of this that it was what he commanded them not. It never came into his heart to have children offered to him, yet they had forsaken his service for the service of such gods as showed themselves to be indeed enemies to mankind.

2. The destruction of Jerusalem speaks misery in general (v. 29), The Lord hath rejected and forsaken the generation of his wrath. Sin makes those the generation of God's wrath that had been the generation of his love. And God will reject those who have by their impenitence made themselves vessels of wrath fitted to destruction. "Verily, I say unto you, I know you not." (1) Death shall triumph over them, v. 32, 33. Tophet shall be called the valley of slaughter, for there multitudes shall be slain, when, in their attempts to escape, they fall into the hands of the besiegers. This valley of Tophet was a place where they sacrificed some of their children, and dedicated others to Moloch, and there they should fall as victims to divine justice. Tophet had formerly been the burying place, or burning place, of the dead bodies of the besiegers, and God will now turn it into a burying place for the besieged. So great shall that slaughter be that even the spacious valley of Tophet shall not be able to contain the slain; and at length there shall not be enough left alive to bury the dead, so that the carcases of the people shall be meat for the birds and beasts of prey, that shall feed upon them like carrion. Joy shall depart from them (v. 34): Then will I cause to cease the voice of mirth. It is threatened here that there shall be nothing to rejoice in. There shall be none of the joy of weddings; no mirth, for there shall be no marriages. Nor shall there be any more of the joy of harvest, for the land shall be desolate, uncultivated and unimproved. Both the cities of Judah and the streets of Jerusalem shall look melancholy.

CHAP. VIII

The prophet proceeds, in this chapter, to justify the destruction that God was bringing upon this people. I. He represents the judgments as so terrible that death should be desired, ver. 1–3. II. The wretched stupidity and wilfulness of this people brought this ruin upon them, ver. 4–12. III. He describes the great confusion and consternation that the whole land should be in, ver. 13–17. IV. The prophet is himself deeply affected, ver. 18–22.

Verses 1–3

These verses give a further description of the dreadful desolation which the army of the Chaldeans should make in the land.

I. Death shall not now be, as it always used to be—the repose of the dead. The ashes of the dead, even of kings and princes, shall be disturbed, and their bones scattered at the grave's mouth, Ps. cxli. 7. It was threatened in the close of the former chapter that the slain should be unburied, but here we find the graves of those that were buried maliciously opened by the enemy, who for covetousness, hoping to find treasure in the graves, brought out the bones of the kings of Judah and the princes. The dignity of their sepulchres could not secure them. The bones of the priests and prophets too were digged up and thrown about. The barbarous nations were sometimes guilty of these absurd and inhuman triumphs over those they had conquered. The bones, being dug out of the graves, were spread abroad upon the face of the earth in contempt. They shall be spread before the sun and before the moon and stars, even all the host of heaven, whom they have made idols of, v. 2. Before these lights of heaven, which they had courted, shall their dead bodies be cast, and left to putrefy.

II. Death shall now be what it never used to be—the choice of the living, not because there appears in it anything delightsome; yet everything in this world shall become so irksome, and all the prospects so black that death shall be chosen rather than life (v. 3); not in a believing hope of happiness in the other life, but in an utter despair of any ease in this life. These remain alive (and that is all) in the many places whither they were driven by the judgments of God, some prisoners in the country of their enemies, others beggars in their neighbour's country, and others fugitives and vagabonds in their own country.

Verses 4–12

The prophet here is instructed to set before this people the folly of their impenitence. They are here represented as senseless people that would not be made wise by all the methods that Infinite Wisdom took to bring them to themselves.

I. They would not attend to the dictates of reason. They would not act in the affairs of their souls with the same common prudence with which they acted in other things. Come, and let us reason together, saith the Lord (v. 4, 5): Shall men fall and not arise? If men happen to fall to the ground, to fall into the dirt, will they not get up again as fast as they can? Shall a man turn aside out of the right way? The most careful traveller may miss his way; but then, as soon as he is aware of it, will he not return? Thus men do in other things. Why then has this people of Jerusalem slidden back by a perpetual backsliding? Why do not they, when they have fallen into sin, hasten to get up again by repentance? Why do not they, when they see they have missed their way, correct their error and reform? Sin is a backsliding, it is going back from the right way, not only into a by-path, but into a contrary path, back from the way that leads to life to that which leads to destruction. The sinner not only wanders endlessly, but proceeds end-ways towards ruin. The tempter brings men to sin, and holds them fast in it, and they contribute to their own captivity: They hold fast deceit. The excuses they make for their sins are deceits, yet they will not be undeceived, and therefore they refuse to return.

II. They would not attend to the dictates of conscience, which is our reason reflecting upon ourselves and our own actions, v. 6. The prophet listened to see what effect his preaching had upon them; God himself listened, as one that desires not the death of sinners, that would have been glad to hear anything that promised repentance. These expectations were disappointed: They spoke not aright, as I thought they would have done. God did not find any repenting of the national wickedness, which might have helped to empty the measure of public guilt. They did not so much as take the first step towards repentance; they did not say, What have I done? They went on resolutely in their sins: Everyone turned to his course, as the horse rushes into the battle, scorning to be curbed.

III. They would not attend to the dictates of providence, nor understand the voice of God in them, v. 7. They apprehend not the meaning either of a mercy or an affliction. They know not how to improve the grace that God affords them when he sends them his prophets, nor how to make use of the rebukes when his voice cries in the city. There is sagacity in the inferior creatures. The stork in the heaven knows her appointed times; so do other season-birds, the turtle, the crane, and the swallow. These by a natural instinct change their quarters, as the temper of the air alters; they come when the spring comes, and go when the winter approaches, probably into warmer climates.

IV. They would not attend to the dictates of the written word. They say, We are wise; but how can they say so? (v. 8). They think they are wise because the law of the Lord is with them, the book of the law and the interpreters of it, Deut. iv. 6. But their pretensions are groundless for all this. They might as well have been without the law, unless they had made a better use of it. The pen of the scribes, of those that first wrote the law and of those that now write expositions of it, is in vain. But it might be said, They have some wise men among them. To this it is answered (v. 9): The wise men are ashamed that they have not made a better use of their wisdom, and lived more up to it. They are confounded and taken; all their wisdom has not served to keep them from those courses that tend to their ruin. They talk of their wisdom, but, Lo, they have rejected the word of the Lord. The pretenders to wisdom, who said, "We are wise and the law of the Lord is with us," were the priests and the false prophets; with them the prophet here deals plainly. Their families and estates shall be ruined (v. 10): Their wives shall be given to others, when they are taken captives, and their fields shall be taken from them by their victorious enemy and shall be given to those that shall inherit them. And (v. 12), notwithstanding all their pretensions to wisdom and sanctity, they shall fall among those that fall. In the time of their visitation, when the wickedness of the land comes to be enquired into, it will be found that they have contributed to it more than any. He gives a reason for these judgments (v. 10–12). They were greedy of the wealth of this world. The priests teach for hire and the prophets divine for money, Mic. iii. 11. Everyone deals falsely, looks one way and rows another. There is no such thing as sincerity among them. They flattered people in their sins, and pretended to be the physicians of the state, but knew not how to apply proper remedies; they healed them slightly, killed the patient with palliative cures, silencing their fears with, "Peace, peace, all is well, and there is no danger." They could not blush, so perfectly lost were they to all sense of virtue and honour.

Verses 13–22

I. God threatening the destruction of a sinful people. He has borne long with them, but they are still more and more provoking. They shall be stripped of all their comforts (v. 13): There shall be no grapes on the vine, nothing left them wherewith to make glad their hearts. It is expounded in the last clause: The things that I have given them shall pass away from them. Mercies abused are forfeited, and it is just with God to take the forfeiture. I will send serpents among you, the Chaldean army, fiery serpents. They shall not be charmed with music. These are serpents of another nature; they are as the deaf adder, that stops her ear, and will not hear the voice of the charmer.

II. The people sinking into despair under the pressure of those calamities. Those that were void of fear are void of hope now that it breaks in upon them, and have no heart either to make head against it or to bear up under it, v. 14. Why do we sit still here? Let us assemble, and go in a body into the defenced cities. Though they could expect no other than to be cut off there at last, yet not so soon as in the country, and therefore, "Let us go, and be silent there; let us attempt nothing, nor so much as make a complaint; for to what purpose?" It is a sullen silence.

1. They are sensible that God is angry with them: "The Lord our God has put us to silence, has struck us with astonishment, and given us water of gall to drink. Thou hast made us to drink the wine of astonishment. To what purpose is it to contend with our fate when God himself fights against us?" They seem to quarrel with God as if he had dealt hardly with them in not permitting them to speak for themselves. At length they begin to see the hand of God stretched out in the calamities, and to own that they have provoked him.

2. They are sensible that the enemy is likely to be too hard for them, v. 16. The snorting of the horses was heard from Dan, the report of the strength of their cavalry was soon carried all over and everybody trembled at the sound of the neighing of his steeds. They have come, and there is no opposing them; they have devoured the land and all that is in the city.

3. They are disappointed in their expectations of deliverance. We looked for peace, but no good came, no good news from abroad; we looked for a time of health and prosperity to our nation, but, behold, trouble, the alarms of war. Their false prophets had cried Peace, peace, to them. The deliverance did not come when they had long expected it (v. 20): The harvest is past, the summer is ended; that is, there is a great deal of time gone. Harvest and summer are parts of the year, so the meaning is, "One year passes after another, one campaign after another, and yet our affairs are as bad as ever; no relief comes. We are not saved." The season of action is over the summer and harvest are gone, and a cold and melancholy winter succeeds. They stand in their own light, and put a bar in their own door, and are not saved because they are not ready for salvation.

4. They are deceived in those things which they thought would have secured their peace to them (v. 19): The daughter of my people cries, cries aloud, because of those that dwell in a far country, because of the foreign enemy that comes from a far country to take possession of ours. Is not the Lord in Zion? Is not her king in her? These were the two things that they had all along depended upon, (1) That they had among them the temple of God, and the tokens of his special presence with them. (2) That they had the throne of the house of David. Is not Zion's king in her? And will not Zion's God protect Zion's king and his kingdom? This outcry of theirs reflects upon God, and therefore he returns an answer immediately: Why have they provoked me to anger with their graven images?

III. More of the lamentations of Jeremiah. He was an eye-witness of the desolations of his country: "My heart is faint in me (v. 18). When I would comfort myself against my sorrow every attempt to alleviate the grief does but aggravate it." Sometimes sorrow is such that the more it is repressed the more it recoils. This may be the case of very good men, as of the prophet here, whose soul refused to be comforted. He tells us (v. 21): "It is for the hurt of the daughter of my people that I am thus hurt; it is for their sin, and the miseries they have brought upon themselves that I am black, that I go in black as mourners do, and that astonishment has taken hold on me, so that I know not which way to turn." A gracious spirit will be a public spirit, a tender spirit, a mourning spirit. Jeremiah had prophesied the destruction of Jerusalem, and, though the truth of his prophecy was questioned, yet he did not rejoice in the proof of the truth of it, preferring the welfare of his country before his own reputation. How small his hopes were (v. 22): "Is there no balm in Gilead—no medicine proper for a sick and dying kingdom? Is there no physician there—no skilful faithful hand to apply the medicine?" This verse may be understood as laying all the blame of the incurableness of their disease upon themselves. The question must be answered affirmatively: Is there no balm in Gilead—no physician there? Yes, certainly there is; God is able to help and heal them. Gilead was a place in their own land, not far off. They had among themselves God's law and his prophets, with the help of which they might have been brought to repentance, and their ruin might have been prevented. They had princes and priests, whose business it was to reform the nation and redress their grievances. Why then was not their health restored? Certainly it was not for want of balm and a physician, but because they would not admit the application nor submit to the methods of cure. The physician and physic were both ready, but the patient was wilful and would not be tied to rules.

CHAP. IX

In this chapter the prophet goes on faithfully to reprove sin and to threaten God's judgments for it, and yet bitterly to lament both. I. He expresses his great grief for the miseries of Judah and Jerusalem, and his detestation of their sin, ver. 1–11. II. He justifies God in the destruction brought upon them, ver. 9–16. III. He calls upon others to bewail the woeful case, ver. 17–22. IV. He shows them the folly and vanity of trusting in their own strength or wisdom, or anything but God only, ver. 23–26.

Verses 1–11

The prophet commissioned to foretell the destruction and to point out the sin. What he said of both came from the heart, and one would have thought it would reach to the heart.

I. He abandons himself to sorrow in consideration of the calamitous condition of his people.

1. He laments the bloodshed and the lives lost (v. 1): "O that my head were waters, that so my eyes might be fountains of tears, still sending forth floods of tears as there still occur fresh occasions for them!" The same word in Hebrew signifies both the eye and a fountain, as if in this land of sorrows our eyes were designed rather for weeping than seeing. While we find our hearts such fountains of sin, it is fit that our eyes should be fountains of tears. But Jeremiah's grief here is upon the public account: he would weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of his people, the multitudes of his countrymen that fell by the sword of war. When we hear of the numbers of slain in great battles we ought to be much affected, for whatever people they are of, they are of the same human nature with us, and there are so many precious lives lost, as dear to them as ours to us.

2. He laments the desolations of the country. "Not only for the towns and cities, but for the mountains, will I take up a weeping and wailing" (the fruitful hills with which Judea abounded), and for the habitations of the wilderness, or rather the pastures of the plain, that used to be clothed with flocks or covered with corn, but now they are burnt up by the Chaldean army. Everything looks so melancholy for they hear not the voice of the cattle. The havoc war makes in a country cannot but be for a lamentation to all tender spirits, for it is a tragedy which destroys the stage it is acted on.

II. He abandons himself to solitude. While all his neighbours are fleeing to the defenced cities (ch. iv. 5, 6), he is contriving to retire into some desert, in detestation of his people's sin (v. 2): "O that I had in the wilderness a lodging-place of wayfaring men, such as they have in the deserts of Arabia, for travellers, that I might leave my people and go from them!" We must not go out of the world, bad as it is, before our time. If he could not do good to many, yet he might to some. But it made him weary of his life to see them dishonouring God and destroying themselves. Jeremiah, in the courts of God's house, wishes himself in a wilderness.

1. He would not think of leaving them because they were in distress, but because they were wicked. They were filthy: They are all adulterers, that is, the generality of them are, ch. v. 8. They were false. Those that had been unfaithful to their God were so to one another. Go to church, to court, or to the exchange—and they are an assembly of treacherous men. There they will cheat deliberately with a malicious design, for (v. 3) they bend their tongues, like their bow, for lies, with craft. Their tongue turns as naturally to a lie as the bow to the string. But they are not valiant for the truth upon the earth. They might do good service if they would use the art and resolution which they are so much masters of in the cause of truth; but they will not do so. Those that will be faithful to the truth must be valiant, and not daunted by opposition. We must answer, another day, not only for our enmity in opposing truth, but for our cowardice in defending it. They will cheat their own brethren (every brother will utterly supplant). Jacob had his name from supplanting; it is the word here used. Go into company and you will find there is nothing of sincerity or common honesty among them. No man thinks himself bound to be either grateful or sincere. Every neighbour will walk with slander; they care not what ill they say one of another, though ever so false; that way that the slander goes they will go; they will walk with it. They have taught their tongue to speak lies. They weary themselves to commit iniquity. They are wearied with their sinful pursuits and yet not weary of them. They grow worse and worse (v. 3): They proceed from evil to evil, from one degree of sin to another. No one reaches the height of vice at once. They began with equivocating, but at last came to downright lying.

2. The prophet shows what God had determined against them. God had marked their sin. He could tell the prophet what sort of people they were. So here (v. 6): "Thy habitation is in the midst of deceit, all about thee are addicted to it; therefore stand upon thy guard." This charge is enlarged upon, v. 8. Their tongue was a bow bent (v. 3), plotting and preparing mischief; here it is an arrow shot out. It is a slaying arrow (so some readings have it); their tongue has been to many an instrument of death. They speak peaceably to their neighbours, against whom they are at the same time lying in wait; as Joab kissed Abner when he was about to kill him. Fair words, when they are not attended with good intentions, are despicable, but, when they are intended as a cloak and cover for wicked intentions, they are abominable. Sinners might be taught the good knowledge of the Lord but they will not learn; and where no knowledge of God is, what good can be expected? Hos. iv. 1. God had marked them for ruin, v. 7, 9, 11. Those that will not know God as their lawgiver shall be made to know him as their judge. Some shall be refined (v. 7): "Because they are thus corrupt, behold, will melt them and try them, and see whether the furnace of affliction will purify them from their dross, and whether, when they are melted, they will be newcast in a better mould." They shall not be rejected as reprobate silver till the founder has melted in vain, ch. vi. 29, 30. He speaks as one that could not find in his heart to give them up to ruin till he had first tried all means likely to bring them to repentance. The rest shall be ruined (v. 9): Shall I not visit for these things? Fraud and falsehood are sins which God hates and which he will reckon for. The sentence is passed, the decree has gone forth (v. 11): I will make Jerusalem heaps of rubbish; it shall be fit for nothing but to be a den of dragons; and the cities of Judah shall be a desolation.

Two things the prophet designs, in these verses, with reference to the approaching destruction of Judah and Jerusalem: 1. To convince people of the justice of God in that they had by sin brought it upon themselves. 2. To affect people with the greatness of the desolation that by a terrible prospect of it they might be awakened to repentance and reformation.

I. He calls for the thinking men to show people the equity of God's proceedings, though they seemed harsh (v. 12): "Who, where, is the wise men, or the prophet, to whom the mouth of the Lord hath spoken? You boast of your wisdom, and of the prophets you have among you; produce one and he will soon understand that there is a just ground of God's controversy with this people." Do these wise men enquire, For what does the land perish? It used to be a land that God cared for, but it is now a land that he has forsaken. Wherefore has the Lord done thus unto this land? God here gives a full answer.

1. The indictment preferred against them, upon which they had been found guilty, v. 13, 14. (1) They have revolted from their allegiance to their rightful Sovereign. Therefore God has forsaken their land, because they have forsaken his law, and had not obeyed his voice, nor walked in the ways. (2) They have entered into the service of usurpers, have not only withdrawn themselves from their obedience to their prince, but have taken up arms against him. They have set up their own will, the wills of the flesh, and the carnal mind, in contradiction to the will of God: They have walked after the imagination of their own hearts; they would do as they pleased, whatever God and conscience said to the contrary. They have walked after Baalim: the word is plural; they had many Baals, Baal-peor and Baal-berith, the Baal of this place and the Baal of the other place; for they had lords many, which their fathers taught them to worship, but which the God of their fathers had again and again forbidden. This was why the land perished.

2. The sentence upon the convicted rebels must now be executed: The Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, hath said it (v. 15, 16), and who can reverse it? Their comforts at home shall be poisoned and embittered to them: I will feed this people with wormwood (or rather with wolf's-bane, some herb that is both nauseous and noxious), and I will give them water of gall (or juice of hemlock or some other herb that is poisonous) to drink. Everything about them shall be a terror to them. God will curse their blessings, Mal. ii. 2. Their dispersion abroad shall be their destruction (v. 16): I will scatter them among the heathen. They shall lose themselves, where they lost their virtue, among the heathen; they had violated that truth which is the bond and cement of society and commerce, and therefore are justly crumbled to dust and scattered among the heathen. And now we see for what the land perishes; all this desolation is the desert of their deeds.

II. He calls for the mourning women to lament these sad calamities that had come or were coming upon them, that the nation might prepare for them: The Lord of hosts himself says, Call for the mourning women, that they may come, v. 17. Here is work for the counterfeit mourners: Send for the cunning women, that are made use of at funerals to supply the want of true mourners. Let these take up a wailing for us, v. 18. Or, rather, it intimates the extreme stupidity of the people, that laid not to heart the judgments. God sent his mourning prophets to them, to call them to mourning, but his word in their mouths did not work upon their faith; rather therefore than they shall go laughing to their ruin, let the mourning women come. Here is work for the real mourners. The present scene is very tragical (v. 19): A voice of wailing is heard out of Zion. Some make this to be the song of the mourning women: it is rather an echo to it, returned by those whose affections were moved by their wailings. In Zion the voice of joy and praise used to be heard, while the people kept closely to God. But sin has altered the note; it is now the voice of lamentation. We are confounded because we have forsaken the land (forced so to do by the enemy), not because we have forsaken the Lord, being drawn aside of our own lust and enticed—because our dwellings have cast us out, not because our God has cast us off. Thus unhumbled hearts lament their calamity, but not their iniquity, the cause of it. Those whose land has spewed them out (as it did their predecessors the Canaanites, and justly, because they trod in their steps, Lev. xviii. 28) complain that they are driven into the city, but, after a while, those of the city, and they with them, shall be forced thence too: Yet hear the word of the Lord (v. 20); let the women hear it, for the men will not heed it, will not give it a patient hearing. The prophets will be glad to preach to a congregation of women that tremble at God's word. Let the women teach their daughters wailing. Let everyone teach her neighbour lamentation; this intimates that the trouble shall spread far, shall go from house to house. The judgment here threatened is made to look terrible. Multitudes shall be slain, v. 21. Death shall ride in triumph, and there shall be no escaping his arrest. Nor does it attack the cottages only, but it has entered into our palaces. Those that are slain shall be left unburied (v. 22).

Verses 23–26

The prophet had been endeavouring to possess this people with a holy fear of God and his judgments, but still they had recourse to some sorry subterfuge or other with which to excuse themselves in their obstinacy. He therefore sets himself here to drive them from these refuges of lies.

I. When they were told how inevitable the judgment would be they pleaded the defence of their politics and powers, which, with their wealth and treasure, they thought made their city impregnable. In answer to this he shows them the folly of trusting to these stays, while they have not a God in covenant, v. 23, 24. Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom as if with the help of that he could find out some evasion or other. But, if a man's policies fail him, yet surely he may gain his point by might and dint of courage. No: Let not the strong man glory in his strength, for the battle is not always to the strong. David the stripling proves too hard for Goliath the giant. All human force is nothing without God, worse than nothing against him. But may not the rich man's wealth be his strong city? (money answers all things) No: Let not the rich man glory in his riches, as if they could make their part good against the Chaldeans because they have wise men to advise concerning the war, mighty men to fight their battles, and rich men to bear the charges of the war. Our only comfort in trouble will be that we have done our duty. Those that refused to know God (v. 6) will boast in vain of their wisdom and wealth; but those that know God, intelligently, that understand aright that he is the Lord, may glory in this, it will be their rejoicing in the day of evil. Our only confidence in trouble will be that, having through grace in some measure done our duty, we shall find God a God all-sufficient to us. We may glory in this, that, wherever we are, we have acquaintance with a God that exercises lovingkindness, and judgment, and righteousness in the earth, that is just to all his creatures, kind to all his children and will protect them and provide for them. The God they thus faithfully conform to they may cheerfully confide in, in their greatest straits. But the prophet intimates that the generality of this people took no care about this.

II. When they were told how provoking their sins were to God they vainly pleaded the covenant of their circumcision. They were undoubtedly the people of God; they had the mark of his children in their flesh. To this the prophet answers, God would punish all wicked people, without making any distinction between the circumcised and uncircumcised, v. 25, 26. They had lived in common with the uncircumcised nations, and so had forfeited the benefit of that peculiarity. The Judge of all the earth is impartial, and none shall fare the better at his bar for any external advantages. The condemnation of impenitent sinners that are baptized will be as sure as that of impenitent sinners that are unbaptized. Those in the utmost corners, that dwell in the wilderness, are supposed to be the Kedarenes and those of the kingdoms of Hazor, as appears by comparing ch. xlix. 28–32. Some think they are so called because they dwelt as it were in a corner of the world, others because they had the hair of their head polled into corners. However that was, they were uncircumcised in flesh, and the Jews are ranked with them; for all the house of Israel are uncircumcised in the heart; they have the sign, but not the thing signified, ch. iv. 4.

CHAP. X

The prophecy of this chapter has a double reference: I. To those that were carried away into the land of the Chaldeans, notorious for idolatry and superstition; and they are here cautioned not to learn the way of the heathen (ver. 1, 2), for their astrology and idolatry are both foolish things (ver. 3–5), and the worshippers of idols brutish, ver. 8, 9. So it will appear in the day of their visitation, ver. 14, 15. They are likewise exhorted to adhere firmly to the God of Israel, for there is none like him, ver. 6, 7. He is the true God and has the government of the world (ver. 10–13), and his people are happy in him, ver. 16. II. To those that yet remained in their own land. They are cautioned against security (ver. 17, 18) and a foreign enemy, which God would bring upon them for their sin, ver. 20–22. This calamity the prophet laments (ver. 19) and prays for the mitigation of it, ver. 23–25.

Verses 1–16

The prophet Jeremiah here arms people against the idolatrous usages of the heathen, that being convinced and reclaimed, by the word of God, the rod might be prevented; and it is written for our learning.

I. A solemn charge given to the people of God not to conform themselves to the ways of the heathen. Let Israel hear this word from the God of Israel: "Learn not the way of the heathen, do not approve of it, nor think indifferently concerning it. Let not any of their customs steal in among you nor mingle themselves with your religion." It was the way of the heathen to worship the host of heaven, the sun, moon, and stars; to them they gave divine honours, and from them they expected divine favours. Now God would not have his people to be dismayed at the signs of heaven, to reverence the stars as deities, nor to frighten themselves with any prognostications grounded upon them. Let them fear the God of heaven, and then they need not be dismayed at the signs of heaven, for the stars in their courses fight not against any that are at peace with God.

II. Good reasons given to enforce this charge.

1. The way of the heathen is absurd, and is condemned by the dictates of right reason, v. 3. The statutes and ordinances of the heathen are vanity. The Chaldeans valued themselves upon their wisdom, in which they thought that they excelled all their neighbours; but the prophet here shows that they, and all others that worshipped idols and expected help from them, had not common sense. Consider what the idol is that is worshipped. It was a tree cut out of the forest originally. It was fitted up by the hands of the workmen, squared, and sawed, and worked into shape; see Isa. xliv. 12, &c. But, after all, it was but the stock of a tree, fitter to make a gate-post of than anything else. But, to hide the wood, they deck it with silver and gold. They fasten it to its place with nails and hammers, that it fall not, nor is stolen, v. 4. The image is made straight enough; the workman did his part; it is upright as the palm-tree (v. 5); it looks stately, and stands up as if it were going to speak to you, but it cannot speak; nor can it take one step towards your relief. If there be any occasion for it to shift its place, it must be carried in procession, for it cannot go. Be not afraid of incurring their displeasure, for they can do no evil; be not afraid of forfeiting their favour, for neither is it in them to do good. Idols of gold and silver are as unworthy to be worshipped as wooden gods. The stock is a doctrine of vanities, v. 8. It teaches lies, teaches lies concerning God. It is an instruction of vanities; it is wood. A great deal of art is used, and pains taken, about it. They are not ordinary mechanics that are employed about these as about the wooden gods, v. 3. These are cunning men; it is the work of the workman; the graver must do his part when it has passed through the hands of the founder. And, that these gods might be reverenced as kings, blue and purple are their clothing, the colour of royal robes (v. 9). For what is the idol when it is made and when they have made the best they can of it? (v. 14): They are falsehood; they are not what they pretend to be. They are worshipped as the gods that give us breath and life and sense, whereas they are lifeless senseless things themselves, and there is no breath in them; there is no spirit in them, they are not animated, as they are supposed to be, by any divine spirit or numen—divinity. They have not so much as the spirit of a beast that goes downward. They are vanity, and the work of errors, v. 15. They are the creatures of a deluded fancy. The idolaters that worship these idols (v. 8), are altogether brutish and foolish. Though in the works of creation they cannot but see the eternal power and godhead of the Creator, yet they have become vain in their imaginations, not liking to retain God in their knowledge. See Rom. i. 21, 28.

2. The God of Israel is the one only living and true God; to set up any other in competition with him is the greatest affront that can be done him. The prophet turns from speaking with the utmost disdain of the idols of the heathen to speak with the most profound and awful reverence of the God of Israel (v. 6, 7). What is the glory of a man that invented a useful art or founded a flourishing kingdom (and these were grounds sufficient among the heathen to entitle a man to an apotheosis) compared with the glory of him that is the Creator of the world and that forms the spirit of man within him? What is the glory of the greatest prince or potentate, compared with the glory of him whose kingdom rules over all? He acknowledges (v. 6), O Lord! thou art great, infinite and immense, and thy name is great in might. It is not only the house of Israel that is bound to worship the great Jehovah as the God of Israel, but all the families of the earth are bound to worship him as King of nations. His verity is as evident as the idol's vanity, v. 10. They are the work of men's hands, and the God of truth is God in truth. He is the living God. He is life itself, has life in himself, and is the fountain of life to all the creatures. The gods of the heathen are dead things, but ours is a living God and hath immortality. He is an everlasting king, a King of eternity. Though the nations should join together they would be utterly unable to resist, or even to abide his indignation. He is the God of nature, the fountain of all being; and all the powers of nature are at his command, v. 12, 13. If we look back, we find that the whole world owed its origin to him as its first cause. It was a common saying even among the Greeks—He that sets up to be another god ought first to make another world. God made us and all things. The earth has valuable treasures in its bowels and more valuable fruit on its surface. It and them he has made by his power; and it is by no less than an infinite power that it hangs upon nothing. The habitable part of the earth is admirably fitted for the use and service of man, and he hath established it so by his wisdom. The heavens are wonderfully stretched out by his discretion and that the motions of the heavenly bodies are directed for the benefit of this lower world. These declare his glory (Ps. xix. 1), and oblige us to declare it, and not give that glory to the heavens which is due to him that made them. If we look up, we see his providence to be a continued creation (v. 13): When he uttereth his voice there is a multitude of waters in the heavens, which are poured out on the earth. He causes the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth. All the earth pays the tribute of vapours, because all the earth receives the blessing of rain. And thus the moisture in the universe, like the money in a kingdom and the blood in the body, is continually circulating for the good of the whole. There is no sort of weather but what furnishes us with a proof and instance of the wisdom and power of the great Creator. This God is Israel's God in covenant. Therefore let the house of Israel cleave to him, and not forsake him to embrace idols; for (v. 16) the portion of Jacob is not like them; their rock is not as our rock (Deut. xxxii. 31), nor ours like their molehills. If we have satisfaction in God as our portion, he will have a gracious delight in us as his people, whom he owns as the rod of his inheritance, with whom he dwells and by whom he is served and honoured. It is the unspeakable comfort of all the Lord's people that he who is their God is the former of all things.

3. The prophet, having thus compared the gods of the heathen with the God of Israel, reads the doom of all those pretenders, and directs the Jews, in God's name, to read it to the worshippers of idols (v. 11): Thus shall you say unto them, The gods which have not made the heavens and the earth shall perish. The primitive Christians would say, when they were urged to worship such a god, Let him make a world and he shall be my god. When God comes to reckon with idolaters he will make them weary of their idols, and glad to be rid of them. They shall cast them to the moles and to the bats, Isa. ii. 20.

Verses 17–25

I. The prophet threatens, in God's name, the approaching ruin of Judah and Jerusalem, v. 17, 18.

The Jews that continued in their own land, after some were carried into captivity, were very secure; they thought themselves inhabitants of a fortress; their country was their stronghold, impregnable; but they must prepare to go after their brethren, and pack up their effects in expectation: "Gather up thy wares out of the land; contract your affairs, and bring them into as small a compass as you can." Let not what you have lie scattered, for the Chaldeans will be upon you again, to be the executioners of the sentence God has passed upon you (v. 18): "Behold, I will sling out the inhabitants of the land at this once; they have hitherto dropped out, by a few at a time, but they shall be slung out as a stone out of a sling. They shall be thrown out with violence a great distance off, in a little time." He adds, And I will distress them, that they may find it so. Whithersoever they go, they shall be continually perplexed and straitened, that they may feel that which they would not believe. They were told that their sin would be their ruin, but now they shall find it so.

II. He brings in the people sadly lamenting their calamities (v. 19): Woe is me for my hurt! Some make this the prophet's own lamentation, not for himself, but for the calamities and desolations of his country. But it may be taken as the language of the people, considered as a body, and therefore speaking as a single person. The prophet puts into their mouths the words they should say; whether they would say them or no, they should have cause to say them. "Woe is me for my hurt, not for what I fear, but for what I feel." Nor is it a slight hurt, but a wound that is grievous. To what purpose is it to complain? This is a grief, and I must bear it as well as I can. This is patience per force, not a patience by principle. To say, "This is an evil, and I must bear it, because I cannot help it," argues a want of those good thoughts of God which we should always have, even under our afflictions, saying, not only, God can and will do what he pleases, but, Let him do what he pleases. The country was wasted (v. 20): My tabernacle is spoiled. Jerusalem, though a strong city, now proves weak: their government is dissolved, and their state has fallen to pieces. Their church is ruined, and all the supports of it fail. It was a general destruction of church and state, city and country, and there were none to repair these desolations. "My children have gone forth of me; some have fled, others are slain, others carried into captivity, so that they are not; for there is none to stretch forth my tent any more, none of my children to do me any service." The rulers took no proper measures for the re-establishing of their ruined state (v. 21): The pastors have become brutish. When the tents, the shepherds' tents, were spoiled (v. 20), it concerned the shepherds to look after them; but they were foolish shepherds. Their kings and princes had no regard at all for the public welfare. The priests, the pastors of God's tabernacle, did a great deal towards the ruin of religion, but nothing towards the repair of it. They neither acknowledged the judgment, nor expected the deliverance, to come from his hand. Therefore they shall not prosper; none of their attempts for the public safety shall succeed. Those cannot expect to prosper who do not by faith and prayer take God along with them in all their ways. The report of the enemy's approach was dreadful (v. 22): The noise of the bruit has come, of the report which at first was but whispered abroad, as wanting confirmation. It now proves too true: A great commotion arises out of the north country, which threatens to make all the cities of Judah desolate and a den of dragons; for they must all expect to be sacrificed to the avarice and fury of the Chaldean army.

III. He turns to God, and addresses himself to him, finding it too little purpose to speak to the people.

1. The prophet here acknowledges the sovereignty and dominion of the divine Providence, v. 23. We are not at our own disposal, but under a divine direction; the event is often overruled so as to be quite contrary to our expectation. Some think that the way of the Chaldean army being not in themselves, they can do no more than God permits them; he can set bounds to these proud waves, and say, Hitherto they shall come, and no further.

2. He deprecates the divine wrath, that it might not fall upon God's Israel, v. 24. He speaks not for himself only, but on behalf of his people: O Lord, correct me, but with judgment (no more than is necessary for the driving out of the foolishness that is bound up in our hearts), not in thy anger, let it come from thy love, and be made to work for good, not to bring us to nothing, but to bring us home to thyself. Let it not be according to the desert of our sins, but according to the designs of thy grace. We cannot pray in faith that we may never be corrected, while we are conscious to ourselves that we need correction and deserve it, and know that as many as God loves he chastens.

3. He imprecates the divine wrath against the persecutors of Israel (v. 25): Pour out thy fury upon the heathen that know thee not. This prayer does not come from a spirit of malice or revenge. It is an appeal to his justice. As if he had said, "Lord, we are a provoking people; but are there not other nations that are more so? We are thy children, and may expect a fatherly correction; but they are thy enemies, and against them thy indignation should be, not against us." The heathen are strangers to God, and are content to be so. They know him not, nor desire to know him. They live without prayer, have nothing of religion among them; they call not on God's name. They are persecutors of the people of God. They have eaten up Jacob with as much greediness as those that are hungry eat their necessary food; they have devoured him, and consumed him, and made his habitation desolate, that is, the land in which he lives, or the temple of God, which is his habitation among them.

CHAP. XI

I. God by the prophet puts the people in mind of the covenant he had made with their fathers, ver. 1–7. II. He charges it upon them that they had obstinately refused to obey him, ver. 8–10. III. He threatens to punish them with utter ruin for their disobedience (ver. 11, 13); he tells them that their idols should not save them (ver. 12), that their prophets should not pray for them (ver 14); he justifies his proceedings, they having brought all this mischief upon themselves, ver. 15–17. IV. Here is an account of a conspiracy formed against Jeremiah by his fellow-citizens, the men of Anathoth; God's discovery of it to him (ver. 18, 19), his prayer against them (ver. 20), and a prediction of God's judgments upon them for it, ver. 21–23.

Verses 1–10

The prophet draws up an indictment against the Jews for wilful disobedience to the commands of their rightful Sovereign.

I. God commanded him to speak it to the men of Judah, v. 1, 2. In the original it is plural: Speak you this. For what he said to Jeremiah was the same that he gave in charge to all his servants the prophets. They none of them said any other than what Moses, in the law, had said; to that therefore they must direct the people: "Hear the words of this covenant; be judged by them." Jeremiah must now proclaim this in the cities of Judah and the streets of Jerusalem, that all may hear, for all are concerned. Then, by comparing yourselves with the covenant, you will soon be aware upon what terms you now stand with him.

II. He opens the charter upon which their state was founded and by which they held their privileges. They had forgotten the tenor of it, and lived as if they thought that they might do what they pleased and yet have what God had promised, or as if they thought that the keeping up of the ceremonial observances was all that God required of them. He therefore shows them that the thing God insisted upon was obedience, which was better than sacrifice. He said, Obey my voice, v. 4, and again v. 7. "Own God for your Master. Do my commandments, but according to all which I command you; make conscience of moral duties especially, and rest not in those that are merely ritual; hear the words of the covenant, and do them." This was the original contract between God and them, when he first formed them into a people. It was what he commanded their fathers when he first brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, v. 4 and again v. 7. He redeemed them out of the service of the Egyptians, which was perfect slavery, that he might take them into his own service, which is perfect freedom, Luke i. 74, 75. This was made the condition of the relation between them and God: "So shall you be my people and I will be your God; I will own you for mine, and you may call upon me as yours." It was upon these terms that the land of Canaan was given them for a possession: Obey my voice, that I may perform the oath sworn to your fathers, to give them a land flowing with milk and honey, v. 5. Cursed be the man, though it were but a single person, that obeys not the words of this covenant, much more when it is the body of the nation that rebels. Lest this covenant should be forgotten God had from time to time called to them to remember it by his servants the prophets. This covenant was consented to (v. 5): Then answered I, and said, So be it, O Lord! These are the words of the prophet, expressing either, his own consent to the covenant for himself, and his desire to have the benefit of it. Or, his good will that his people might have the benefit of it. Or, his people's consent to the covenant: "Then answered I, in the name of the people, So be it."

III. He charges them with breach of covenant, such a breach as amounted to a forfeiture of their charter, v. 8. "Obey my voice, do as you are bidden, and all shall be well"; yet they obeyed not. They walked everyone in the imagination of their evil heart; every man did as his fancy and humour led him, right or wrong, lawful or unlawful, both in their devotions and in their conversations; see ch. vii. 24. What then could they expect, but to fall under the curse of the covenant? That which aggravated their defection from God was that it was general, and as it were by consent, v. 9, 10. Jeremiah himself saw that many lived in open disobedience to God, but the Lord told him that the matter was worse than he thought: A conspiracy is found among them. There is a combination against God and religion, a dangerous design formed to overthrow God's government and bring in the counterfeit deities. They designed to overthrow divine revelation, and persuade people not to hear, not to heed, the words of God. Human reason shall be their god, a light within their god, an infallible judge their god, saints and angels their gods, the god of this or the other nation shall be theirs; thus, under several disguises, they are in the same confederacy against the Lord and against his anointed. The inhabitants of Jerusalem are in conspiracy with the men of Judah. Those of this generation seem to be in conspiracy with those of the foregoing generation, to carry on the war from age to age against religion. Judah and Israel, the kingdom of the ten tribes and that of the two, that were often at daggers-drawing one with another, were yet in a conspiracy to break the covenant God had made with their fathers, even with the heads of all the twelve tribes. The house of Israel began the revolt, but the house of Judah soon came into the conspiracy.

Verses 11–17

This paragraph contains much of God's wrath. Therefore I will bring evil upon them (v. 11), the evil of punishment for the evil of sin.

I. They cannot help themselves. It is evil which they shall not be able to escape, or to go forth out of, by any evasion whatsoever.

II. Their God will not help them; Though they shall cry unto me, I will not hearken unto them. For he has plainly told us that he that turns away his ears from hearing the law, as they did, for they inclined not their ear (v. 8), even his prayer shall be an abomination to him.

III. Their idols shall not help them, v. 12. They shall go, and cry to the gods to whom they now offer incense. They shall not save them at all. It is God only that is a friend at need, a present powerful help in time of trouble. If the idols could have done any real kindness to their worshippers, they would have done it for this people, who had multiplied them according to the number of their cities (v. 13), nay, in Jerusalem, according to the number of their streets.

IV. Jeremiah's prayers shall not help them, v. 14. God would give no encouragement to the prophets to pray for them, not for the body of the people, but for the remnant among them, to pray for their eternal salvation, not for their deliverance from the temporal judgments.

V. The profession they make of religion shall stand them in no stead, v. 15. Once they had a place in God's house; they partook of God's altar; they ate of the flesh of their peace-offerings, here called the holy flesh. What harm could come to those who were God's beloved, who were under the protection of his house? Even when they did evil yet they rejoiced and gloried in this, but their confidence would deceive them, they themselves having forfeited the privileges. They have wrought lewdness with many, have worshipped many idols; and therefore, God's temple will yield them no protection. God's altar will yield them no satisfaction: "The holy flesh has passed from thee, that is, an end will soon be put to thy sacrifices, when the temple shall be laid in ruins; and where then will the holy flesh be, that thou art so proud of?" A holy heart will be a comfort to us when the holy flesh has passed from us; an inward principle of grace will make up the want of the outward means of grace. But woe unto us if the departure of the holy flesh be accompanied with the departure of the Holy Spirit.

VI. God's former favours to them shall stand them in no stead, v. 16, 17. God had called Israel's name a green olive-tree, and had made them so, he had planted them (v. 17), had formed them into a people, with all the advantages they could have to make them a fruitful and flourishing people, so good was their law and so good was their land. He had planted them a green olive, a good olive, but they had degenerated into a wild olive, Rom. xi. 17. Both the house of Israel and the house of Judah had done evil, had provoked God to anger in burning incense unto Baal, setting up other mediators besides the promised Messiah. He that planted this green olive-tree, and expected fruit from it, finding it barren and grown wild, has kindled fire upon it, to burn it as it stands; for, being without fruit, it is twice dead, plucked up by the roots (Jude 12), it is cut down and cast into the fire. The branches of it, the high and lofty boughs (so the word signifies), are broken down, both princes and priests cut off. And thus it proves that the evil done against God is really done against their own souls.

Verses 18–23

The prophet Jeremiah has much in his writings concerning himself, the times he lived in being very troublesome. Here we have the beginning of his sorrows, which arose from the people of his own city, Anathoth, a priest's city.

I. Their plot against him, v. 19. They devised devices against him, laid their heads together to contrive how they might be the death of him. They said concerning Jeremiah, Let us destroy the tree with the fruit thereof—a proverbial expression, meaning, "Let us utterly destroy him root and branch." Or rather "both the prophet and the prophecy; let us kill the one and defeat the other. Let us sink his reputation, and so spoil the credit of his predictions." The persecutors of God's prophets hunt for no less than the precious life. They thought to put an end to his days, but he survived most of his enemies; they thought to blast his memory, but it lives to this day, and will while time lasts.

II. The information which God gave him of this conspiracy. He knew nothing of it himself, so artfully had they concealed it; he came to Anathoth fearing no harm, like a lamb or an ox, that thinks he is driven as usual to the field, when he is brought to the slaughter. There is but a step between Jeremiah and death; but then the Lord gave him knowledge of it, by dream or vision, or impression upon his spirit, that he might save himself, as the king of Israel did upon the notice Elisha gave him, 2 Kings vi. 10. Thus he came to know it. God showed him their doings. See what care God takes of his prophets: He suffers no man to do them wrong; all the rage of their enemies cannot prevail to take them off till they have finished their testimony.

III. His appeal to God hereupon, v. 20. When men deal unjustly with us we have a God to go to who will plead the cause of injured innocency and appear against the injurious. God's justice, which is a terror to the wicked, is a comfort to the godly. He knew the integrity that was in Jeremiah's heart, and knew the wickedness that was in their hearts, though ever so cunningly concealed. Now Jeremiah prays judgment against them: "Let me see thy vengeance on them, that is, do justice between me and them in such a way as thou pleasest." Some think there was something of human frailty in this prayer; at least Christ has taught us another lesson, both by precept and by pattern, which is to pray for our persecutors. He refers his cause entirely to the judgment of God: "Unto thee have I revealed my cause; not desiring nor expecting to interest any other in it." When we are wronged, we have a God to commit our cause to, with a resolution to acquiesce in his definitive sentence, to subscribe, and not prescribe, to him.

IV. Judgment given against his persecutors, the men of Anathoth. It was to no purpose for him to appeal to the courts at Jerusalem; the priests there would stand by the priests at Anathoth, but God will therefore take cognizance of the cause himself, and we are sure that his judgment is according to truth. They sought the prophet's life, for they forbad him to prophesy upon pain of death; they were resolved either to silence him or to slay him. The provocation he gave them was his prophesying in the name of the Lord, and not prophesying such smooth things as they always bespoke. It is as bad to God's faithful ministers to have their mouth stopped as to have their breath stopped. It used to be said that a prophet could not perish but at Jerusalem, for there the great council sat; but so bitter were the men of Anathoth against Jeremiah that they would undertake to be the death of him themselves. The sentence passed upon them for this crime, v. 22, 23: God says, I will punish them; I will visit this upon them; so the word is. The sword shall devour their young men, though they were young priests, and famine shall destroy the sons and daughters. They sought Jeremiah's life, they would destroy him root and branch, that his name might be no more remembered, and therefore there shall be no remnant of them left.

CHAP. XII

I. The success that wicked people had in their wicked practices (ver. 1, 2) and his appeal to God concerning his own integrity (ver. 3), with a prayer that God would bring the wickedness to an end, ver. 3, 4. II. God's rebuke to the prophet for his uneasiness at his present troubles, ver. 5, 6 III. A sad lamentation of the present deplorable state of the Israel of God, ver 7–13. IV. An intimation of mercy to God's people, in a denunciation of wrath against their neighbours, but with a promise that if they would at last join themselves with the people of God they should come in sharers in their privileges, ver. 14–17.

Verses 1–6

The prophet doubts not but it would be of use to others to know what had passed between God and his soul, and therefore he here tells us,

I. What liberty he humbly took to reason with God concerning his judgments, v. 1. He is about to plead with God, not to find fault with his proceedings, but to enquire into the meaning of them. We may not strive with our Maker, but we may reason with him. When we are most in the dark concerning the meaning of God's dispensations we must still resolve to keep up right thoughts of God, that he never did, nor ever will do, the least wrong to any of his creatures. When we find it hard to understand particular providences we must have recourse to general truths as our first principles, and abide by them; however dark the providence may be, the Lord is righteous; see Ps. lxxiii. 1.

II. What it was in the dispensations of divine Providence that he stumbled at. The designs and projects of wicked people seem successful: The way of the wicked prospers; they compass their malicious designs. Hypocrites are chiefly meant (as appears, v. 2), who dissemble and depart from their good beginnings, deal treacherously, yet they are happy. The prophet shows (v. 2) God had been indulgent to them: "They are planted in a good land, a land flowing with milk and honey, and thou hast planted them! nay, thou didst cast out the heathen to plant them," Ps. xliv. 2; lxxx. 8. They have taken root; their prosperity seems to be confirmed and settled. God had favoured them, though they had dealt treacherously with him: Thou art near in their mouth and far from their reins. Though they cared not for thinking of God, nor had any sincere affection to him, yet they could easily persuade themselves to speak of him with an air of seriousness. Piety from the teeth outward is no difficult thing. Though they had the name of God ready in their mouth, and those forms of speech that savoured of piety, yet they could not keep the fear of God in their hearts.

III. What comfort he had in appealing to God concerning his own integrity (v. 3): But thou, O Lord! knowest me. God knew he was not a deceiver and false prophet; those that thus abused him did not know him, 1 Cor. ii. 8. We are as our hearts are, and our hearts are good or bad according as they are, or are not, towards God.

IV. He prays that God would turn his hand against these wicked people, and not suffer them to prosper always, though they had prospered long: "Let some judgment come to pull them out of this fat pasture as sheep for the slaughter, that it may appear their long prosperity was but like the feeding of lambs to prepare them for the day of slaughter," Hos. iv. 16. God suffered them to prosper that by their pride and luxury they might fill up the measure of their iniquity and so be ripened for destruction. "How long shall the land mourn for the wickedness of those that dwell therein? Lord, shall those prosper themselves that ruin all about them?" The herbs of every field wither (the grass is burnt up). The beasts are consumed.

This was the effect of a long drought which happened at the latter end of Josiah's reign and the beginning of Jehoiakim's; ch. iii. 3, viii. 13, ix. 10, 12; ch. xiv. Now why was it that this fruitful land was turned into barrenness for the wickedness of those that dwelt therein? Therefore the prophet prays that these wicked people might die for their own sin, and that the whole nation might not suffer for it. They said, He shall not see our last end, either, 1. God himself shall not. He knows not what way we take nor what it will end in. Or, 2. Jeremiah shall not see our last end. They look upon him as a false prophet.

V. He acquaints us with the answer God gave to those complaints of his, v. 5, 6. Ministers have lessons to learn as well as lessons to teach, and must themselves hear God's voice and preach to themselves. Jeremiah complained of the wickedness of the men of Anathoth, and that they prospered. Now this seems to be an answer to that complaint. 1. It is allowed that he had cause to complain (v. 6): "Thy brethren, the priests of Anathoth, of the house of thy father, even they have dealt treacherously with thee, and, under colour of friendship, have done thee all the mischief they could; they have called a multitude after thee, raised the mob upon thee, to whom they have endeavoured to render thee despicable. They are indeed such as thou canst not believe, though they speak fair words to thee. They seem to be thy friends, but are really thy enemies." 2. Yet he is told that he laid the unkindness of his countrymen too much to heart. They wearied him, because it was in a land of peace wherein he trusted, v. 5. It was very grievous to him to be thus hated and abused by his own kindred. He was disturbed in his mind by it. He was discouraged in his work by it, began to be weary of prophesying, and to think of giving it up. He did not see this was but the beginning of his sorrow, and that he had sorer trials yet before him; and, whereas he should, by a patient bearing of this trouble, prepare himself for greater, by his uneasiness he did but unfit himself for what lay before him: If thou hast run with the footmen and they have wearied thee, and run thee quite out of breath, then how wilt thou contend with horses? If the injuries done him by the men of Anathoth made such an impression upon him, what would he do when the princes and chief priests at Jerusalem should set upon him with their power, ch. xx. 2; xxxii. 2. If he was so soon tired in a land of peace, where there was little peril, what would he do in the swellings of Jordan, when that overflows all its banks and frightens even lions out of their thickets? (ch. xlix. 19). How shall we preserve our integrity and peace when we come to the swellings of Jordan? We must approve ourselves well in present smaller trials, keep up our spirits, keep hold of the promise, with our eye upon the prize, and so run that we may obtain it.

Verses 7–13

The people of the Jews are here marked for ruin.

I. It is a terrible word that God here says (v. 7): I have forsaken my house—the temple, his palace; they had polluted it, and so forced him out of it: I have left my heritage, and will look after it no more. If they would have conducted themselves with propriety, he would have made the best of them, for they were the beloved of his soul; but they had provoked him to give them into the hand of their enemies. They had degenerated, had become like beasts of prey, which nobody loves, but everybody avoids (v. 8): My heritage is unto me as a lion in the forest. They cry out against God in the threatenings they breathe against his prophets that speak to them in his name. They blaspheme his name, oppose his authority, and bid defiance to his justice, and so cry out against him as a lion in the forest. Those that were the sheep of God's pasture had become barbarous and ravenous, and as ungovernable as lions in the forest; therefore he hated them; for what delight could the God of love take in people that had become as roaring lions and raging beasts, a vexation to all about them? They had become like birds of prey, unworthy a place in God's house, where neither beasts nor birds of prey were admitted to be offered in sacrifice (v. 9): My heritage is unto me as a bird with talons (so some read it, and so the margin); they have by their unnatural contentions made their country a cock-pit. Or as a speckled bird, sprinkled, or bedewed with the blood of her prey. The birds round about are against her. Some made her a speckled bird, upon account of their mixing the superstitious usages of the heathen with divine institutions in the worship of God; they were fond of a party-coloured religion.

II. The enemies will fall upon them and lay them desolate. And some think it is upon this account that they are compared to a speckled bird, because fowls usually make a noise about a bird of an odd unusual colour. God's people are, among the children of this world, as men wondered at, as a speckled bird; but this people had by their own folly made themselves so. Let all the birds round be against her, for God has forsaken her. The utter desolation of the land by the Chaldean army is here spoken of as a thing done, so near was it. God speaks of it as a thing which he had no pleasure in, any more than in the death of other sinners.

1. See with what a tender affection he speaks of this land, notwithstanding the sinfulness of it, in remembrance of his covenant: It is my vineyard, my portion, my pleasant portion, v. 10. Note, God has a kindness and concern for his church, though there be much amiss in it.

2. See with what a tender compassion he speaks of the desolations of this land: Many pastors (the Chaldean generals that made themselves masters of the country and ate it up with their armies as easily as the Arabian shepherds with their flocks eat up the fruits of the ground that lies common) have destroyed my vineyard. That which was a pleasant land they have made a desolate wilderness. It is made so by the sword of war: The spoilers, the Chaldean soldiers, have come through the plain upon all high places; they have made themselves masters of all the fastnesses, v. 12. The sword devours from one end of the land to the other; the army of the invaders disperse into every corner, so that no flesh shall have peace.

3. See whence all this misery comes. It is the sword of the Lord that devours, v. 12. While God's people keep close to him the sword is the sword of the Lord, witness that of Gideon; but when they have forsaken him, then the sword of their destroyers becomes the sword of the Lord; witness this of the Chaldeans. It is because of the fierce anger of the Lord (v. 13). It is their sin that has made God their enemy (v. 11): The land mourns unto me; the country that lies desolate does, as it were, pour out its complaint, but the inhabitants are so senseless and stupid that none of them lays it to heart; they do not mourn to God while the very ground shames them.

4. "They have sown wheat, that is, they have taken pains for their own security, but it is all in vain; they shall reap thorns, that is, that which shall prove vexatious to them. They shall be ashamed of your revenues, ashamed that they have depended so much upon their preparations for war." Money constitutes the sinews of war; they thought they had enough of that, but shall be ashamed of it; for their silver and gold shall not profit them in the day of the Lord's anger.

Verses 14–17

Here is a message to all those who had in their turn been one way or other injurious to God's people.

I. What the quarrel was that God had with them. They were his evil neighbours (v. 14), evil neighbours to his church, and what they did against it he took as done against himself. These evil neighbours were the Moabites, Ammonites, Syrians, Edomites, Egyptians, that had been evil neighbours to Israel in helping to debauch them and draw them from God, and now they helped to make them desolate, and joined with the Chaldeans against them. That which God lays to their charge is: They have meddled with the inheritance which I have caused my people Israel to inherit. They sacrilegiously turned to their own use that which was given to God's peculiar people. He that said, Touch not my anointed, said also, "Touch not their inheritance."

II. What course he would take with them. He would break the power they had got over his people. I will pluck out the house of Judah from among them. God's people had been taken captive by them, or, when they fled to them for shelter, had been made prisoners. God will pluck them out, will by his Spirit compel them to come out and compel their task-masters to let them go, as he plucked Israel out of Egypt. He would bring upon them the same calamities that they had been instrumental to bring upon his people: I will pluck them out of their land. Judgment began at the house of God, but it did not end there.

III. What mercy God had in store for such of them as would join themselves to him and become his people, v. 15, 16. They had drawn God's people to join with them in the service of idols. If now they would be drawn by a returning people to join with them in the service of the true and living God, they should be received to stand upon the same level with the Israel of God. This had its accomplishment in part when, after the return out of captivity, many of the people that had been evil neighbours to Israel became Jews; and it was to have its full accomplishment in the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ. After that I have plucked them out, in justice for their sins, I will return and have compassion on them.

1. God would show favour to them always provided that they will diligently learn the ways of my people. There are good ways that are peculiarly the ways of God's people. The ways of holiness and heavenly-mindedness, of love and peaceableness, the ways of prayer and sabbath-sanctification, and diligent attendance on ordinances—these, and the like, are the ways of God's people. They must learn to say, The Lord liveth (to own him, to adore him, and to abide by his judgment), as they taught my people to swear by Baal. We must not despair of the conversion of the worst; no, not of those who have been instrumental to pervert and debauch others; even they may be brought to repentance, and, if they be, shall find mercy. The conversion of the deceived may prove a happy occasion of the conversion even of the deceivers. Thus those who fall together into the ditch are sometimes plucked together out of it.

2. When they return to God and God to them (v. 15): I will bring them again every man to his heritage. They shall become entitled to the spiritual privileges of God's Israel: Be built in the midst of my people. They shall have a name and a place in the house of the Lord, where there was a court for the Gentiles, they shall be built among them. If they will not obey, if any continue to stand it out, I will utterly pluck up and destroy that nation, that family, that particular person, saith the Lord.

CHAP. XIII

Still the prophet is attempting to awaken this stubborn people to repentance. He is to tell them, I. By the sign of a girdle spoiled that their pride should be stained, ver. 1–11. II. By the sign of bottles filled with wine that their counsels should be blasted, ver. 12–14. III. In consideration hereof he is to call them to repent and humble themselves, ver. 15–21. IV. He is to convince them that it is for their obstinacy that the judgments of God are so prolonged, ver. 22–27.

Verses 1–11

I. A sign, the marring of a girdle, which the prophet had worn for some time, by hiding it in a hole of a rock near the river Euphrates. He was to wear a linen girdle for some time, v. 1, 2. Some think he wore it under his clothes, because it is said to cleave to his loins, v. 11. It should rather seem to be worn upon his clothes, and probably was a fine sash, such as officers wear. He must not put it in water, that it might be less likely to rot. The prophet, like John Baptist, was none of those that wore soft clothing, and therefore it would be the more strange to see him with a linen girdle. After he had worn this linen girdle for some time, he must go, and hide it in a hole of a rock (v. 4) by the water's side, where, when the water was high, it would be wet, and when it fell would grow dry again, and by that means would soon rot. After many days, he should find it spoiled, gone to rags and good for nothing, v. 7. It seems hard to imagine that the prophet should be sent on two such long journeys as to the river Euphrates. For this reason most incline to think the journey, at least, was only in vision, and the explanation of this sign given only to the prophet himself (v. 8), not to the people.

II. The thing signified by this sign, v. 9–11.

1. The people of Israel had been to God as this girdle in two respects: (1) He had taken them into covenant and communion with himself: As the girdle cleaves very closely to the loins of a man and surrounds him, so have I caused to cleave to me the houses of Israel and Judah. He caused them to cleave to him by the law he gave them, the prophets he sent among them, and the favours he showed them. (2) When he took them to be to him for a people, it was that they might be to him for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory, as a girdle is an ornament to a man, and particularly the curious girdle of the ephod was to the high-priest for glory and for beauty.

2. They had by their idolatries and other iniquities loosed themselves from him, buried themselves in the earth, and foreign earth too, mingled among the nations, and were so spoiled and corrupted that they were good for nothing. They would not cleave to God, but walked after other gods, to serve them, and to worship them; they doted upon the gods of the heathen nations that lay towards Euphrates, so that they were quite spoiled for the service of their own God, and were as this girdle, this rotten girdle.

3. God would by his judgments separate them from him, send them into captivity, deface all their beauty so that they should be like a fine girdle gone to rags, a worthless people. God will after this manner mar the pride of Judah, and the great pride of Jerusalem. He speaks of the pride of Judah (the country people were proud of their good land), but of the great pride of Jerusalem; there the temple was, and the royal palace, and therefore those citizens were more proud. Pride will have a fall, for God resists the proud. Even the temple, when it became Jerusalem's pride, was marred and laid in ashes.

Verses 12–21

I. A judgment threatened against this people (v. 12): Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, every bottle shall be filled with wine; that is, those that by their sins have made themselves vessels of wrath fitted to destruction shall be filled with the wrath of God as a bottle is with wine; and they shall be brittle as bottles; and, like old bottles into which new wine is put, they shall burst and be broken to pieces, Matt. ix. 17. Or, They shall have their heads as full of wine as bottles are; for so it is explained, v. 13, They shall be filled with drunkenness; compare Isa. li. 17. They, not being aware of the prophet's meaning in it, ridiculed him for it: "Do we not certainly know that every bottle shall be filled with wine?" Perhaps they were thus touchy with the prophet because they apprehended this to be a reflection upon them for their drunkenness, and probably it was in part so intended. They loved flagons of wine, Hos. iii. 1. "Well," says the prophet, "you shall have your bottles full of wine, but not such wine as you desire." What he meant was this,

1. That they should be as giddy as men in drink. A drunken man is fitly compared to a bottle or cask full of wine; for, when the wine is in, the wit, and wisdom, and virtue, and all that is good for anything, are out. Now God threatens (v. 13) that they shall all be filled with drunkenness; they shall be full of confusion in their counsels, shall falter and stagger. They shall expose themselves to the contempt of all about them. All the inhabitants both of the land and of Jerusalem were as far gone as they. Whom God will destroy he infatuates.

2. That being giddy, they shall do mischief to themselves and one another (v. 14): I will dash a man against his brother. Not only their drunken follies, but their drunken frays, shall help to ruin them. This decree against them having gone forth, God says, I will not pity, nor spare, nor have mercy, but destroy them; for they will not pity, nor spare, nor have mercy, but destroy one another; see Hab. ii. 15, 16.

II. Here is good counsel given, which, if taken, would prevent this desolation. It is, in short, to humble themselves under the mighty hand of God. This is that which God has to say to them, Be not proud, v. 15. This was one of the sins for which God had a controversy with them (v. 9). "Be not proud; when God speaks to you by his prophets do not think yourselves too good to be taught; be not scornful."

1. "Give glory to the Lord your God, and not to your idols. Give him glory by confessing your sins, and accepting the punishment of your iniquity, v. 16. Give him glory by a sincere repentance and reformation." Then, and not till then, we begin to live to some good purpose. "Do this quickly before he cause darkness, before he bring his judgments upon you, which you will see no way of escaping." Their attempts to escape shall hasten their ruin: Their feet shall stumble when they are making all the haste they can over the dark mountains. Note, Those that think to out-run the judgments of God will find their road impassable. Their hopes of a better state of things will be disappointed: While you look for light, for comfort and relief, he will turn it into the shadow of death, and make it gross darkness, like that of Egypt, when Pharaoh continued to harden his heart, which was darkness that might be felt.

2. They must abase themselves; the prerogative of the king and queen will not exempt them from this (v. 18): "Say to the king and queen, that, great as they are, they must humble themselves by true repentance, and so give both glory to God and a good example to their subjects." When you are led away captives, where will your principality and all the badges of it be then?

III. This counsel is enforced by some arguments.

1. It will be the prophet's unspeakable grief (v. 7): "If you will not hear it, will not submit to the word, but continue refractory, not only my eye, but my soul shall weep in secret places." It would grieve him to see their sins unrepented of: "My soul shall weep for your pride, your haughtiness, and stubbornness, and vain confidence." The sins of others should be matter of sorrow to us. We must mourn for that which we cannot mend, and mourn the more for it because we cannot mend it.

2. It will be their own inevitable ruin, v. 19–21. The cities of the south shall be shut up. Some understand it of the cities of Egypt, which was south from Judah; the places there whence they expected succours shall fail them, and they shall find no access to them. Judah shall be carried away captive. So it was in the last captivity under Zedekiah, because they repented not. The enemy was now at hand that should do this (v. 20): "Lift up your eyes. Behold, those that come from the north, from the land of the Chaldeans; see how fast they advance, how fierce they appear." Upon this he addresses himself to the king, or rather (because the pronouns are feminine) to the city or state. "What will you do now with the people who are committed to your charge, and whom you ought to protect? Where is the flock that was given thee, thy beautiful flock? How can they escape these ravening wolves?" Masters of families, who neglect their children and suffer them to perish for want of a good education, and ministers who neglect their people, should think they hear God putting this question to them: Where is the flock that was given thee to feed, that beauteous flock? What wilt thou say when he shall visit upon thee the former days? (v. 21). Thou canst say nothing, but that God is just in all that is brought upon thee. "How will you bear the trouble that is at the door? Shall not sorrows take thee as a woman in travail? Sorrows will be more grievous in that there is no manchild to be born."

Verses 22–27

I. Ruin threatened as before, that the Jews shall go into captivity, and fall under all the miseries of beggary and bondage, shall be stripped of their clothes, their skirts discovered for want of upper garments to cover them, and their heels made bare for want of shoes, v. 22. Thus they used to deal with prisoners taken in war, when they drove them into captivity, naked and barefoot, Isa. xx. 4. Carried off into a strange country, they shall be scattered as the stubble that is blown away by the wind of the wilderness, v. 24. They shall be stripped of all their ornaments, and exposed to shame, as harlots, v. 26.

II. An enquiry made by the people into the cause of this ruin, v. 22. Thou wilt say in thy heart: Wherefore came these things upon me? They could not see that they had done anything which might justly provoke God to be thus angry with them.

III. God will be justified when he speaks and will oblige us to justify him, and therefore will set the sin of sinners in order before them.

1. It is for the greatness of their iniquities, v. 22. God does not take advantage against them for small faults; the sins for which he now punishes them are very heinous in their nature—for the multitude of thy iniquity (so it may be read), sins of every kind and often repeated. Some think we are more in danger from the multitude of our smaller sins than from the heinousness of our greater sins.

2. It is for their obstinacy in sin (v. 23): Can the Ethiopian change his skin, that is by nature black, or the leopard his spots, that are even woven into the skin? It is morally impossible to reclaim and reform these people. They were taught to do evil; they had served an apprenticeship to it. Their prophets despaired of ever bringing them to do good. Those that have been long accustomed to sin have shaken off the restraints of fear and shame; their consciences are seared; the habits of sin are confirmed. Sin is the blackness of the soul, the deformity of it.

But there is an almighty grace that is able to change the Ethiopian's skin, and that grace shall not be wanting to those who in a sense of their need of it seek it earnestly.

3. It is for their treacherous departures from the God of truth (v. 25): "This is thy lot, to be driven away; this is the portion of thy measures from me, the punishment assigned thee as by measure; it is because thou hast forgotten me, the favours I have bestowed upon thee, thou hast no remembrance, of these." Forgetfulness of God is at the bottom of all sin, as the remembrance of our Creator betimes is the happy and hopeful beginning of a holy life.

4. It is for their idolatry, of all sins most provoking to the jealous God. They are exposed to a shameful calamity (v. 26) because they have been guilty of a shameful iniquity and yet are shameless in it (v. 27): "I have seen thy adulteries (thy inordinate fancy for strange gods), even the lewdness of thy whoredoms, thy eager worshipping of idols on the hills in the fields, upon the high places. This is that for which a woe is denounced against thee, O Jerusalem!"

IV. Here is an affectionate expostulation with them upon the whole matter. While there is life there is hope, and therefore still he reasons with them to bring them to repentance, v. 27. Wilt thou not be made clean? It is an instance of the wonderful grace of God that he desires the repentance and conversion of sinners, and thinks the time long till they are brought to relent; but it is an instance of the wonderful folly of sinners that they put that off from time to time which is of such absolute necessity. They do not say that they will never be cleansed, but not yet.

CHAP. XIV

This chapter was upon occasion of a great drought. This judgment began in the latter end of Josiah's reign, but continued in the beginning of Jehoiakim's. This calamity was mentioned several times before, but in this chapter, more fully. I A melancholy description of it, ver. 1–6. II. A prayer to God to put an end to this calamity, ver. 7–9. III A severe threatening that God would proceed in his controversy, because they proceeded in their iniquity, ver. 10–12. IV. The prophet's excusing the people, by laying the blame on their false prophets, ver. 13–16. V. Directions given to the prophet, instead of interceding for them, to lament them, ver. 17–22.

Verses 1–9

I. The language of nature lamenting the calamity. When the heavens were as brass, and distilled no dews, the earth was as iron, and produced no fruits; the grief and confusion were universal. The people of the land were all in tears. Judah mourns (v. 2), not for the sin, but for the withholding of the rain. The gates thereof, all that go in and out at their gates, languish, look pale, and grow feeble, for want of the necessary supports of life and for fear of further judgment. The gates now look melancholy; the inhabitants are departing through them to seek for bread in other countries. Even those that sit in the gates languish; they are black unto the ground, they go in black as mourners and sit on the ground, as beggars. They fall to the ground through weakness. The cry of Jerusalem has gone up; that is, of the citizens (for the city is served by the field), or of people from all parts of the country met at Jerusalem to pray for rain. But I fear it was rather the cry of their trouble, than the cry of their prayer. The great men of the land felt this judgment (v. 3): The nobles sent their little ones to the water. Or, their meaner ones, their servants, they sent to seek for water, but there was none to be found: They returned with their vessels empty; the springs were dried up when there was no rain to feed them; and then they (their masters) were ashamed and confounded. The husbandmen felt it most immediately (v. 4): The ploughmen were ashamed, for the ground was so parched and hard that it would not admit the plough. They were ashamed to be idle. See what an immediate dependence husbandmen have upon the divine Providence, for they cannot plough nor sow in hope unless God water their furrows, Ps. lxv. 10. The case even of the wild beasts was pitiable, v. 5, 6. Judah and Jerusalem have sinned, but the hinds and the wild asses, what have they done? The hinds are particularly tender of their young; and yet contrary to their nature, they leave their young, even when they most need them, to seek for grass elsewhere; and, if they can find none, they abandon them, because not able to suckle them. It grieved not the hind so much that she had no grass for herself as that she had none for her young, which will shame those who spend that upon their lusts which they should preserve for their families. One would be sorry even for the wild asses, for the barren land is now made too hot for them, so hot that they get to the highest places they can reach, where the air is coolest, and snuff up the wind like dragons, creatures which are continually panting for breath. Their eyes fail, and so does their strength, because there is no grass.

II. Here is the language of grace, lamenting the iniquity, and complaining to God of the calamity. The people are not forward to pray, but the prophet here prays for them, and so excites them to pray for themselves, v. 7–9. In this prayer, 1. Sin is humbly confessed. If we quarrel with God as dealing unjustly or unkindly with us in afflicting us, our iniquities testify that we do him wrong; "for our backslidings are many and too heinous to be excused, for they are against thee." 2. Mercy is earnestly begged: "Though our iniquities testify against us, yet do thou it." As becomes penitents and beggars, they refer the matter to God: "Do with us as thou thinkest fit," Judges x. 15. We have nothing to plead in ourselves, but everything in thee. There is another petition in this prayer (v. 9): "Leave us not, withdraw not thy favour and presence." 3. Their relation to God and their expectations from him are most pathetically pleaded, v. 8, 9. They look upon him as one they have reason to think should deliver them. In him mercy has often rejoiced against judgment God has encouraged his people to hope in him; in calling himself so often the God of Israel, the rock of Israel, and the Holy One of Israel, he has made himself the hope of Israel. They plead, "Thou art in the midst of us; we have the special tokens of thy presence with us, thy temple, thy ark, thy oracles, and we are called by thy name, the Israel of God; and therefore we hope thou wilt not leave us; we are thine, save us." It grieves them to think that he does not appear for their deliverance. What will the Egyptians say? They will say, "Israel's hope and Saviour does not mind them; he has become as a stranger in the land, that does not interest himself in its interests; his temple, which he called his rest for ever, is no more so, but he is in it as a wayfaring man, that turns aside to tarry but for a night in an inn." The enemies once said, Because the Lord was not able to bring his people to Canaan, he let them perish in the wilderness (Num. xiv. 16); so now they will say, "Either his wisdom or his power fails him; either he is as a man astonished (who, though he has the reason of a man, yet is quite at his wits' end) or as a mighty man—a man, and therefore having his power limited." Either of these would be a most insufferable reproach to the divine perfections; and therefore, why has the God that we are sure is in the midst of us become as a stranger? Why does the almighty God seem as though he would, yet cannot save?

Verses 10–16

The dispute between God and his prophet, in this chapter, seems to be like that between the owner and the dresser of the vineyard concerning the barren fig-tree, Luke xiii. 7. The justice of the owner condemns it to be cut down; the clemency of the dresser intercedes for a reprieve.

I. God overrules the plea. Thus he says concerning this people, v. 10. He does not say, concerning my people, because they had broken covenant with him. It is true they were called by his name, but they had sinned, and provoked God to withdraw. God here tells him they were not qualified for a pardon. The prophet had owned that their backslidings were many; and yet there was hope for them if they returned. But this people show no disposition at all to return; they have loved to wander; their backslidings have been their pleasure, which should have been their shame. It is not through necessity that they wander: their wanderings forfeit God's favour. They have not taken warning and refrained their feet. This is that for which God is now reckoning with them. When he denies them rain from heaven he is remembering their iniquity and visiting their sin, for which their fruitful land is thus turned into barrenness. Though they betook themselves to fasting and prayer and burnt-offerings and sacrifice: The Lord doth not accept them, v. 10. He takes no pleasure in them (so the word is). "When they fast (v. 12), which is a proper expression of repentance and reformation,—when they offer a burnt offering and an oblation, which was designed to be an expression of faith in a Mediator,—though their prayers be offered up in those vehicles that used to be acceptable yet, because they do not proceed from humble, penitent, and renewed hearts, but still love to wander, therefore I will not hear their cry, nor will I accept them, neither their persons nor their performances." They had forfeited all benefit by the prophet's prayers for them because they had not regarded his preaching. This is the meaning of that repeated prohibition given to the prophet (v. 11): Pray not thou for this people for their good, as before, ch. vii. 16; xi. 14. This did not forbid him thus to express his goodwill to them, but it forbade them to expect any good effect from it as long as they turned away their ear from hearing the law. It therefore follows (v. 12), I will consume them.

II. The prophet offers another plea in excuse for the people's obstinacy. The prophets, who pretended a commission from heaven, imposed upon them, and flattered them with assurances of peace, v. 13. He speaks of it with lamentation: "Ah! Lord God, there are those who in thy name tell them that they shall not see the sword nor famine; and they say it as from thee: I will continue you in this place, and will give you assured peace. I tell them the contrary; but I am one against many; therefore, Lord, pity and spare them, for their leaders cause them to err." This excuse would have been of some weight if they had not had warning given them, before, of false prophets.

III. God not only overrules this plea, but condemns both the blind leaders and the blind followers to fall together into the ditch. He disowns the flatteries (v. 14): They prophesy lies in my name. They had no commission from God to prophesy at all: I neither sent them, nor commanded them, nor spoke unto them. Those that oppose their own thoughts to God's word (God indeed says so, but they think otherwise) walk in the deceit of their heart, and it will be their ruin. He passes sentence upon the flatterers, v. 15. As for the prophets, let them know that they shall have no peace themselves. They undertook to warrant people that sword and famine should not be in the land; but they themselves shall be cut off by sword and famine. The people to whom they prophesy lies, and who willingly suffer themselves to be thus imposed upon, shall die by sword and famine, v. 16. Their bodies shall be cast out, even in the streets of Jerusalem; there they shall lie unburied. Thus will God pour their wickedness upon them, that is, the punishment of their wickedness.

Verses 17–22

The present deplorable state of Judah and Jerusalem is here made the matter of the prophet's lamentation (v. 17, 18) and of his prayer for them (v. 19), and the latter, as well as the former, was by divine direction, and these words (v. 17), Thus shalt thou say unto them, refer to the intercession as well as to the lamentation, and then it amounts to a revocation of the directions given to the prophet not to pray for them, v. 11.

I. The prophet stands weeping over the ruins of his country. Jeremiah must say it not only to himself, but to them too: Let my eyes run down with tears, v. 17. Thus he must signify to them that he foresaw the sword coming, and another sort of famine, that would be in the city through the straitness of the siege. The prophet speaks as if he already saw the miseries attending the descent which the Chaldeans made upon them: The virgin daughter of my people is broken with a great breach, with a very grievous blow, more grievous than any she has yet sustained; for (v. 18) in the field multitudes lie dead that were slain by the sword, and in the city multitudes lie dying for want of food. "The prophets and the priests, the false prophets that flattered them with their lies and the wicked priests that persecuted the true prophets, are expelled, and go about either captives, or as fugitives and vagabonds, wherever they can find shelter in a land that they know not." Some understand this of the true prophets, Ezekiel and Daniel, that were carried to Babylon with the rest. The prophet's eyes must run down with tears day and night, in prospect of this, that the people might be convinced, not only that this woeful day would infallibly come, but that he would gladly have brought them messages of peace, if he might have had warrant from heaven to do it.

II. He stands up to make intercession for them. There were some who would join with him in his devotions, and set the seal of their Amen to them.

1. He humbly expostulates with God concerning their case, v. 19. Their expectations from their God failed them; they thought he had avouched Judah to be his, but now, it seems, he has utterly rejected it. They thought Zion was beloved, but now his soul even loathes Zion, loathes even the services there performed. All their other expectations failed them: They were smitten, their wounds were multiplied, but there was no healing for them; they looked for peace, because after a storm there usually comes a calm. They looked for a healing time, but could not gain so much as a breathing time. "Behold, trouble at the door, by which we hoped peace would enter. But wilt thou not at length in wrath remember mercy?"

2. He makes a penitent confession of sin, which they all should have spoken, though but few did (v. 20): "We acknowledge our wickedness, the abounding wickedness of our land and the iniquity of our fathers, which we have imitated. We know, we acknowledge, that we have sinned against thee, and therefore thou art just in all that is brought upon us; but, because we confess our sins, we hope to find thee faithful and just in forgiving our sins."

3. He deprecates God's displeasure, and by faith appeals to his promise, v. 21. His petition is, "Do not abhor us; though thou afflict us, do not abhor us; though thy hand be turned against us, let not thy heart be so, nor let thy mind be alienated from us." They own God might justly abhor them, yet they pray: "Do not abhor us, for thy name's sake, that name of thine by which we are called and which we call upon." The honour of his sanctuary is pleaded: "Lord, do not abhor us, for that will disgrace the throne of thy glory." We deserve to have disgrace put upon us, but let not the desolations of the temple give occasion to the heathen to reproach him that used to be worshipped there. We may be sure that God will not disgrace the throne of his glory on earth. They are humbly bold to put him in mind: Remember thy covenant with us, and break not that covenant.

4. He professes a dependence upon God for the mercy of rain, v. 22. They will never make application to the idols of the heathen. Are there any among the vanities of the Gentiles that can cause rain? In a time of great drought in Israel, Baal, though all Israel presented their prayers to him in the days of Ahab, could not relieve them; it was only that God who answered by fire that could answer by water too. Can the heavens give showers? Not without orders from the God of heaven; for it is he that has the key of the clouds, that opens the bottles of heaven and waters the earth from his chambers. All their expectation therefore is from him. Art not thou he, O Lord our God! from whom we may expect succour and to whom we must apply? Art thou not he that causest rain and givest showers? For thou hast made all these things; thou gavest them being, and therefore thou givest them law and hast them all at thy command. We will ask of the Lord rain, Zech. x. 1. We will trust in him to give it to us in due time.

CHAP. XV

I. Notwithstanding the prophet's prayers, God here ratifies the sentence given against the people, ver 1-9 II. The prophet himself, notwithstanding the satisfaction he had in communion with God, still finds himself uneasy and out of temper. 1. He complains to God of his continual struggle with his persecutors, ver 10 2. God assures him that he shall be taken under special protection, though there was a general desolation coming upon the land, ver. 11–14. 3. He appeals to God concerning his sincerity in the discharge of his prophetic office, ver. 15–18. 4 Fresh security is given him that, upon condition he continue faithful, God will continue his care of him and his favour to him, ver. 19–21.

Verses 1–9

There are scarcely anywhere more pathetic expressions of divine wrath against a provoking people than in these verses. The prophet had prayed earnestly for them, and found some to join with him; and yet no reprieve was gained, nor the least mitigation of the judgment.

I. What the sin was upon which this severe sentence was grounded. It is because of Manasseh, for that which he did in Jerusalem, v. 4. What that was we are told, and that it was for it that Jerusalem was destroyed, 2 Kings xxiv. 3, 4. It was for his idolatry, and the innocent blood which he shed, which the Lord would not pardon. It is in consideration of their present impenitence. Their sin is described (v. 6): Thou hast forsaken me, my service and thy duty to me; thou hast gone backward and art become the reverse of what thou shouldst have been. The impenitence is described (v. 7): They return not from their ways, the ways of their own hearts, into the ways of God's commandments again. There is mercy for those who have turned aside if they will return; but what favour can those expect that persist in their apostasy?

II. What the sentence is. It is ruin.

1. God himself abandons them: My mind cannot be towards them. It is not in a passion, but with a just and holy indignation, that he says, "Cast them out of my sight, and let them go forth, for I will be troubled with them no more."

2. He will not admit any intercession to be made for them (v. 1): "Though Moses and Samuel stood before me, by prayer or sacrifice to reconcile me to them, yet I could not admit them into favour."

3. He condemns them all to one destroying judgment or other. When God casts them out of his presence, whither shall they go forth? (v. 2). Such as are for death to death, or for the sword to the sword. It is a choice like that which David was put to, and was thereby put into a great strait, 2 Sam. xxiv. 14. Captivity is mentioned last, some think, because the sorest judgment of all, it being a continuance of miseries. That of the sword is again repeated (v. 3), and is made the first of another four set of destroyers. As those that escape the sword shall be cut off by pestilence, famine, or captivity, so those that fall by the sword shall be cut off by divine vengeance. There shall be dogs to tear in the city and fowls of the air and wild beasts in the field to devour. And, if there be any that think to outrun justice: They shall be removed into all kingdoms of the earth (v. 4), like Cain, who became a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth.

4. They shall fall without being relieved. God appears against them: I will stretch out my hand against thee, a deliberate stroke, which will wound deeply. I am weary with repenting (v. 6); by their treacherous professions of repentance, they had put even infinite patience to the stretch. Now he will grant no more reprieves. Their own country expels them, and is ready to spew them out. I will fan them with a fan in the gates of the land, in their own gates, or into the gates of the earth, into the cities of all the nations about them, v. 7. I will bereave them of children; they shall have little hope that the next generation will retrieve their affairs, for I will destroy my people. Nebuchadnezzar is here called a spoiler at noon-day, not a thief in the night, afraid of being discovered, but one that without fear shall break through and destroy. I have brought against the mother a young man, a spoiler (so some read it); for Nebuchadnezzar, when he first invaded Judah, was but a young man, in the first year of his reign. We read it, I have brought upon them, even against the mother of the young men, a spoiler, that is, against Jerusalem, a mother city, that had a very numerous family of young men. God caused him to fall upon it, that is, upon the spoil delivered to him, suddenly; and then terrors came upon the city. I will cause to fall suddenly upon her (upon Jerusalem) a watcher and terrors; the word is used for a watcher (Dan. iv. 13, 23), and the Chaldean soldiers were called watchers, ch. iv. xvi. A dreadful slaughter is here described. The wives are deprived of their husbands: Their widows are increased above the sand of the seas. God says, They are increased to me. Though the husbands were cut off by the sword of his justice, their poor widows were gathered in the arms of his mercy, who has taken it among the titles of his honour to be the God of the widows. The parents are deprived of their children. When the children are slain the mother gives up the ghost, for her life was bound up in theirs: Her sun has gone down while it was yet day. Some understand, by this languishing mother, Jerusalem lamenting the death of her inhabitants as passionately as ever poor mother bewailed her children.

5. They shall fall without being pitied (v. 5): "For who shall have pity on thee, O Jerusalem? When thy God has cast thee out of his sight, neither thy enemies nor thy friends shall have any compassion for thee. O Israel! thou hast destroyed thyself."

Verses 10–14

Jeremiah has now returned from his public work and retired into his closet; what passed between him and his God there we have an account of in these verses.

I. The complaint which the prophet makes to God of the many discouragements he met with in his work, v. 10.

1. He met with a great deal of contradiction and opposition. He was a man of strife and contention. Both city and country quarrelled with him, and did all they could to thwart him. He was a peaceable man, and yet a man of strife, not a man striving, but a man striven with; he was for peace, but, when he spoke, they were for war. The real cause of their quarrels with him was his faithfulness to God and to their souls. He showed them their sins that were working their ruin, and put them into a way to prevent that ruin, and yet they were incensed against him. The gospel of peace brings division, Matt. x. 34, 35; Luke xii. 49, 51. Now this made Jeremiah very uneasy. He cried out, Woe is me, my mother, that thou hast borne me; he is angry that she had borne him a man of strife. It was intended for a pathetic lamentation of his case. Even those who are most peaceable are often made men of strife. Yet, if we cannot live peaceably with our neighbours, we must not be so disturbed as to lose the repose of our own minds and put ourselves upon the fret.

2. He met with a great deal of contumely, and reproach. They branded him as a factious man and a sower of discord and sedition. They ought to have blessed him, and to have blessed God for him; but they cursed his messenger and did all they could to make him odious. But one would be apt to suspect that surely Jeremiah had given them some provocation! "I have neither lent money nor borrowed money." It is implied here that those who deal much in the business of this world are often involved in strife and contention. It was an instance of Jeremiah's prudence that, being called to be a prophet, he entangled not himself in the affairs of this life, that he might not give the least shadow of suspicion that he aimed at secular advantages in it. He put out no money, for he was no usurer; he took up no money, for he was no merchant. We find (ch. xvi. 2) that he had neither wife nor children to keep. And yet he lay under a general odium, through the iniquity of the times.

II. The answer which God gave to this complaint. 1. God assures him that he should weather the storm and be made easy at last, v. 11. "If I take not care of thee, let me never be counted faithful; verily it shall go well with thy remnant, with the remainder of thy life" (for so the word signifies); "the residue of thy days shall be more comfortable to thee than those hitherto have been." Thy end shall be good; so the Chaldee reads it. It should seem that Jeremiah was uneasy at the apprehension of sharing in the public judgments which he foresaw coming. "If my friends are thus abusive to me, and what will my enemies be?" But he quiets his mind with this promise: "Verily I will cause the enemy to entreat thee well in the time of evil, when all about thee shall be laid waste." This promise was accomplished when Nebuchadnezzar, having taken the city, charged the captain of the guard to be kind to Jeremiah, and let him have everything he had a mind to, ch. xxxix. 11, 12. The following words, Shall iron break the northern iron, and the steel, or brass? (v. 12), being compared with the promise of God made to Jeremiah (ch. i. 18), that he would make him an iron pillar and brazen walls, seem intended for his comfort. They were continually clashing with him, and were rough and hard as iron; but Jeremiah, being armed with power and courage from on high, is as northern iron, which is naturally stronger, and as steel, which is hardened by art; and therefore they shall not prevail against him; compare this with Ezek. ii. 6; iii. 8, 9. 2. God assures him that his enemies and persecutors should be lost in the storm, v. 13, 14. God here turns his speech from the prophet to the people. To them also v. 12 may be applied: Shall iron break the northern iron, and the steel? Shall their courage and strength, and the most hardy and vigorous of their efforts, be able to contest either with the counsel of God or with the army of the Chaldeans, which are as inflexible, as invincible, as the northern iron and steel. Let them therefore hear their doom: Thy substance and thy treasure will I give to the spoil, and that without price. The prophet was poor; he had nothing to lose, neither substance nor treasure, and therefore the enemy will treat him well. But the people that had great estates in money and land would be slain for what they had. All parts of the country, even those which lay most remote, had contributed to the national guilt, and all shall now be brought to account. "I will make thee to pass with thy enemies, who shall lead thee in triumph into a land that thou knowest not, and therefore canst expect to find no comfort in it."

I. The prophet's humble address to God, "O Lord! thou knowest; thou knowest my sincerity, which men are resolved they will not acknowledge; thou knowest my distress, which men disdain to take notice of."

1. The prophet prays, v. 15. (1) That God would consider his case and be mindful of him: "O Lord! remember me; think upon me for good." (2) That God would communicate strength and comfort to him: "Visit me." (3) That he would appear for him: Revenge me of my persecutors, or rather, Vindicate me from my persecutors. Further than this a good man will not desire that God should avenge him. Let something be done to convince the world that Jeremiah is a righteous man and the God whom he serves is a righteous God. (4) That he would yet spare him: "Take me not away by a sudden stroke, but in thy long-suffering lengthen out my days." Though in a passion he complained of his birth (v. 10), yet he desires here that his death might not be hastened; for life is sweet to nature, and the life of a useful man is so to grace.

2. He pleads with God for mercy and relief against his enemies, persecutors, and slanderers.

(1) That God's honour was interested in this case: Know, and make it known, that for thy sake I have suffered rebuke. If it is for doing well that we suffer ill, and for righteousness' sake that we have all manner of evil said against us, we may hope that God will vindicate our honour with his own. To the same purport (v. 16), I am called by thy name, O Lord of hosts!

(2) That the word of God, which he was employed to preach to others, he had experienced in his own soul, and therefore had the graces of the Spirit to qualify him for the divine favour, as well as his gifts. Jeremiah could say (v. 16): "Thy words were found, found by me, found for me, and I did not only taste them, but did eat them, received them entirely: they were welcome to me, as food to one that is hungry. The prophet was told to eat the roll, Ezek. ii. 8; Rev. x. 9. I did eat it—that is, as it follows, it was to me the joy and rejoicing of my heart, nothing could be more agreeable. Understand it, [1] Of the message itself which he was to deliver. Though he was to foretell the ruin of his country, which was dear to him, and in the ruin of which he could not but have a deep share, yet all natural affections were swallowed up in zeal for God's glory, and even these messages of wrath, being divine messages, were a satisfaction to him. He also rejoiced, at first, in hope that the people would take warning and prevent the judgment. Or, [2] Of the commission he received to deliver this message. Though the work he was called to was not attended with any secular advantages, but, on the contrary, exposed him to contempt and persecution, yet it was his meat and drink to do the will of him that sent him, John iv. 34. Or, [3] Of the promise God gave him that he would assist and own him in his work (ch. i. 8).

(3) That he had applied himself to the duty of his office with gravity and self-denial, though he had had of late but little satisfaction in it, v. 17. He sat alone, spent a great deal of time in his closet, because of the hand of the Lord that was strong upon him to carry him on in his work, Ezek. iii. 14. "For thou hast filled me with indignation, with such messages of wrath against this people as have made me always pensive." It is his complaint that he had had but little pleasure in his work. It was at first the rejoicing of his heart, but of late it had made him melancholy, so that he had no heart to sit in the meeting of those that make merry. He sat alone, fretting at the people's obstinacy and the little success of his labours among them.

(4) He throws himself upon God's pity and promise in a very passionate expostulation (v. 18): "Why is my pain perpetual, and nothing done to ease it? Will the God that has promised me his presence be to me as a liar, the God on whom I depend be to me as waters that fail?" No; I know thou wilt not. God is not a man that he should lie. The fountain of life will never be to his people as waters that fail.

II. God's gracious answer to this address, v. 19–21.

1. What God here requires of him. God will own him. But, (1) He must recover his temper, and be reconciled to his work. He must return, must shake off these distrustful discontented thoughts and passions, and not give way to them. (2) He must resolve to be faithful in his work. Though there was no cause at all to charge Jeremiah with unfaithfulness, and God knew his heart to be sincere, yet God saw fit to give him this caution. Thou must take forth the precious from the vile. The righteous are the precious be they ever so mean and poor; the wicked are the vile be they ever so rich and great. In our congregations these are mixed, wheat and chaff in the same floor; we cannot distinguish them by name, but we must by character, and must give to each a portion, comfort to precious saints and terror to vile sinners: Let them return to thee, but return not thou to them, that is, he must do the utmost he can, in his preaching, to bring people up to the mind of God. Those that had flown off from him, "Let them return to thee, and, upon second thoughts, come up to the terms; but do not thou return to them, do not compliment them, nor think to make the matter easier to them than the word of God has made it."

2. What God here promises. If he approve himself well, (1) God will tranquillize his mind and pacify the present tumult of his spirits: If thou return, I will bring thee again, will restore thy soul, as Ps. xxiii. 3. (2) God will employ him in his service as a prophet. "Thou shalt stand before me, to receive instructions from me, as a servant from his master; and thou shalt be as my mouth to deliver my messages to the people, as an ambassador is the mouth of the prince that sends him." (3) He shall have strength and courage to face the many difficulties he meets in his work, and his spirit shall not fail as now it does (v. 20): "I will make thee unto this people as a fenced brazen wall, which the storm batters and beats violently upon, but cannot shake. Return not thou to them by any sinful compliances, and then trust thy God to arm thee by his grace with holy resolutions. Be not cowardly, and God will make thee daring." He had complained that he was made a man of strife. Expect to be so (says God); they will fight against thee, but they shall not prevail against thee. (4) He shall have God for his mighty deliverer: I am with thee to save thee. Those that have God with them have a Saviour with them who has wisdom and strength enough to deal with the most formidable enemy (v. 21). There are many things that appear very frightful that yet do not prove at all hurtful to a good man.

CHAP. XVI

I. The greatness of the calamity that was coming upon the Jewish nation is illustrated by prohibitions given to the prophet neither to set up a house of his own (ver. 1–4) nor to go into the house of mourning (ver. 5–7) nor into the house of feasting, ver. 8, 9. II. God is justified in these severe proceedings against them by an account of their great wickedness, ver. 10–13. III. An intimation is given of mercy in reserve, ver. 14, 15. IV. Some hopes are given that the punishment of the sin should prove the reformation of the sinners, ver. 16–21.

Verses 1–9

The prophet is here for a sign to the people. They would not regard what he said; let it be tried whether they will regard what he does. He must conduct himself as became one that expected to see his country in ruins very shortly. This he foretold, but he is to show that he is himself fully satisfied in the truth of it, he is forbidden marriage, mourning for the dead, and mirth.

I. Jeremiah must not marry, nor think of having a family (v. 2). The Jews valued early marriages and numerous offspring. But Jeremiah must live a bachelor. By this it appears that it was advisable only in calamitous times and times of present distress, 1 Cor. vii. 26. That it is so is a part of the calamity. When we see such times at hand it is wisdom for all, especially for prophets, to keep themselves from being encumbered with that which, the dearer it is to them, the more it will be their care, and fear, and grief. The reason here given is because the fathers and mothers, the sons and the daughters, shall die of grievous deaths, v. 3, 4. Those that have wives and children will have such a clog upon them that they cannot flee from those deaths. The death of every child, and the circumstances of it, will be a new death to the parent. Better have no children than have them brought forth and bred up for the murderer (Hos. ix. 13, 14), than see them live and die in misery. Bewailing the dead and burying them are denied: They shall not be lamented, but shall be carried off, as if all the world were weary of them; nay, they shall not be buried, but left exposed. They shall be as dung upon the face of the earth, not only despicable, but detestable. Being consumed, some by the sword and some by famine, their carcases shall be meat for the fowls of heaven and the beasts of the earth.

II. Jeremiah must not go to the house of mourning upon the death of any of his neighbours or relations (v. 5). It was usual to condole with those whose relations were dead, to bemoan them, to cut themselves, and make themselves bald, which was an expression of mourning, though forbidden by the law, Deut. xiv. 1. Sometimes, in a passion of grief, they did tear themselves for them (v. 6, 7). They used to mourn to comfort them for the dead, as the Jews with Martha and Mary; and it was a friendly office to give them a cup of consolation to drink, to provide cordials for them for the support of their spirits. Though they have lost their parents, yet they have friends left that have a concern for them. It is a good work to go to the house of mourning. The prophet Jeremiah had been wont to abound in good offices of this kind. But now God bids him not lament the death of his friends. His sorrow for the destruction of his country in general must swallow up his sorrow for particular deaths. Men shall be in deaths so often that they shall have no time, no room, no heart, for the ceremonies that used to attend death. All shall be mourners then, and no comforters; everyone will find it enough to bear his own burden; for (v. 5), "I have taken away my peace from this people, put a full period to their prosperity, deprived them of health, and wealth, and quiet, and friends, and everything wherewith they might comfort themselves and one another." Whatever peace we enjoy, it is God's peace; it is his gift, and, if he give quietness, who then can make trouble? But, if we make not a good use of his peace, he can and will take it away. Then farewell all good. All is none when God takes away from us his lovingkindness and his mercies.

III. Jeremiah must not go to the house of mirth, any more than to the house of mourning, v. 8. God was coming against them in his judgments; and it was time for them to humble themselves. Ministers ought to be examples of self-denial. His friends wondered that he would not meet them, as he used to do, in the house of feasting. But he lets them know it was to intimate to them that all their feasting would be at an end shortly (v. 9): "I will cause to cease the voice of mirth. You shall have nothing to feast on, nothing to rejoice in, but be surrounded with calamities that shall mar your mirth and cast a damp upon it." God can find ways to tame the most jovial. "This shall be done in this place, in Jerusalem, that used to be the joyous city and thought her joys were all secure to her. It shall be done in your eyes, in your sight, to be a vexation to you, who now look so haughty and so merry." The voice of praise they had made to cease by their iniquities and idolatries, and therefore justly God made to cease among them the voice of mirth and gladness. The voice of God's prophets was not heard, was not heeded, among them, and therefore no longer shall the voice of the bridegroom and of the bride, of the songs that used to grace the nuptials, be heard among them. See ch. vii. 34.

Verses 10–13

1. The reasons why God would bring those judgments (v. 10). "What is our iniquity? Or what is our sin? What crime have we ever been guilty of, proportionable to such a sentence?" Instead of humbling and condemning themselves, they stand upon their own justification and insinuate that God did them wrong in pronouncing this evil against them. Do they ask the prophet why God is thus angry with them? The righteous God is never angry without cause, without good cause; but he must tell them particularly what is the cause, that they may be humbled, or at least that God may be justified. God visited upon them the iniquities of their fathers (v. 11): Your fathers have forsaken me, and have not kept my law. They shook off divine institutions, and walked after other gods, whose worship was more gay and pompous; and, being fond of variety and novelty, they served them and worshipped them; and this was the sin which God had said, in the second commandment, he would visit upon their children, who kept up these idolatrous usages. Also God reckoned with them for their own iniquities (v. 12): "You have made your father's sin your own, and have become obnoxious to the punishment which in their days was deferred, for you have done worse than your fathers." If they had made a good use of their fathers' reprieve, and been led by the patience of God to repentance, the judgment would have been prevented, the reprieve turned into a national pardon. They were more impudent and obstinate in sin than their fathers. They suffered their own passions to be noisy, that they might drown the voice of their consciences. No wonder that God had taken this resolution (v. 13): "I will cast you out of this land, this land of light, this valley of vision—into a far country, a land that you know not, neither you nor your fathers." Two things would make their case there very miserable, and both of them relate to the soul. (1) "It is the happiness of the soul to be employed in the service of God; but there shall you serve other gods day and night; perhaps compelled to do it by your cruel task-masters; and, when you are forced to worship idols, you will be as sick of such worship as ever you were fond of it when it was forbidden you by your godly kings." (2) "It is the happiness of the soul to have some tokens of the lovingkindness of God, but you shall go to a strange land, where I will not show you favour."

Verses 14–21

There is a mixture of mercy and judgment in these verses, and some seem to look as far forward as the times of the gospel.

I. God will certainly execute judgment upon them for their idolatries. The decree has gone forth. God sees all their sins (v. 17). As his omniscience convicts them, so his justice condemns them: I will recompense their iniquity and their sin double, not double to what it deserves, but double to what they expect. The sin for which God has a controversy with them is their having defiled God's land with their idolatries. Idols are carcases of detestable things. God hates them, and so should we. He will raise up instruments of his wrath, that shall cast them out of their land, according to the sentence passed (v. 16): I will send for many fishers and many hunters—the Chaldean army, that shall have ways of ensnaring them, by fraud as fishers, by force as hunters. They shall discover them wherever they are hid, in hills or mountains, or holes of the rocks. Their bondage in Babylon shall be more grievous than that in Egypt, their task-masters more cruel, and their lives more bitter. This is implied in the promise (v. 14, 15), that their deliverance out of Babylon shall be more welcome to them, than that out of Egypt. Their slavery in Egypt came upon them gradually; that in Babylon came upon them at once and with all the aggravating circumstances of terror. In Egypt they had a Goshen of their own, but none such in Babylon. In Egypt they were used as servants that were useful, in Babylon as captives that had been hateful. These judgments have a voice. When God chastens them he teaches them. By this rod God expostulates with them (v. 20): "Shall a man make gods to himself?" God will be known by the judgments which he executes. "For this once, and no more, I will cause them to know my hand, how far it can reach and how deeply it can wound."

II. Yet he has mercy in store for them. It was said, with an air of severity (v. 13), that God would banish them into a strange land; but there follow immediately words of comfort.

1. The days will come, the joyful days, when the same hand that dispersed them shall gather them again, v. 14, 15. They are cast out, but they are not cast off, they are not cast away. I will bring them again into their own land, and settle them there. And the following words (v. 16) may be understood as a promise; God will send for fishers and hunters, the Medes and Persians, that shall find them out in the countries where they are scattered, and send them back to their own land.

2. Their deliverance out of Babylon should be more memorable than their deliverance out of Egypt. The fresh mercy shall be so surprising, so welcome, that it shall even abolish the memory of the former. The bringing of Israel out of Egypt was done by might and power, this by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts, Zech. iv. 6. In this there was more of pardoning mercy for their captivity in Babylon had more in it of the punishment of sin than their bondage in Egypt.

3. Their deliverance out of captivity shall be accompanied with a blessed reformation, and they shall return cured of their inclination to idolatry. They had defiled their own land with their detestable things, v. 13. But, when they have smarted for so doing, they shall come and humble themselves before God, v. 19–21. They shall be quickened to return to him by the conversion of the Gentiles: The Gentiles shall come to thee from the ends of the earth; and therefore shall not we come? The prophet comforts himself with the hope of this: "O Lord! my strength and my fortress, I am now easy, since thou hast given me a prospect of multitudes that shall come to thee from the ends of the earth, both of Jewish converts and of Gentile proselytes." They were smarting for the sins of their ancestors: "Surely our fathers have inherited lies, vanity, and things wherein there is no profit. We are now sensible that they were cheated in their idolatrous worship; it did not prove what it promised, and therefore what have we to do any more with it?" They shall reason themselves out of their idolatry; and that reformation is likely to be durable which results from a rational conviction of the gross absurdity there is in sin, v. 20. They shall herein give honour to God, that they are brought to know his name by what they are made to know of his hand, v. 21. Nothing less than the mighty hand of divine grace, known experimentally, can make us know rightly the name of God as it is revealed to us.

4. Their deliverance out of captivity shall be a type and figure of the great salvation to be wrought out by the Messiah, who shall gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad.

CHAP. XVII

I. God convicts the Jews of the sin of idolatry and condemns them to captivity for it, ver. 1–4. II. He shows them the folly of all their carnal confidences, ver. 5–11. III. The prophet makes his appeal to God upon occasion of the malice of his enemies against him, committing himself to the divine protection, and begging God to appear for him, ver. 12–18. IV. God, by the prophet, warns the people to keep holy the sabbath day, assuring them that, if they did, it should be the lengthening out of their tranquillity, ver. 19–27.

Verses 1–4

The people had asked (ch. xvi. 10), What is our iniquity, and what is our sin?

I. The indictment is fully proved upon the prisoners, both the fact and the fault. They cannot plead Not guilty, for their sins are upon record in their own conscience; and they are obvious to the world, v. 1, 2. They are written before God in the most legible and indelible characters, Deut. xxxii. 34. They are written there with a pen of iron and with the point of a diamond; what is so written will not be worn out by time. The sin of sinners is never forgotten till it is forgiven. It is graven upon the table of their heart. What is graven on the heart cannot be erased. We need go no further, for proof of the charge, than the horns of their altars, on which the blood of their idolatrous sacrifices was sprinkled. Their neighbours will witness against them, and their own children shall remember the altars and the groves to which their parents took them when they were little, v. 2. The bias of their minds is still as strong as ever towards their idols, and they are not wrought upon either by the word or rod of God to abate their affection to them. It is written upon the horns of their altars, for they have given up their names to their idols and have bound themselves, as with cords.

II. The indictment being thus proved, the judgment is affirmed and the sentence ratified, v. 3, 4. Their treasures shall be given into the hands of strangers. Jerusalem is God's mountain in the field; it was built on a hill in the midst of a plain. All the treasures of that wealthy city will God give to the spoil. My mountain (so the whole land was, Ps. lxxviii. 54, Deut. xi. 11) you have turned into your high places for sin, have worshipped your idols upon the high hills (v. 2), and now they shall be given for a spoil in all your borders. They shall be made to part with their inheritance, and shall be carried captives into a strange land (v. 4). Sin works a discontinuance of our comforts and deprives us of the enjoyment of that which God has given us. But it is intimated that upon their repentance they shall recover possession again. For the present, you have kindled a fire in my anger, which burns so fiercely that it seems as if it would burn for ever.

Verses 5–11

The prophet's sermons were not all prophetical, but some of them practical.

I. Concerning the disappointment and vexation those will certainly meet with who depend upon creatures for success and relief when they are in trouble (v. 5, 6): Cursed (that is, miserable) is the man that does so, for he leans upon a broken reed. The sin here condemned is making flesh the arm we stay upon, the arm we work with and on which we depend for protection. God is his people's arm, Isa. xxxiii. 2. The great malignity there is in this sin; it is the departure of the evil heart of unbelief from the living God. Those that trust in man perhaps draw nigh to God with their mouth, but really their heart departs from him. Cleaving to the cistern is leaving the fountain, and is resented accordingly. He that puts a confidence in man puts a cheat upon himself; for (v. 6) he shall be like the heath in the desert, a sorry shrub, the product of barren ground, sapless, useless, and worthless; his comforts shall all fail him and he shall wither, be dejected and trampled on by all about him. When good comes he shall not see it, shall not share in it; when the times mend they shall not mend with him, but he shall inhabit the parched places in the wilderness; when others have a harvest he shall have none. Those that trust to their own righteousness and think they can do well enough without the grace of Christ, make flesh their arm, and their souls cannot prosper; they can neither produce the fruits of acceptable services to God nor reap the fruits of saving blessings from him; they dwell in a dry land.

II. Concerning the abundant satisfaction which those have who make God their confidence, who live by faith and repose themselves in him and his love in the most unquiet times, v. 7, 8. The duty required of us is to make the Lord our hope, his favour the good we hope for and his power the strength we hope in. He that does so shall be as a tree planted by the waters, a choice tree, about which great care has been taken to set it in the best soil. He shall be like a tree that spreads out its roots, and firmly fixed, spreads them out by the rivers, whence it draws abundance of sap. Those who make God their hope are easy, and enjoy a continual security and serenity of mind. A tree thus planted, thus watered, shall not see when heat comes, shall not sustain any damage from the most scorching heats of summer; it is so well moistened from its roots that it shall be sufficiently guarded against drought. They shall flourish like a tree that is always green, whose leaf does not wither; they shall be cheerful to themselves and beautiful in the eyes of others. They shall be fixed in an inward peace and satisfaction: They shall not be careful in a year of drought, when there is want of rain; for, as the tree has seed in itself, so it has its moisture. We need not be solicitous about the breaking of a cistern as long as we have the fountain. Those who trust in God, and by faith derive strength and grace from him, shall not cease from yielding fruit.

III. Concerning the sinfulness of man's heart, and the divine inspection it is always under, v. 9, 10. It is folly to trust in man, for he is not only frail, but false and deceitful. We think that we trust in God when really we do not, as appears by this, that our hopes and fears rise or fall according as second causes smile or frown. There is wickedness in our hearts which we ourselves are not aware of and do not suspect to be there. The heart, the conscience of man, in his corrupt and fallen state, is deceitful above all things. It calls evil good and good evil, puts false colours upon things. When men say in their hearts that there is no God, or he does not see; in these, and a thousand similar suggestions, the heart is deceitful. The case is bad indeed, if the conscience which should rectify the errors of the other faculties is itself a mother of falsehood and a ring-leader in the delusion. We cannot know our own hearts, nor what they will do in an hour of temptation (Hezekiah did not, Peter did not). Much less can we know the hearts of others, or have any dependence upon them. Whatever wickedness there is in the heart, God sees it: I the Lord search the heart. And this judgment which he makes of the heart is to give to every man according to his ways, and according to the fruit of his doings.

IV. Concerning the curse that attends wealth unjustly gotten (v. 11): He that gets riches and not by right, though he may make them his hope, shall never have joy of them. He who has got treasures by vanity and a lying tongue may hug himself in his success, and say, I am rich, but they shall be taken from him, or he from them. Those that get grace will be wise in the latter end, will have the comfort of it in death and to eternity (Prov. xix. 20); but those that place their happiness in the wealth of the world will rue the folly of it when it is too late. This is like the partridge that sits on eggs and hatches them not, but they are broken (as Job xxxix. 15), or stolen (as Isa. x. 14), or they become addled. The rich man takes a great deal of pains to get an estate together, and sits brooding upon it, but never has any comfort nor satisfaction in it.

Verses 12–18

The prophet retired for private meditation, alone with God.

I. He acknowledges the great favour of God to his people in setting up a revealed religion among them, and dignifying them with divine institutions (v. 12): A glorious high throne from the beginning is the place of our sanctuary. The temple at Jerusalem, where God manifested his special presence, where the people paid their homage to their Sovereign, and whither they fled for refuge in distress, was the place of their sanctuary. It was a throne of holiness, God's throne. Jerusalem is called the city of the great King, not only Israel's King, but the King of the whole earth, so that it might justly be deemed the royal city, of the world. It was from the beginning, 2 Chron. ii. 9. Jeremiah here mentions this either as a plea with God for mercy to their land, or as an aggravation of the sin of his people in forsaking God though his throne was among them.

II. He acknowledges the righteousness of God in abandoning those to ruin that revolted from their allegiance to him, v. 13. He speaks to God, as subscribing to the equity of it: O Lord! the hope of those in Israel that adhere to thee, all that forsake thee shall be ashamed. Let them be ashamed (so some read it); and so it is a petition for his grace, to make them penitently ashamed. "Those that depart from me, from the word of God which I have preached, do in effect depart from God"; as those that return to God are said to return to the prophet, ch. xv. 19. Those that depart from thee (so some read it) shall be written in the earth. They shall soon be blotted out, as that is which is written in the dust. They have forsaken the Lord, the fountain of living waters (that is, spring waters), for broken cisterns.

III. He prays to God for healing saving mercy for himself. Lord, heal me, and save me, v. 14. He was wounded in spirit upon many accounts. He was continually exposed to the malice of unreasonable men. To enforce this petition he pleads: Heal thou me, and then I shall be healed. If God hold us up, we shall live; if he protect us, we shall be safe. Thou shalt be my praise (so some read it); heal me, and save me, and thou shalt have the glory of it.

IV. He complains of the infidelity and daring impiety of the people to whom he preached. He had faithfully delivered God's message to them; and what answer has he to return to him that sent him? Behold, they say unto me, Where is the word of the Lord? Let it come now, v. 15; Isa. v. 19. They bantered the prophet. They denied the truth of what he said: "If that be the word of the Lord which thou speakest to us, where is it? Why is it not fulfilled?" They defied what he said. "Let God Almighty do his worst; let all he has said come to pass; we shall do well enough; the lion is not so fierce as he is painted," Amos v. 18.

V. He appeals to God concerning his faithful discharge of the duty to which he was called, v. 16. He continued constant to his work. His office, instead of being his protection, exposed him to contempt, and injury. "Yet," says he, "I have not hastened from being a pastor after thee; I have not left my work." Such a pastor Jeremiah was; and, though he met with as much difficulty and discouragement as ever any man did, yet he did not fly off as Jonah did, nor desire to be excused from going any more on God's errands. He kept up his affection to the people. Though they were very abusive to him, he was compassionate to them: I have not desired the woeful day. The day of the accomplishment of his prophecies would be a woeful day indeed to Jerusalem, and therefore he wished it might never come. God does not, and therefore ministers must not, desire the death of sinners, but rather that they may turn and live. He kept closely to his instructions. Though he might have curried favour with the people, if he had not been so sharp in his reproofs, yet he would deliver his message faithfully.

VI. He humbly begs God that he would own him, and protect him, and carry him on cheerfully in that work to which he had so plainly called him. Two things he here desires: 1. That he might have comfort in serving the God that sent him (v. 17): Be not thou a terror to me. He pleads, "Thou art my hope; and then nothing else is my fear. My dependence is upon thee; and therefore be not a terror to me." 2. That he might have courage in dealing with the people to whom he was sent, v. 18. Those persecute him who should have entertained and encouraged him. "Lord," says he, "let them be confounded (let them be ashamed of their obstinacy, or else let the judgments threatened be at length executed upon them), but let not me be confounded, let not me be terrified by their menaces, so as to betray my trust." As to his persecutors, he prays, Bring upon them the day of evil, in hope that the bringing of it upon them might prevent the bringing of it upon the country.

Verses 19–27

These verses are a sermon concerning sabbath-sanctification. This message concerning the sabbath was probably sent in the days of Josiah, for the furtherance of that work of reformation which he set on foot. It must be proclaimed at the court-gate first, the gate by which the kings of Judah come in and go out, v. 19. Let them be told their duty first; for, if sabbaths be not sanctified the rulers of Judah are to be contended with, for they are certainly wanting in their duty. He must also preach it in all the gates of Jerusalem. It is a matter of great and general concern; therefore let all take notice of it.

I. How the sabbath is to be sanctified, and what is the law concerning it, v. 21, 22. They must rest from their worldly employment on the sabbath day. They must bear no burden into the city nor out of it; husbandmen's burdens of corn must not be carried in, nor manure carried out; nor tradesmen's burdens, nor merchandise. There must not a loaded horse, or cart, or waggon, be seen on the sabbath day in the streets or the roads; the porters must not ply on that day, nor must the servants be suffered to fetch in provisions or fuel. It is a day of rest, and must not be made a day of labour, unless in case of necessity.

"Hallow you the sabbath, that is, consecrate it to the honour of God and spend it in his service and worship." Worldly business must be laid aside, that we may be intent upon that work which requires and deserves the whole man. "Take heed to yourselves, for it is at your peril if you rob God of that part of your time which he has reserved to himself." Let not the soul be burdened with the cares of this world on sabbath days. "This is no new imposition upon you, but is what I commanded your fathers."

II. How the sabbath had been profaned (v. 23): "Your fathers were required to keep holy the sabbath day, but they obeyed not; they hardened their necks against this as well as other commands that were given them." Where sabbaths are neglected all religion sensibly goes to decay.

III. What blessings God had in store for them if they would make conscience of sabbath-sanctification, v. 24–26. The court shall flourish. Kings in succession, with the other princes that sit upon the thrones of judgment, shall ride in great pomp through the gates of Jerusalem. The city shall flourish. Jerusalem, the holy city, shall remain for ever, shall for ever be inhabited, shall not be destroyed and dispeopled, as is threatened. The country shall flourish: The cities of Judah and the land of Benjamin shall be replenished with vast numbers of inhabitants, abounding in plenty and living in peace. The church shall flourish: Meat-offerings, and incense, and sacrifices of praise, shall be brought to the house of the Lord. A people truly flourish when religion flourishes among them. And this is the effect of sabbath-sanctification; when that branch of religion is kept up other instances of it are kept up likewise; but, when that is lost, devotion is lost either in superstition or in profaneness. The streams of all religion run either deep or shallow according as the banks of the sabbath are kept up or neglected.

IV. What judgments they must expect would come upon them if they persisted in the profanation of the sabbath (v. 27): "If you will not hearken to me in this matter, to keep the gates shut on sabbath days, so that there may be no unnecessary entering in, or going out, on that day—if you will break through the enclosure of the divine law, and lay that day in common with other days—know that God will kindle a fire in the gates of your city." Justly shall those gates be fired that are not used as they ought to be to shut out sin and to keep people in to an attendance on their duty.

CHAP. XVIII

I. God's ways in dealing with nations and kingdoms (ver. 1–6). If he threaten their ruin, yet upon their repentance he will return in mercy to them, and, when he is coming towards them in mercy, nothing but their sin will stop the progress of his favours, ver. 7–10. II. A particular demonstration of the folly of the men of Judah and Jerusalem in departing from their God to idols, ver. 11–17. III. The prophet's complaint to God of the base ingratitude and malice of his enemies, and his prayers against them, ver. 18–23.

Verses 1–10

The prophet is here sent to the potter's house, not to preach a sermon, but to prepare a sermon, or rather to receive it ready prepared. "Go to the potter's house, and observe how he manages his work, and there I will cause thee, by silent whispers, to hear my words. There thou shalt receive a message, to be delivered to the people." The prophet therefore went to the potter's house (v. 3) and took notice how he wrought his work upon the wheels. And (v. 4) when a lump of clay that he designed to form into one shape either proved too stiff, or had a stone in it, or came to be marred in his hand, he presently turned it into another shape; just as seems good to the potter. Ministers will make a good use of their converse with the business and affairs of this life if they learn thereby to speak more plainly and familiarly to people about the things of God, and to expound scripture comparisons. While Jeremiah looks carefully upon the potter's work, God darts into his mind these two great truths, which he must preach to the house of Israel:

I. That God has both an incontestable authority and an irresistible ability to form and fashion kingdoms and nations as he pleases to serve his own purposes. Cannot I do with you as this potter, saith the Lord? v. 6. God has a clearer title to a dominion over us than the potter has over the clay; for the potter only gives it its form, whereas we have both matter and form from God. This intimates that God has an incontestable sovereignty over us, and that it would be as absurd for us to dispute this as for the clay to quarrel with the potter. It is a very easy thing with God to make what use he pleases of us. One turn of the hand, one turn of the wheel, quite alters the shape of the clay, makes it a vessel, unmakes it, new-makes it. Thus are our times in God's hand. It is spoken here of nations. See this explained by Job (ch. xii. 23), Ps. cvii. 33, &c., and compare Job xxxiv. 29. If the potter's vessel be marred for one use, it shall serve for another; those that will not be monuments of mercy shall be monuments of justice. God formed us out of the clay (Job xxxiii. 6), and we are still as clay in his hands (Isa. lxiv. 8).

II. That, in the exercise of this authority and ability, he goes by fixed rules of equity and goodness. He dispenses favours indeed in a way of sovereignty, but never punishes by arbitrary power. In ways of judgment we may be sure that it is for our sins—national repentance will stop the progress of the judgments (v. 7, 8): If God speak concerning a nation to pluck up its fences that secure it, its fruit-trees that enrich it, pull down its fortifications, and so destroy it as either a vineyard or a city is destroyed—in this case, if that nation repent of their sins and reform their lives, turn every one from his evil way and return to God, God will return in mercy to them. It is an undoubted truth that a sincere conversion from the evil of sin will be an effectual prevention of the evil of punishment; and God can as easily raise up a penitent people from their ruins as the potter can make anew the vessel of clay when it was marred in his hand. When God is coming towards us in ways of mercy, if any stop be given to the progress of that mercy, it is nothing but sin that gives it (v. 9, 10). Sin is the great mischief-maker between God and a people; it forfeits the benefit of his promises and spoils the success of their prayers. It defeats his kind intentions concerning them (Hos. vii. 1).

Verses 11–17

The application of the general truths laid down in the foregoing part of the chapter to the Jews.

I. "Go, and tell them" (saith God), "Behold, I frame evil against you and devise a device against you. Providence in all its operations is plainly working towards your ruin."

II. He invites them by repentance and reformation to meet him and so to prevent his further proceedings against them: "Return you now everyone from his evil ways, that so God may turn from the evil he had purposed to do unto you, and that providence which seemed to be framed like a vessel on the wheel against you shall immediately be thrown into a new shape, and the issue shall be in favour of you."

III. He foresees their obstinacy, and their perverse refusal (v. 12): They said, "There is no hope. We may even despair of ever being delivered, for we are resolved that we will walk after our own devices. It is to no purpose for the prophets to say any more to us; we will do everyone the imagination of his own evil heart, and will not be under the restraint of the divine law." They call it liberty to live at large; whereas for a man to be a slave to his lusts is the worst of slaveries.

IV. He upbraids them with the monstrous folly of their obstinacy, and their hating to be reformed (v. 13): Ask you among the heathen, even those that had not the benefit of divine revelation, no oracles, no prophets. Who hath heard such a thing? The Ninevites, when thus warned, turned from their evil ways. But the virgin of Israel bids defiance to repentance, whatever conscience and Providence say to the contrary, and thus has done a horrible thing. She should have preserved herself pure and chaste for God, who had espoused her to himself; but she has alienated herself from him, and refuses to return to him. Wilful impenitence is the grossest self-murder; and that is a horrible thing.

V. He shows their folly in two things:

1. In the nature of the sin itself: they forsook God for idols (v. 14, 15): Will a thirsty traveller leave the snow, which, being melted, runs down from the mountains of Lebanon, and, passing over the rock of the field, flows in clear, clean, crystal streams? Will he pass these by, and think to better himself with some dirty puddle-water? Or shall the cold flowing waters that come from any other place be forsaken in the heat of summer? When men are parched with heat and drought, and meet with cooling refreshing streams, they will make use of them. The margin reads it, "Will a man that is travelling the road leave my fields, which are plain and level, for a rock, which is rough and hard, or for the snow of Lebanon, which, lying in great drifts, makes the road impassable? Or shall the running waters be forsaken for the strange cold waters? But my people have forgotten me (v. 15), have quitted a fountain of living waters for broken cisterns. They have burnt incense to idols that are not what they pretend to be nor can perform what is expected from them." They left the ancient paths, appointed by the divine law, walked in by all the saints, therefore the right way to their journey's end, a safe way. But, when they were advised to keep to the good old way, they positively said that they would not, ch. vi. 16. They chose by-paths; they walked in a way not cast up, not in the high-way, the King's highway. Such was the way of idolatry.

2. In the mischievous consequences of it. The direct tendency of it was to make their land desolate, and, consequently, themselves miserable. Everyone that passes by their land shall make his remarks upon it, and shall be astonished, and wag his head, some wondering, others commiserating, others triumphing in the desolations of a country that had been the glory of all lands. Their land being made desolate, in pursuance of their destruction, it is threatened (v. 17), I will scatter them as with an east wind, fierce and violent. That which completes their misery is, I will show them the back, and not the face, in the day of their calamity. Our calamities may be easily borne if God look towards us, and smile upon us, but if he turn the back upon us, if he show himself displeased, if he leave us to ourselves, we are quite undone.

Verses 18–23

The prophet here brings in his own affairs, for instruction to us.

I. The common methods of the persecutors, Jeremiah's enemies, v. 18.

1. They laid their heads together to consult what they should do against him, both to be revenged on him for what he had said and to stop his mouth for the future: They said, Come and let us devise devices against Jeremiah, not only against his person, but against the word he delivered to them.

2. Herein they pretended a mighty zeal for the church, which, they suggested, was in danger if Jeremiah was tolerated to preach as he did: "Come," say they, "let us silence and crush him, for the law shall not perish from the priest; the law of truth is in their mouths (Mal. ii. 6) and there we will seek it; the administration of ordinances according to the law is in their hands, and neither the one nor the other shall be wrested from them." Two things they insinuated: (1) That Jeremiah could not be himself a true prophet, but was a pretender, because he neither was commissioned by the priests nor concurred with the other prophets. (2) That the matter of his prophecies could not be from God, because it reflected sometimes upon the prophets and priests (ch. v. 31), deceiving the people (ch. xiv. 14). He had foretold that their heart should perish, and be astonished (ch. iv. 9), that the wise men should be dismayed (ch. viii. 9, 10), that the priests and prophets should be intoxicated, ch. xiii. 13.

3. They agreed to do all they could to blast his reputation: Come, let us smite him with the tongue.

4. To set others an example, they resolved that they would not themselves regard anything he said. Let us not give heed to any of his words; for, right or wrong, they will look upon them to be his words, and not the words of God.

5. That they may effectually silence him, they resolve to be the death of him (v. 23): All their counsel against me is to slay me. They hunt for the precious life.

II. The common relief of the persecuted. This we may see in the course that Jeremiah took. He immediately applied to his God by prayer.

1. He referred himself and his cause to God's cognizance, v. 19. They would not regard a word he said, would not admit his complaints, nor take any notice of his grievances; but, Lord (says he), do thou give heed to me. Hear the voice of my contenders, how noisy and clamorous they are, how false and malicious all they say is, and let them be judged out of their own mouth; cause their own tongues to fall upon them."

2. He complains of their base ingratitude to him (v. 20): "Shall evil be recompensed for good, and shall it go unpunished? Wilt not thou recompense me good for that evil?" They have dug a pit for my soul; they aimed to take away his life in a base, cowardly, clandestine way: they dug pits for him, which there was no fence against, Ps. cxix. 85. But how great the good he had done for them: Remember that I stood before thee to speak good for them; he had been an intercessor with God for them. But it was not strange that those who had forgotten their God did not know their best friends. It was very grievous to him, as the like was to David. Ps. xxxv. 13; cix. 4, For my love they are my adversaries. Thus do sinners deal with the great intercessor, crucifying him afresh, and speaking against him on earth, while his blood is speaking for them in heaven. It was a comfort to the prophet that, when they were so spiteful against him, he had the testimony of his conscience that he had done his duty to them.

3. He imprecates the judgments of God upon them, not from a revengeful disposition, but in indignation against their wickedness, v. 21–23. He prays, (1) That their families might be starved for want of bread. (2) That they might be cut off by the sword of war. (3) That the terrors and desolations of war might seize them suddenly and by surprise, that thus their punishment might answer to their sin (v. 22). (4) That they might be dealt with according to the desert of this sin, which was without excuse. (5) That God's wrath against them might be their ruin: Let them be overthrown before thee. Now this is not written for our imitation. Jeremiah was a prophet, and by the impulse of the spirit of prophecy, in the foresight of the ruin certainly coming upon his persecutors, might pray such prayers as we may not; our Master has taught us, by his precept and pattern, to bless those that curse us and pray for those that despitefully use us.

CHAP. XIX

The same melancholy theme is the subject of this chapter that was of those foregoing—the approaching ruin of Judah and Jerusalem for their sins. I. He must set their sins in order before them, ver. 4, 5. II. He must describe the particular judgments which were now coming apace upon them, ver. 6–9. III. He must do this in the valley of Tophet, with great solemnity, ver. 2, 3. IV. He must summon a company of the elders together to be witnesses of this, ver. 1. V. He must confirm this by a sign, which was the breaking of an earthen bottle, signifying that they should be dashed to pieces like a potter's vessel, ver. 10–13. VI. When he had done this in the valley of Tophet he ratified it in the court of the temple, ver. 14, 15.

Verses 1–9

The prophet is here sent with a message he had often delivered.

I. He must take of the elders and chief men, both in church and state, to be his auditors and witnesses to what he said—the ancients of the people and the ancients of the priests. Though the generality of the elders were disaffected to him, yet it is likely that there were some few who looked upon him as a prophet of the Lord, and would pay this respect to the heavenly vision.

II. He must go to the valley of the son of Hinnom, and deliver this message there; for the word of the Lord is not bound to any one place; as good a sermon may be preached in the valley of Tophet as in the gate of the temple. Christ preached on a mountain and out of a ship. This sermon must be preached in the valley of the son of Hinnom, 1. Because there they had been guilty of the vilest of their idolatries, the sacrificing of their children to Moloch. The sight of the place might serve to remind them. 2. Because there they should feel the sorest of their calamities; and, it being the common sink of the city, let them see what a miserable spectacle this magnificent city would be when it should be all like the valley of Tophet. God bids him proclaim there the words that I shall tell thee, when thou comest thither. God's messages were frequently not revealed to the prophets before they were to deliver them.

III. He must give general notice of a general ruin now shortly coming upon Judah and Jerusalem, v. 3. Hear you the word of the Lord, though it be a terrible word. Both rulers and ruled must attend to it; the kings of Judah, the king and his sons, the king and his privy-counsellors, must hear the word of the King of kings, for, high as they are, he is above them. The inhabitants of Jerusalem also must hear what God has to say to them. Both princes and people have contributed to the national guilt and must concur in the national repentance, or they will both share in the national ruin. The ruin of Eli's house is thus described (1 Sam. iii. 11), and of Jerusalem, 2 Kings xxi. 12.

IV. He must plainly tell them what their sins were, v. 4, 5. They are charged with apostasy from God (They have forsaken me) and abuse of the privileges of the visible church, with which they had been dignified—They have estranged this place. He charges them with an affection for and the adoration of false gods, such as neither they nor their fathers have known. They took them at a venture for their gods; being fond of change and novelty, they liked them the better and new fashions in religion were as grateful to their fancies as in other things. They also stand charged with murder, wilful murder, from malice prepense: They have filled this place with the blood of innocents. As if idolatry and murder, committed separately, were not bad enough, they have consolidated them into one complicated crime, that of burning their children in the fire to Baal (v. 5).

V. He must endeavour to affect them with the greatness of the desolation that was coming upon them. He must tell them that this valley of the son of Hinnom shall acquire a new name, the valley of slaughter (v. 6), for (v. 7) multitudes shall fall there by the sword, when either they sally out upon the besiegers and are repulsed or attempt to make their escape and are seized. And as for those that remain within the city, and will not capitulate with the besiegers, they shall perish for want of food, when first they have eaten the flesh of their sons and daughters and dearest friends, through the straitness wherewith their enemies shall straiten them, v. 9. And, lastly, the whole city shall be desolate. That place which holiness had made the joy of the whole earth sin had made the reproach and shame of the whole earth.

VI. He must assure them that all their attempts to prevent and avoid this ruin, so long as they continued impenitent and unreformed, would be fruitless and vain (v. 7): I will make void the counsel of Judah and Jerusalem in this place. There is no fleeing from God's justice but by fleeing to his mercy.

Verses 10–15

The message delivered in the foregoing verses is here enforced.

I. By a visible sign. The prophet was to take along with him an earthen bottle (v. 1), and, when he had delivered his message, he was to break the bottle to pieces (v. 10). He had compared this people, in the chapter before, to the potter's clay, which is easily marred in the making. But some might say, "It is past that with us; we have been made and hardened long since." "And what though you be," says he, "the potter's vessel is as soon broken in the hand of any man as the vessel while it is soft clay is marred in the potter's hand, and its case is, in this respect, much worse, that the vessel while it is soft clay, though it be marred, may be moulded again, but, after it is hardened, when it is broken it can never be pieced again." Sacramental signs, and teaching by symbols was anciently used. 1. As the bottle was easily and irrecoverably broken, so shall Judah and Jerusalem be broken by the Chaldean army, v. 11. They depended much upon the firmness of their constitution, and the fixedness of their courage, which they thought hardened them like a vessel of brass; but the prophet shows that all that did but harden them like a vessel of earth, which, though hard, is brittle and sooner broken than that which is not so hard. It is God himself, who made them, that resolves to unmake them: I will break this people and this city, dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel; the doom of the heathen (Ps. ii. 9, Rev. ii. 27), but now Jerusalem's doom, Isa. xxx. 14. A potter's vessel, when once broken, cannot be made whole again, cannot be cured. Jerusalem shall be an utter ruin; no hand can repair it but his that broke it; and if they return to him, though he has torn, he will heal. 2. This was done in Tophet, to signify two things: (1) They shall bury in Tophet till there be no place to bury any more there. (2) I will make this city as Tophet. As they had filled the valley of Tophet with the slain they sacrificed to their idols, so God will fill the whole city with the slain that shall fall as sacrifices to the justice of God. Dead carcases, and other filth of the city, were carried thither, and a fire was continually kept there for the burning of it. So execrable a place was it looked upon to be that, in the language of our Saviour's time, hell was called, in allusion to it, Gehenna, the valley of Hinnom. Even the houses of Jerusalem, and those of the kings of Judah, shall be defiled as the place of Tophet (v.

13), because of the idolatries that have been committed there. The flat roofs of their houses were sometimes used by devout people as convenient places for prayer (Acts x. 9), and by idolaters they were used as high places, on which they sacrificed to strange gods, especially to the host of heaven, the sun, moon, and stars. We read of those that worshipped the host of heaven upon the house-tops (Zeph. i. 5). This sin upon the house-tops brought a curse into the house.

II. By a solemn recognition and ratification of what he had said in the court of the Lord's house, v. 14, 15. The prophet returned from Tophet to the temple, which stood upon the hill over that valley, and there confirmed what he had said in the valley of Tophet. 1. The accomplishment of the prophecies is here the judgment threatened. The people flattered themselves that the threatening was but to frighten them, but the prophet tells them that they deceive themselves: For thus saith the Lord of hosts, who is able to make his words good, I will bring upon this city, and upon all her towns, all the evil that I have pronounced against it. God will appear as terrible against sin and sinners as the scripture makes him. 2. The contempt of the prophecies is here the sin charged upon them. It is because they have hardened their necks, and would not hear my words.

CHAP. XX

Such plain dealing, if it did not convince and humble men, would provoke and exasperate them. I. Jeremiah persecuted by Pashur for preaching that sermon, ver. 1, 2. II. Pashur threatened for so doing, and the word which Jeremiah had preached confirmed, ver. 3–6. III. Jeremiah complaining to God concerning it (ver. 7–10), encouraging himself in God, lodging his appeal with him, not doubting but that he shall yet praise him (ver. 11–13), and yet peevishly cursing the day of his birth (ver. 14–18), by which it appears that he was a man subject to like passions as we are.

Verses 1–6

I. Pashur's unjust displeasure against Jeremiah, and the fruits of that displeasure, v. 1, 2. Pashur was a priest, and therefore should have protected Jeremiah, who was a priest too, and the more because he was a prophet of the Lord, whose interests the priests ought to consult. But this priest was a persecutor. He was the son of Immer; that is, he was of the sixteenth course of the priests, of which Immer, when these courses were first settled by David, was father (1 Chron. xxiv. 14). Thus this Pashur is distinguished from another of the same name mentioned ch. xxi. 1, who was of the fifth course. This Pashur was chief governor in the temple; perhaps he was only so pro tempore—for a short period, the course he was head of being now in waiting. This was Jeremiah's great enemy. We cannot suppose that Pashur was one of those that went with Jeremiah to the valley of Tophet to hear him prophesy; but, when he came into the courts of the Lord's house (v. 1): He heard that Jeremiah prophesied these things, and could not bear that he should dare to preach in the courts of the Lord's house, where he was chief governor, without his leave. Being incensed at Jeremiah, 1. He smote him, struck him with his hand or staff of authority. Perhaps it was a blow intended only to disgrace him. The method of proceeding here was illegal; the high priest, and the rest of the priests, ought to have been consulted, and Jeremiah's credentials examined. But these rules are set aside as mere formalities; right or wrong, Jeremiah must be run down. 2. He put him in the stocks. He continued in it all night, and in a public place too, in the high gate of Benjamin, which was in, or by, the house of the Lord, probably a gate through which they passed between the city and the temple. Pashur intended thus to chastise him, to expose him to contempt, that he might not be regarded if he did prophesy.

II. God's just displeasure against Pashur. On the morrow Pashur gave Jeremiah his discharge, brought him out of the stocks (v. 3). And now Jeremiah has a message from God to him. When he brought him out of the stocks, then God put a word into the prophet's mouth, which would awaken his conscience, if he had any.

1. Did he aim to establish himself by silencing one that told him of his faults and would be likely to lessen his reputation with the people? He shall not gain this point; for, (1) Though the prophet should be silent, his own conscience shall make him always uneasy. To confirm this he shall have a name given him, Magor-missabib—Terror round about, or Fear on every side. It seems to be a proverbial expression, bespeaking a man in despair, in fear on every side. The wicked flee when no man pursues, are in great fear where no fear is. This shall be Pashur's case (v. 4): "Behold, I will make thee a terror to thyself; and thy own imagination shall create thee a constant uneasiness." Those that will not hear of their faults from God's prophets, shall be made to hear of them from conscience, which is a reprover in their own bosoms. "I will make thee a terror to all thy friends; thou shalt express thyself with so much horror that all thy friends shall choose to stand aloof from thy torment." (2) His friends shall all fail him. God lets him live miserably, like Cain in the land of shaking, in such a continual consternation that wherever he goes it is asked, "What makes this man in such a continual terror?" It shall be answered, "It is God's hand upon him for putting Jeremiah in the stocks." His friends, who should encourage him, shall fall by the sword of the enemy, and his eyes shall behold it. (3) He shall find that divine vengeance is waiting for him (v. 6); he and his family shall go into captivity, even to Babylon; he shall die a captive, and shall be buried in his chains, he and all his friends. Thus far is the doom of Pashur.

2. Did he aim to keep the people easy, to prevent the destruction that Jeremiah prophesied, and by sinking his reputation make his words fall to the ground? It appears by v. 6 that he himself set up for a prophet, and told the people that they should have peace. He prophesied lies to them; and because Jeremiah's prophecy contradicted his, therefore he set himself against him. But could he gain his point? Jeremiah stands to what he has said against Judah and Jerusalem. (1) The country shall be ruined (v. 4): I will give all Judah into the hand of the king of Babylon. It had long been God's own land, but he will now transfer his title to it to Nebuchadnezzar, he shall be master of the country and dispose of the inhabitants as he pleases, but none shall escape him. (2) The city shall be ruined too, v. 5. The king of Babylon shall carry all that is valuable in it to Babylon. He shall seize their military stores (here called the strength of the city) and turn them against them. He shall carry off all their wares and merchandise, here called their labours. He shall plunder their fine houses, and take away their furniture, here called their precious things. He shall rifle the exchequer, and take away the jewels of the crown and all the treasures of the kings of Judah.

Verses 7–13

Jeremiah is here, through the infirmity of the flesh, strangely agitated within himself. In these verses it appears that, upon occasion of the great injury that Pashur did to Jeremiah, there was a struggle in his breast between his graces and his corruptions.

I. Here is a sad representation of the wrong that was done him. He complains,

1. That he was ridiculed and laughed at; they made a jest of everything he said and did (v. 7, 8): I am in derision; I am mocked. And what was it that thus exposed him to contempt and scorn? It was nothing but his faithful and zealous discharge of the duty of his office, v. 8. They could find nothing for which to deride him but his preaching; it was the word of the Lord that was made a reproach. Two things they derided him for: (1) The manner of his preaching: Since he spoke, he cried out. He had always been a lively affectionate preacher, and since he began to speak in God's name he always spoke as a man in earnest; he cried aloud and did not spare. Lively preachers are the scorn of careless unbelieving hearers. (2) The matter of his preaching: He cried violence and spoil. He reproved them for violence and spoil towards one another; and he prophesied violence and spoil should be brought upon them as punishment; for the former they ridiculed him as overprecise, for the latter as over-credulous. This was bad enough, yet he complains further.

2. That he was plotted against and his ruin contrived; he was not only ridiculed as a weak man, but reproached and misrepresented as a bad man and dangerous to the government, v. 10. But there were those that acted with more subtlety. (1) They spoke ill of him behind his back. I heard, at second hand, the defaming of many, fear on every side (of many Magor-missabibs, so some read it), of many such men as Pashur was. They represented Jeremiah as a man that instilled fears and jealousies on every side into the minds of the people, and so made them uneasy under the government, and disposed them to a rebellion. See how Jeremiah's enemies contrived the matter: Report, say they, and we will report it. "Let some very bad thing be said of him, which may render him obnoxious to the government, and, though it be false, we will second it, and spread it, and add to it." (2) They flattered him to his face, that they might get something from him on which to ground an accusation, as the spies that came to Christ, Luke xx. 20; xi. 53, 54. "If we accost him kindly we shall wheedle him to speak some reasonable words; and then we shall prevail against him, and take our revenge on him for telling us of our faults and threatening us with the judgment of God."

II. Here is an account of the temptation he was in under this affliction. 1. He was tempted to quarrel with God for making him a prophet. This he begins with (v. 7): O Lord! thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived. This is the language of Jeremiah's folly and corruption. He knew how the prophets before him had been persecuted, and had no reason to expect better treatment. God had expressly told him that all the princes, priests, and people of the land would fight against him (ch. i. 18, 19). Christ thus told his disciples what opposition they should meet with, that they might not be offended, John xvi. 1, 2. But the words may very well be read thus: Thou hast persuaded me, and I was persuaded. And this agrees best with what follows. Jeremiah was very backward to undertake the prophetic office; he pleaded that he was under age and unfit for the service; but God overruled his pleas, and told him that he must go, ch. i. 6, 7. "Now, Lord," says he, "since thou hast put this office upon me, why dost thou not stand by me in it? Had I thrust myself upon it, I might justly have been in derision; but why am I so when thou didst thrust me into it?" 2. He was tempted to quit his work partly because he himself met with so much hardship in it and partly because those to whom he was sent, instead of being edified and made better, were exasperated and made worse (v. 9).

III. An account of his faithful adherence to his work and cheerful dependence on his God notwithstanding.

1. He found the grace of God mighty in him to keep him to his business, "I said, in my haste, I will speak no more in his name; what I have in my heart to deliver I will stifle and suppress. But I soon found it was in my heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones, which glowed inwardly, and must have vent; it was impossible to smother it; while I kept silence from good my heart was hot within me, it was pain and grief to me, and I must speak, that I might be refreshed"; Ps. xxxix. 2, 3; Job xxxii. 20. Jeremiah was soon weary with forbearing to preach, and could not contain himself; nothing puts faithful ministers to pain so much as being silenced, nor to terror so much as silencing themselves. Their convictions will soon triumph, for woe is unto me if I preach not the gospel, whatever it cost me, 1 Cor. ix. 16.

2. He was assured of God's presence with him, which would be sufficient to baffle all the attempts of his enemies (v. 11): "They say, We shall prevail against him. But I am sure that they shall not prevail, they shall not prosper. I can set them at defiance, for the Lord is with me, to take my part against them (Rom. viii. 31). He is with me to bear me up under the burden. He is with me to make the word I preach answer the end he designs. He is with me to strike a terror upon them, and so to overcome them." The most formidable enemies that act against us appear despicable when we see the Lord for us as a mighty terrible one, Neh. iv. 14. Jeremiah speaks now with a good assurance: If the Lord be with me, my persecutors shall stumble, so that, when they pursue me, they shall not overtake me (Ps. xxvii. 2), and then they shall be greatly ashamed of their impotent malice and fruitless attempts.

3. He appeals to God against them as a righteous Judge, and prays judgment upon his cause, v. 12. He that tries the righteous tries the unrighteous too, for he sees the reins and the heart, and therefore can pass an unerring judgment on their words and actions. Unto thee have I opened my cause. Not but that God perfectly knew his cause, and all the merits of it, but the cause we commit to God we must spread before him. He knows it, but he will know it from us, and allows us to be particular in the opening of it, not to affect him, but to affect ourselves.

4. He greatly rejoices and praises God, in a full confidence that God would appear for his deliverance, v. 13. In a transport of joy he stirs up himself and others to give God the glory of it: Sing unto the Lord, praise you the Lord. Here appears a great change with him since he began this discourse; the clouds are blown over, his complaints all silenced and turned into thanksgiving. It was the lively exercise of faith that made this happy change, that turned his sighs into songs and his tremblings into triumphs. "He hath delivered me formerly when I was in distress, and now of late out of the hand of Pashur, and he will continue to deliver me, 2 Cor. i. 10. He will deliver my soul from the sin that I am in danger of falling into when I am thus persecuted."

Verses 14–18

What is the meaning of this? Does there proceed out of the same mouth blessing and cursing? Could he that said so cheerfully (v. 13), Sing unto the Lord, praise you the Lord, say so passionately (v. 14), Cursed be the day wherein I was born? It seems to be an account of the ferment he had been in while he was in the stocks, out of which by faith and hope he had recovered himself, rather than a new temptation. When grace has got the victory it is good to remember the struggles, that we may be ashamed of ourselves and our own folly, may admire the goodness of God in not taking us at our word.

I. The prophet's language in this temptation. 1. He fastened a brand of infamy upon his birthday, as Job did in a heat (ch. iii. 1). It is a wish that he had never been born. Judas in hell has reason to wish so (Matt. xxvi. 24), but no man on earth has reason to wish so, because he knows not but he may yet become a vessel of mercy, much less has any good man reason to wish so. 2. He wished ill to the messenger that brought his father the news of his birth, v. 15. He is very fierce in the curses he pronounces (v. 16): "Let him be as the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, which the Lord utterly overthrew, and repented not. Let him hear the cry of the invading besieging enemy in the morning, as soon as he is stirring; and by noon let him hear their shouting for victory. And thus let him live in constant terror." 3. He is angry that he was not slain from the womb, that his first breath was not his last, and that he was not strangled as soon as he came into the world, v. 17. 4. He thinks his present calamities sufficient to justify these passionate wishes (v. 18): "Wherefore came I forth out of the womb, where I lay hid, was not hated, where I lay safely and knew no evil, to see all this labour and sorrow, to have my days consumed with shame, to be continually abused, to have my life wasted and worn away by trouble?"

II. What use we may make of this. It is not recorded for our imitation, and yet we may learn good lessons from it. 1. See the vanity of human life and the vexation of spirit that attends it. 2. See the folly and absurdity of sinful passion, how unreasonably it talks when it is suffered to ramble. What nonsense is it to curse a day—to curse a messenger for the sake of his message! When the heart is hot, let the tongue be bridled, Ps. xxxix. 1, 2.

CHAP. XXI

The prophecies of this book are not placed here in the same order in which they were preached; for there are chapters after this which concern Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, and Jeconiah, who all reigned before Zedekiah, in whose reign the prophecy of this chapter bears date. Here is, I. The message which Zedekiah sent to the prophet, to desire him to enquire of the Lord for them, ver. 1, 2. II. The answer which Jeremiah, in God's name, sent to that message, in which, 1. He foretells the certain and inevitable ruin of the city, ver. 3–7. 2. He advises the people to go over to the king of Babylon, ver. 8–10. 3. He advises the king and his family to repent and reform (ver. 11–14).

Verses 1–7

I. A very humble message which king Zedekiah, when he was in distress, sent to Jeremiah the prophet. He humbled himself so far as to desire the prophet's assistance, but not so far as to take his advice, or to be ruled by him.

1. The distress which king Zedekiah was now in: Nebuchadrezzar made war upon him, invaded the land, besieged the city, and had now actually invested it.

2. The messengers he sent—Pashur and Zephaniah. It would have been better if he had desired a personal conference with the prophet, which he might have had if he would so far have humbled himself. These priests when they were commanded by the king, must carry a respectful message to the prophet, which was a mortification to them and an honour to Jeremiah.

3. The message itself: Enquire, I pray thee, of the Lord for us, v. 2. Now that the Chaldean army had got into their borders, they were convinced that Jeremiah was a true prophet, though loth to own it. Under this conviction they desire him to stand their friend with God. "Enquire of the Lord for us; ask him what course we shall take in our present strait, for the measures we have hitherto taken are all broken." Those that will not take the direction of God's grace how to get clear of their sins would yet be glad of the directions of his providence how to get clear of their troubles. "Entreat the Lord for us; be an intercessor for us with God." It may be the Lord will deal with us now according to the wondrous works he wrought for our fathers, that the enemy may raise the siege and go up from us. All their care is to get rid of their trouble, not to make their peace with God and be reconciled to him—"That our enemy may go up from us," not, "That our God may return to us." Thus Pharaoh (Exod. x. 17). All their hope is that God had done wondrous works in the deliverance of Jerusalem when Sennacherib besieged it, at the prayer of Isaiah (2 Chron. xxxii. 20, 21), and who can tell but he may destroy these besiegers at the prayer of Jeremiah? But they did not consider how different the character of Zedekiah and his people was from that of Hezekiah and his people: those were days of general reformation and piety, these of general corruption and apostasy.

II. A very startling cutting reply which God, by the prophet, sent to that message. God knows their hearts better than Jeremiah does, and sends them an answer which has scarcely one word of comfort in it. He sends it to them in the name of the Lord God of Israel (v. 3), to intimate to them that though God allowed himself to be called the God of Israel, and had done great things for Israel formerly, and had still great things in store for Israel, yet this should stand the present generation in no stead, who were Israelites in name only. It is here foretold,

1. That God will render all their endeavours for their own security fruitless and ineffectual (v. 4).

2. That the besiegers shall in a little time make themselves masters of Jerusalem, and of all its wealth and strength: I will assemble those in the midst of this city who are now surrounding it.

3. That God himself will be their enemy; and then I know not who can befriend them, no, not Jeremiah himself (v. 5). Those who rebel against God may justly expect that he will make war upon them.

4. That those who, for their own safety, decline sallying out upon the besiegers, and so avoid their sword, shall yet not escape the sword of God's justice (v. 6): I will smite those that abide in the city, both man and beast; they shall die of a great pestilence.

5. That the king himself, and all the people that escape the sword, famine, and pestilence, shall fall into the hands of the Chaldeans (v. 7): They shall not spare them, nor have pity on them.

Verses 8–14

By the civil message which the king sent to Jeremiah it appeared that both he and the people began to have a respect for him; but the reply which God obliges him to make is enough to crush the little respect they begin to have for him, and to exasperate them against him more than ever. Not only the predictions in the foregoing verses, but the prescriptions in these, were provoking.

I. He advises the people to surrender to the Chaldeans, as the only means left to save their lives, v. 8–10. This counsel was displeasing to those who were flattered by their false prophets into a desperate resolution to hold out to the last, trusting to the strength of their walls and the courage of their soldiery, or to their foreign aids to raise the siege. The prophet assures them, "The city shall be given into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall not only plunder it, but burn it with fire, for God himself hath set his face against this city for evil and not for good; and therefore, if you would make the best of bad, you must beg quarter of the Chaldeans, and surrender prisoners of war." It was the best course they could take now that God was against them. Both the law and the prophets had often set before them life and death in another sense—life if they obey the voice of God, death if they persist in disobedience, Deut. xxx. 19. The expression (v. 8): Behold, I set before you the way of life and the way of death, denotes not, as that, a fair proposal, but a melancholy dilemma, advising them of two evils to choose the less. He that abides in the city shall certainly die either by the sword without the walls or famine or pestilence within. But he that can quit his vain hopes, go out, and fall to the Chaldeans, his life shall be given him for a prey; he shall save his life, as a prey is taken from the mighty. They thought to make a prey of the camp of the Chaldeans, as their ancestors did that of the Assyrians (Isa. xxxiii. 23), but if by yielding at discretion they can but save their lives, that is all the prey they must promise themselves.

II. He advises the king and princes to reform. In the reply there was a particular word for the house of the king to give them wholesome counsel (v. 11, 12): "Execute judgment in the morning; do it carefully and diligently. Do it quickly, and do not delay to do justice upon appeals made to you. You would be delivered out of the hand of those that distress you, and expect that God should do you justice; see then that you do justice to those that apply to you, and deliver them out of the hand of their oppressors, lest my fury go out like fire, and you fare worst who think to escape best, because of the evil of your doings." It was the evil of their doings that kindled the fire of God's wrath. Thus plainly does he deal even with the house of the king; for those that would have the benefit of a prophet's prayers must thankfully take a prophet's reproofs. The princes must begin, and set a good example, and then the people will be invited to reform. They must use their power for the punishment of wrong, and then the people will be obliged to reform. He reminds them that they are the house of David, and therefore should tread in his steps, who executed judgment and justice to his people.

III. He shows them the vanity of all their hopes so long as they continued unreformed, v. 13, 14. Jerusalem is an inhabitant of the valley, guarded with mountains on all sides, which were their natural fortifications, making it difficult for an army to approach them. It is a rock of the plain, which made it difficult for an enemy to undermine them. These advantages they trusted to more than to the power and promise of God; and, thinking their city impregnable, they set the judgments of God at defiance, saying, "Who shall come down against us?" God soon shows the vanity of that challenge, Who shall come down against us? when he says (v. 13), Behold, I am against thee. He comes against them as a judge that cannot be resisted; for he says (v. 14), I will punish you, by due course of law, according to the fruit of your doings.

CHAP. XXII

Sermons which Jeremiah preached at court, in some preceding reigns, that it might appear they had had fair warning. I. A message sent to the royal family, as it should seem in the reign of Jehoiakim, relating partly to Jehoahaz, who was carried away captive into Egypt, and partly to Jehoiakim, who succeeded him and was now upon the throne, ver. 1–9. Jehoahaz, called here Shallum, is lamented, ver. 10–12. Jehoiakim is reproved and threatened, ver. 13–19. II. Another message sent them in the reign of Jehoiachin (alias, Jeconiah) the son of Jehoiakim. He is charged with an obstinate refusal to hear, and it is foretold that in him Solomon's house should fail, ver. 20–30.

Verses 1–9

I. Orders given to Jeremiah to go and preach before the king (v. 2): Hear the word of the Lord, O king of Judah! The king of Judah is here spoken to as sitting upon the throne of David, who was a man after God's own heart, as holding his dignity and power by the covenant made with David; let him therefore conform to his example, that he may have the benefit of the promises made to him.

II. Instructions given him what to preach.

1. He must tell them what the Lord their God required of them, v. 3. They must take care, (1) That they do all the good they can with the power they have. They must do justice in defence of those that were injured. (2) That they do no hurt with it. They must do no wrong to the stranger, fatherless, and widow; for these God does in a particular manner take under his tuition, Exod. xxii. 21, 22.

2. He must assure them that the faithful discharge of their duty would advance their prosperity, v. 4. There shall then be an uninterrupted succession, upon the throne of David, enjoying tranquillity, and living in dignity. The most effectual way to preserve the dignity of the government is to do the duty of it.

3. He must likewise assure them that the iniquity, if they persisted in it, would be the ruin of their family (v. 5). Sin has often been the ruin of royal palaces, though ever so stately, ever so strong. Sin will be the ruin of the houses of princes as well as of mean men.

4. He must show how fatal their wickedness would be to their kingdom as well as to themselves, to Jerusalem especially, the royal city, v. 6–9. Judah and Jerusalem had been valuable in God's eyes: Thou art Gilead unto me and the head of Lebanon. Their lot was cast in a place that was rich and pleasant as Gilead; Zion was a stronghold, as stately as Lebanon: this they trusted as their security. But the country that is now fruitful as Gilead shall be made a wilderness. The cities that are now strong as Lebanon shall be cities not inhabited. There shall be those that shall do it effectually (v. 7): "I will prepare destroyers against thee; I will sanctify them" (so the word is). And who can contend with destroyers of God's preparing? There shall be those who shall be ready to justify God in the doing of it (v. 8, 9); persons of many nations, when they pass by the ruins of this city in their travels, will ask, "Wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this city?" Ask the next man you meet, and he will tell you it was because they changed their gods. God never casts any off until they first cast him off.

Verses 10–19

I. Here is the doom of Shallum, who doubtless is the same with Jehoahaz, for he is that son of Josiah king of Judah who reigned in the stead of Josiah his father (v. 11), which Jehoahaz did by the act of the people, who made him king though he was not the eldest son, 2 Kings xxiii. 30; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 1. Perhaps the people preferred him before his elder brother because they thought him a more active young man, and fitter to rule; but God soon showed them the folly of their injustice, for within three months the king of Egypt came upon him, deposed him, and carried him away prisoner into Egypt, as God had threatened, Deut. xxviii. 68. It does not appear that any of the people were taken into captivity with him. We have the story 2 Kings xxiii. 34; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 4. Now here, 1. The people are directed to lament him rather than his father Josiah: "Weep not for the dead, weep not any more for Josiah." Jeremiah had been himself a true mourner for him (2 Chron. xxxv. 25): yet now he will have them to turn their tears into another channel. They must weep sorely for Jehoahaz, who had gone into Egypt. Josiah went to the grave in peace and honour. Weep not for him, but for his unhappy son, who is likely to live and die in disgrace and misery, a wretched captive. Dying saints may be justly envied, while living sinners are justly pitied. He shall never return out of captivity, as he and his people expected, but shall die there. They were loth to believe this, therefore it is repeated here again and again. This came of his forsaking the good example of his father, and usurping the right of his elder brother.

II. The doom of Jehoiakim, who succeeded him. He ruled no better, and fared no better at last.

1. His sins reproved. Jehoiakim is not here charged with idolatry, but the crimes for which he is here reproved are pride, and affection and splendour; as if all the business of a king were to look great, and to do good were to be the least of his care. He must build himself a stately palace, a wide house, and large chambers, v. 14. He must have windows cut out after the newest fashion. The rooms must be ceiled with cedar, the richest sort of wood, painted with minium, or vermilion, or as some read it, with indigo. Those therefore that are enlarging their houses, and making them more sumptuous, have need to look well to the frame of their own spirits in the doing of it, and carefully to watch against vain-glory. He reigned his first three years by the permission of the king of Egypt, and all the rest by the permission of the king of Babylon; and yet he that was no better than a viceroy will covet to vie with the greatest monarchs. He thought he must reign without any disturbance or interruption because he had enclosed himself in cedar (v. 15). Some think he is here charged with sacrilege, and robbing the house of God to beautify and adorn his own house. He cuts him out my windows (so it is in the margin), which some understand as if he had taken windows out of the temple to put into his own palace and then painted them with vermilion, that it might not be discovered. He is here charged with extortion and oppression, violence and injustice. He built his house by unrighteousness, with money unjustly got and materials not honestly come by. God takes notice of the wrong done by the greatest of men to their poor servants and labourers, and will repay those, in justice, that will not in justice pay those whom they employ. That which was at the bottom of all was covetousness, that love of money which is the root of all evil. Thy eyes and thy heart are not but for covetousness; for that, and nothing else. In covetousness the heart walks after the eyes: it is therefore called the lust of the eye, 1 John ii. 16; Job xxxi. 7. That which aggravated all his sins was that he was the son of a good father, who had left him a good example, if he would but have followed it (v. 15, 16). Jeremiah tells him he was directed to do his duty by his father's practice: He did judgment and justice. He not only did not abuse his power for the support of wrong, but he used it for the maintaining of right. He judged the cause of the poor and needy. He was encouraged to do his duty by his father's prosperity. God accepted him: "Was not this to know me, saith the Lord?" He had the comfort of it Did he not eat and drink soberly and cheerfully, so as to fit himself for his business, for strength and not for drunkenness? Eccles. x. 17. God blessed him with plenty, and he had the comfortable enjoyment of it himself and was hospitable and very charitable. It was Jehoiakim's pride that he had built a fine house, but Josiah's true praise that he kept a good house. It is better to live with Josiah in an old-fashioned house, and do good, than live with Jehoiakim in a stately house, and leave debts unpaid.

2. Jehoiakim's doom faithfully read, v. 18, 19. We may suppose that it was in peril of his own life that Jeremiah here foretold the shameful death of Jehoiakim; but thus saith the Lord concerning him and therefore thus saith he. He shall die unlamented; he shall make himself so odious by his oppression and cruelty that none shall do him the honour of dropping one tear for him. His relations shall not lament him. His subjects shall not lament him, as they used to do at the graves of their princes. Jehoiakim shall be buried with the burial of an ass, that is, he shall have no burial at all, but his dead body shall be cast into a ditch or upon a dunghill; it shall be drawn, or dragged, ignominiously, and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem. Josephus says that Nebuchadnezzar slew him at Jerusalem, and left his body thus exposed, somewhere at a great distance from the gates of Jerusalem.

Verses 20–30

This prophecy seems to have been calculated for the inglorious reign of Jeconiah, or Jehoiachin, the son of Jehoiakim, who reigned but three months, and was then carried captive to Babylon, where he lived many years, ch. lii. 31.

I. The desolations of the kingdom were now hastening on apace, v. 20–23. Jerusalem and Judah are here spoken to as a single person, "I spoke unto thee in thy prosperity, spoke by my servants the prophets, reproofs, admonitions, counsels, but thou saidest, I will not hear." It is common for those that live at ease to live in contempt of the word of God. This has been thy manner from thy youth. "When thou seest all thy lovers destroyed, when thou findest thy idols unable to help thee and thy foreign alliances failing thee, thou wilt cry, Help, help, or we are lost; thou wilt lift up thy voice in fearful shrieks upon Lebanon and Bashan. Thou wilt cry from the passages, from the roads. Thou wilt cry to all about thee; but in vain, for (v. 22) the wind shall eat up all thy pastors, that should provide for thy safety; they shall be blasted, and withered, as buds and blossoms are by a bleak or freezing wind. Thy lovers, that thou hast an affection for, shall go into captivity, and shall not be able to save themselves. When there appears no relief from any of thy confederates, then shalt thou be ashamed and confounded for all thy wickedness," v. 22. The Jewish state is here called an inhabitant of Lebanon, because that famous forest was within their border (v. 23), and all their country was well-guarded as with Lebanon's natural fastnesses; but so proud were they that they are said to make their nest in the cedars, out of the reach of all danger, whence they looked with contempt upon all about them. "But, how gracious wilt thou be when pangs come upon thee! Then thou wilt humble thyself before God and promise amendment." Some give another sense of it: "What will all thy pomp and wealth avail thee? No more than a woman in travail, full of pains and fears, can take comfort in her ornaments while she is in that condition."

II. Here is a prophecy of the disgrace of the king; his name was Jeconiah, but he is here once and again called Coniah, in contempt. He shall be carried away into captivity and shall spend and end his days in bondage. God will abandon him, v. 24. "Though he were the signet upon my right hand I will pluck him thence." The godly kings of Judah had been as signets on God's right hand, near and dear to him; he had gloried in them. The king of Babylon shall seize him. Those know not what mischiefs they lie exposed to who have thrown themselves out of God's protection, v. 25. The Chaldeans had a spite to Coniah; they sought his life (they are those whose face thou fearest). He and his family shall be carried to Babylon, where they shall wear out many tedious years in a miserable captivity—he and his mother (v. 26), he and his seed (v. 28), that is, he and all the royal family—shall all be cast out to another country, a country where they were not born, a land which they know not, in which they have no acquaintance from whom to expect any kindness. To the land whereunto they desire to return, thither shall they not return, v. 27. Jehoahaz was carried to Egypt, the land of the south, Jeconiah to Babylon, the land of the north, never to meet again, nor to breathe their native air. There is something very emphatic in that part of this threatening (v. 26), In the country where you were not born, there shall you die. This shall render him despicable in the eyes of all his neighbours. They shall be ready to say (v. 28), "Is this Coniah a despised broken idol?" Time was when he was dignified, nay, when he was almost deified. The people who had seen his father lately deposed were ready to adore him when they saw him upon the throne, but now he is a despised broken idol. He shall leave no posterity to inherit his honour. Let all the world notice these judgments of God upon a nation and a family that had been near and dear to him, and thence infer that God is impartial in the administration of justice. Now that which is here to be taken notice of is that Jeconiah is written childless (v. 30), that is, as it follows, No man of his seed shall prosper, sitting upon the throne of David. Some think that he had children born in Babylon (v. 28) and that they died before him. We read in the genealogy (1 Chron. iii. 17) of seven sons of Jeconiah Assir (that is, Jeconiah the captive) of whom Salathiel is the first. Some think that they were only his adopted sons, and that when it is said (Matt. i. 12), Jeconiah begat Salathiel, no more is meant than that he bequeathed to him what claims he had to the government, because Salathiel is called the son of Neri of the house of Nathan, Luke iii. 27, 31. Whether he had children begotten, or only adopted, none of his seed ruled as kings in Judah.

CHAP. XXIII

The prophet, in God's name, is dealing his reproofs. I. Among the careless princes, or pastors of the people (ver. 1, 2), yet promising to take care of the flock, ver. 3–8. II. Among the wicked prophets and priests, imposing upon the people with their pretended inspirations, for which they must expect to be punished, ver. 9–32. III. Among the profane people, who ridiculed God's prophets, ver. 33–40.

Verses 1–8

I. A word of terror to the negligent shepherds. Woe be to the pastors (to the rulers, both in church and state) who should be pastors to lead them, feed them, protect them, and take care of them. They are not owners of the sheep. God here calls them the sheep of my pasture, whom I have provided good pasture for. Woe be to those therefore who are commanded to feed God's people, and pretend to do it, but who, instead of that, scatter the flock by their violence and oppression. In not visiting them they did in effect drive them away. The beasts of prey scattered them, and the shepherds are in the fault, who should have kept them together.

II. A word of comfort to the neglected sheep. Though the under-shepherds take no care of them, the chief Shepherd will look after them. God will perform his promise, though those he employs do not perform their duty.

1. The dispersed Jews shall at length return to their own land, and be happily settled there under a good government, v. 3, 4. Though there be but a remnant of God's flock left, he will gather that remnant wherever they are and bring them back out of all countries whither he had driven them. They shall be brought to their former habitations, as sheep to their folds, and there they shall be fruitful, and increase in numbers. Formerly they were continually disturbed, but now they shall fear no more, nor be dismayed. Such pastors as Zerubbabel and Nehemiah, though they lived not in the pomp that Jehoiakim and Jeconiah did, were as great blessings to the people as the others were plagues to them.

2. Messiah the Prince, that great and good Shepherd of the sheep, shall in the latter days be raised up to bless his church, and to be the glory of his people Israel, v. 5, 6. The house of David seemed to be ruined by that threatening against Jeconiah (ch. xxii. 30). But here is a promise which effectually secures the honour of the covenant made with David; for by it the house will be raised out of its ruins to a greater lustre than ever. We have not so many prophecies of Christ in this book as we had in that of the prophet Isaiah; but here we have a very illustrious one. The first words intimate that it would be long ere this promise should have its accomplishment: The days come, but they are not yet. I shall see him, but not now. Christ is here spoken of as a branch from David, his appearance mean, his beginnings small, like those of a bud, and his rise seemingly out of the earth, but growing to be loaded with fruits. A branch from David's family, when it seemed to be a root in a dry ground, buried, and not likely to revive. In him doth the horn of David bud, Ps. cxxxii. 17, 18. He is a righteous branch, for he is righteous himself, and through him many, even all that are his, are made righteous. As an advocate, he is Jesus Christ the righteous. He is here spoken of as his church's King. He shall set up a kingdom in the world that shall be victorious over all opposition. In the chariot of the everlasting gospel he shall go forth, he shall go on conquering and to conquer. Christ shall, by his gospel, break the usurped power of Satan, institute a perfect rule of holy living, and, as far as it prevails, make all the world righteous. The effect of this shall be a holy security and serenity of mind in all his faithful loyal subjects. In his days, under his dominion, Judah shall be saved and Israel shall dwell safely. See Luke i. 74, 75. In the days of Christ's government in the soul, when he is uppermost there, the soul dwells at ease. He is the Lord of our righteousness. As God, he is Jehovah, the incommunicable name of God, denoting his eternity and self-existence. As Mediator, he is our righteousness. By making satisfaction to the justice of God for the sin of man, he has brought in an everlasting righteousness, and so made it over to us in the covenant of grace that, upon our consent to that covenant, it becomes ours. He is a sovereign, all-sufficient, eternal righteousness. All our righteousness has its being from him, and by him it subsists. This is the name whereby he shall be called, not only he shall be so, but he shall be known to be so. That is our righteousness by which we are justified before God, acquitted from guilt, and accepted into favour; and nothing else have we to plead but this, "Christ has died, yea, rather has risen again"; and we have taken him for our Lord.

3. This great salvation, which will come to the Jews in the latter days, after their return out of Babylon, shall far outshine the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt (v. 7, 8): They shall no more say, The Lord liveth that brought up Israel out of Egypt; but, The Lord liveth that brought them up out of the north. After they came out of Babylon Messiah the Prince set up the gospel temple, the greatest glory of that nation that was so wonderfully brought out of Babylon.

Verses 9–32

A long lesson for the false prophets. The prophet had complained to God of those false prophets (ch. xiv. 13), and had often foretold that they should be involved in the common ruin; but here they have woes of their own.

I. He expresses what a trouble it was to him to see men who pretended to a divine commission and inspiration ruining themselves, and the people among whom they dwelt, by their falsehood and treachery (v. 9): My heart within me is broken; I am like a drunken man. Jeremiah was a man that laid things much to heart, and what was any way threatening to his country made a deep impression upon his spirits. He is here in trouble, 1. Because of the prophets and their sin, the false doctrine they preached, the wicked lives they lived, pretending to have their instructions from him. 2. "Because of the Lord, and his judgments, which by this means are brought in upon us like a deluge." He trembled to think of the ruin and desolation which were coming from the face of the Lord (so the word is) and from the face of the word of his holiness.

II. He laments the abounding abominable wickedness of the land and the present tokens of God's displeasure they were under for it (v. 10): The land is full of adulterers; it is full both of spiritual and corporal whoredom. Their land mourned now under the judgment of famine; the pleasant places, or rather the pastures, are dried up for want of rain, and yet we see no signs of repentance. They have a great deal of resolution, but it is turned the wrong way; they are zealously affected, but not in a good thing, though they see God thus contending with them.

III. He charges it all upon the prophets and priests, especially the prophets. They are both profane (v. 11); the priests profane the ordinances of God they pretend to administer; the prophets profane the word of God they pretend to deliver. They both play the hypocrite (so some read it); under sacred pretensions they carry on the vilest designs; in my house have I found their wickedness; in the temple, where the priests ministered, where the prophets prophesied, there were they guilty both of idolatry and immorality. Two things are charged upon them: 1. That they taught people to sin by their examples. He compares them with the prophets of Samaria, the head city of the kingdom of the ten tribes, which had been long since laid waste. It was the folly of the prophets of Samaria that they prophesied in Baal, in Baal's name; and so they caused my people Israel to err, to forsake the service of the true God and to worship Baal, v. 13. Now the prophets of Jerusalem did not do so; they prophesied in the name of the true God, and valued themselves upon that, that they were not like the prophets of Samaria, who prophesied in Baal; but they debauched the nation as much by their immoralities as the other had done by their idolatries! They make use of the name and the holy God, and yet wallow in all manner of impurity. They make use of the name of the God of truth, and yet walk in lies. Thus they encourage sinners for everyone will say, "Surely we may do as the prophets do; who can expect that we should be better than our teachers?" By this means Judah and Jerusalem have become as Sodom and Gormorrah, and God looked upon them accordingly as fit for nothing but to be destroyed. 2. That they encouraged people in sin by their false prophecies. They made themselves believe that there was no harm, no danger in sin, and practised accordingly (v. 16): They speak a vision of their own heart; it is not out of the mouth of the Lord. They tell sinners that it shall be well with them though they persist in their sins, v. 17. Those that are devoted to their pleasures put contempt upon their God. These prophets flattered them: they should have been still saying, There is no peace to those that go on in their evil ways, but they still said, You shall have peace; no evil shall come upon you; and, which was worst of all, they told them, God has said so.

IV. God disowns all that these false prophets said to sooth people in their sins (v. 21): I have not sent these prophets; they never had any mission from God. Yet they were very forward—they ran; they were very bold—they prophesied without any of that difficulty with which the true prophets sometimes struggled. They said to sinners, You shall have peace. But (v. 18): "Who hath stood in the counsel of the Lord? You deliver this message with a great deal of assurance; but have you consulted God about it? You have not perceived and heard his word, you have not compared this with the scripture; if you had taken notice of the constant tenor of it, you would never have delivered such a message." That they did not stand in God's counsel nor hear his word is proved afterwards, v. 22. If they had stood in my counsel, as they pretended, 1. They would have made the scriptures their standard: They would have caused my people to hear my words. 2. They would have made the conversion of souls their business, and would have aimed at that in all their preaching. 3. They would have had some seals of their ministry. If they had stood in my counsel, and the words they had preached had been my words, then they should have turned from their evil way.

V. God threatens to punish these prophets for their wickedness. They promised the people peace; and to show them the folly of that God tells them that they should have no peace themselves. Evil is coming upon themselves and they are not aware of it, v. 12. Because the prophets and priests are profane, therefore their ways shall be unto them as slippery ways in the darkness. They pretend to show others the way, but they shall themselves be in the dark, or in a mist. They pretend to give assurances to others, but they themselves shall find no firm footing. They pretend to make the people easy with their flatteries, but they shall themselves be uneasy: They shall be driven, making their escape, they shall fall in the way. They pretend to prevent the evil that threatens others, but God will bring evil upon them, even the year of their visitation. The year of visitation is the year of recompenses. It is further threatened (v. 15), I will feed them with wormwood, which is not only nauseous, but noxious, and make them drink waters of gall, or (as some read it) juice of hemlock; see ch. ix. 15.

VI. The people are here warned not to give any credit to these false prophets (v. 16): "Take notice of what God says, and hearken not to the words of these prophets; for you will find that God's word shall stand, and not theirs. They tell you, No evil shall come upon you; but hear what God says (v. 19), Behold, a whirlwind of the Lord has gone forth in fury. They tell you, All shall be calm and serene; but God tells you, There is a storm coming, a whirlwind of the Lord, there is no standing before it." This sentence is irreversible (v. 20): The anger of the Lord shall not return. God will not alter his mind, nor suffer his anger to be turned away, till he have executed the sentence and performed the thoughts of his heart. This they will not consider now; but in the latter days you shall consider it perfectly, consider it with understanding (so the word is) or with consideration.

VII. Several things are here offered to the consideration of these false prophets that they might be brought to recant their error.

1. Let them consider that though they may impose upon men God is too wise to be imposed upon.

(1) God asserts his own omnipresence and omniscience in general, v. 23, 24. Though God's throne is prepared in the heavens, and this earth seems to be at a distance from him, yet he is a God here in this lower world, v. 23. The eye of God is the same on earth that it is in heaven. The power of God is the same on earth among its inhabitants that it is in heaven. With us nearness and distance make a great difference both in our observations and in our operations, but it is not so with God; to him darkness and light, at hand and afar off, are both alike. Men's characters and counsels cannot possibly be concealed from God's all-seeing eye (v. 24): "Can any hide himself in the secret places? Can any hide his projects and intentions in the secret places of the heart, that I shall not see them?" He is everywhere present; he does not only rule heaven and earth, but he fills heaven and earth by his essential presence, Ps. cxxxix. 7, 8, &c. No place can either include him or exclude him.

(2) He applies this to these prophets, who had a notable art of disguising themselves (v. 25, 26). God will make them know that he knows all the shame they have put upon the world, under colour of divine revelation. God discovered the fraud. Is it in the hearts of those prophets (so some read it) to be ever prophesying lies and prophesying the deceits of their own hearts?

2. Let them consider that their palming upon people counterfeit revelations, and fathering their own fancies upon divine inspiration, was the ready way to bring all religion into contempt and make men turn atheists and infidels. Thus saith the Lord, They think to cause my people to forget my name by their dreams. The great thing Satan aims at is to make people forget God, and all that whereby he has made himself known. Sometimes he does it by setting up false gods (bring men in love with Baal, and they soon forget the name of God), sometimes by misrepresenting the true God.

3. Let them consider what a vast difference there was between their prophecies and those that were delivered by the true prophets of the Lord (v. 28): The prophet that has a dream, let him tell it as a dream. "Let him lay no more stress upon it than men do upon their dreams, nor expect any more regard to be had to it. But let the true prophet, that has my word, speak my word faithfully, speak it as a truth" (so some read it): "let him keep closely to his instructions, and you will soon perceive a vast difference between the dreams that the false prophets tell and the divine dictates which the true prophets deliver. Those that have spiritual senses exercised will be able to distinguish; for what is the chaff to the wheat?" Men's fancies are light and worthless, as the chaff which the wind drives away. But the word of God has substance in it; it is of value, is food for the soul, the bread of life. Is not my word like a fire, saith the Lord? Is their word so? Has it the power and efficacy that the word of God has? Fire has different effects, according as the matter is on which it works; it hardens clay, but softens wax; it consumes the dross, but purifies the gold. So the word of God is to some a savour of life unto life, to others of death unto death. It is compared likewise to a hammer breaking the rock in pieces. The unhumbled heart of man is like a rock; if it will not be melted by the word of God as the fire, it will be broken to pieces by it as the hammer.

4. Let them consider that while they went on in this course God was against them. Three times they are told this, v. 30, 31, 32. They stand indicted here. They steal my word everyone from his neighbour. Those that were strangers to the spirit of the true prophets mimicked their language, picked up some good sayings of theirs, and delivered them to the people as if they had been their own, but with an ill grace. Others understand it of the word of God as it was received by some of the people; they stole it out of their hearts, as the wicked one in the parable is said to steal the good seed of the word, Matt. xiii. 19. By their insinuations they diminished the authority, and so weakened the efficacy, of the word of God upon the minds of those that seemed to be under convictions by it. God is against them (v. 31), because they use their tongues at their pleasure in their discourses to the people, and then father it upon God, and say, He saith it. Some read it, They smooth their tongues; they are very complaisant to the people, and say nothing but what is pleasing and plausible. They stand indicted as common cheats (v. 32): I am against them, for they prophesy false dreams, pretending that to be a divine inspiration which is but an invention of their own. It is the people's fault that they err, that they take things upon trust, but it is much more the prophets' fault that they cause God's people to err by their lies and by their lightness. God disowns their having any commission from him: I sent them not, nor commanded them; they are not God's messengers. Therefore they shall not profit this people at all.

Verses 33–40

The profaneness of the people, of the priests and prophets, is here reproved in a particular instance, which may seem of small moment, but profaneness in common discourse, and the debauching of the language of a nation, is a notorious evidence of the prevalency of wickedness in it.

I. The sin here charged upon them is bantering God's prophets and the dialect they used. They asked, What is the burden of the Lord? (v. 33 and v. 34). This was the word that gave great offence to God, that, whenever they spoke of the word of the Lord, they called it, in scorn and derision, the burden of the Lord. This was a word that the prophets much used, and used it seriously, to show what a weight the word of God was upon their spirits. Now the profane scoffers took this word, and made a jest of it. The mocking of God's messengers was the baffling of his messages. Some think that when the word of the Lord is called a burden it signifies some word of reproof and threatening. In using this word the burden of the Lord in a canting way they reflected upon God as always bearing hard upon them, always frightening them, and so making the word of God a perpetual uneasiness to them. Those that were guilty of this sin were some of the false prophets, some of the priests and some of the people, who had learned of the profane priests and prophets to play with the things of God.

II. When they are reproved for this profane way of speaking they are directed how to express themselves decently. We find it used long after this (Zech. ix. 1; Mal. i. 1; Nah. i. 1; Hab. i. 1). But here God will have the prophet keep to his rule (ch. xv. 19). Do not thou leave off using this word, but let them leave off abusing it. You shall not mention the burden of the Lord any more in this profane careless manner (v. 36). How then must they express themselves? He tells them (v. 37): Thus shalt thou say to the prophet, when thou art enquiring of him, What hath the Lord answered thee? And what hath the Lord spoken? And they must say thus when they enquire of their neighbours, v. 35.

III. They would still say, The burden of the Lord, though God had sent to them to forbid them, v. 38. Those shall be severely reckoned with that thus pervert the words of God, that put a wrong construction on them. It is a great provocation to God to mock his messengers v. 34. Every man's word shall be his own burden; that is, the guilt of this sin shall be heavy upon him. God will give them enough of their jest, so that it will be too heavy to make a jest of. Do they ask, What is the burden of the Lord? Let the prophet ask them, What burden do you mean? Is it this: I will even forsake you? v. 33. This is the burden that shall be laid and bound upon them (v. 39, 40): "Behold I, even I, will utterly forget you, and I will forsake you." God's word will be magnified and made honourable when those that mock at it shall be vilified and made contemptible.

CHAP. XXIV

In the close of the foregoing chapter we had a general prediction of the utter ruin of Jerusalem, which made the prophet himself melancholy. Now, in this chapter, God encourages him, by showing him that, though the desolation seemed to be universal, yet all were not equally involved in it, but God knew how to distinguish between the precious and the vile. Some had gone into captivity already with Jeconiah; but God tells him that it should turn to their good. Others remained hardened in their sins, but those, God tells him, should go into captivity. To inform the prophet of this, here is, I. A vision of two baskets of figs, one very good and the other very bad, ver. 1–3. II. The explication of this vision, applying the good figs to those that were already sent into captivity for their good (ver. 4–7), the bad figs to those that should hereafter be sent into captivity for their hurt, ver. 8–10.

Verses 1–10

This short chapter helps us to put a comfortable construction upon many long ones, by showing us that the same providence which to some is a savour

2. It should be sent to them—by the hand of Jeremiah as the judge set over the nations (ch. i. 10), to pass sentence upon them, and by the hand of Nebuchadrezzar as the executioner. Jeremiah must take the cup at God's hand, and compel the nations to drink it.

3. It should be sent on all the nations within the lines of Israel's communication. Jeremiah took the cup, and made all the nations to drink of it, that is, he prophesied concerning each of the nations here mentioned that they should share in this great desolation. Jerusalem and the cities of Judah are put first (v. 18); for judgment begins at the house of God (1 Pet. iv. 17), at the sanctuary, Ezek. ix. 6. And this part of the prophecy was already begun to be accomplished; this is denoted by that parenthesis (as it is this day), for in the fourth year of Jehoiakim things had come into a very bad posture. Pharaoh king of Egypt comes next, because the Jews trusted to that broken reed (v. 19); the remains of them fled to Egypt, and there Jeremiah particularly foretold the destruction of that country, ch. xliii. 10, 11. All the other nations that bordered upon Canaan must pledge Jerusalem in this bitter cup. The mingled people, the Arabians, rovers of divers nations that lived by rapine; the kings of the land of Uz, joined to the country of the Edomites. The Philistines had been vexatious to Israel, but now their cities become a prey. Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon, are places well known to border upon Israel; the Isles beyond, or beside, the sea, are supposed to be those parts of Phoenicia and Syria that lay upon the coast of the Mediterranean Sea. Dedan and the other countries mentioned (v. 23, 24) seem to have lain upon the confines of Idumea and Arabia the desert. Those of Elam are the Persians, with whom the Medes are joined. The kings of the north, that lay nearer to Babylon will be seized by the victorious sword of Nebuchadrezzar. He shall push on his victories with such incredible fury that all the kingdoms of the world should become sacrifices to his ambition. Thus Alexander is said to have conquered the world, and the Roman empire is called the world, Luke ii. 1. Or it may be taken as reading the doom of all the kingdoms of the earth; one time or other, they shall feel the dreadful effects of war. The world has been, and will be, a great cockpit, while men's lusts war as they do in their members, Jas. iv. 1. The king of Sheshach shall drink after them, that is, the king of Babylon himself, who has given his neighbours all this trouble, shall at length have it return upon his own head. That by Sheshach is meant Babylon is plain from ch. li. 41. Babylon's ruin was foretold, v. 12, 13.

4. The desolations in all these kingdoms are represented by the consequences of excessive drinking (v. 16): They shall drink, and be moved, and be mad. They shall be drunken, and spew, and fall and rise no more, v. 27. Men in drink often fall and rise no more; it is a sin that is its own punishment. When God sends the sword upon a nation, with warrant to make it desolate, it soon becomes like a drunken man, filled with confusion; its counsellors mad, and at their wits' end, sick at heart with continual vexation, falling down before the enemy, and unable to do anything to help themselves.

5. They will refuse to take the cup at thy hand; they will not give credit to the prediction of so despicable a man as Jeremiah. But he must tell them that it is the word of the Lord of hosts, and it is vain for them to struggle with Omnipotence: You shall certainly drink. And he must give them this reason, It is a time of visitation, it is a reckoning day, and Jerusalem has been called to account already: I begin to bring evil on the city that is called by my name; and should you be utterly unpunished? If Jerusalem be punished for learning idolatry of the nations, shall not the nations be punished, of whom they learned it? I will call for a sword upon all the inhabitants of the earth, for they have helped to debauch the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

II. There is a God that judges in the earth, to whom all the nations of the earth are accountable, and by whose judgment they must abide. Those who have been vexatious and mischievous to the people of God will be reckoned with for it at last. The year of the redeemer will come, even the year of recompenses. The burden of the word of the Lord will at last become the burden of his judgments. Isaiah had prophesied long since against most of these nations (ch. xiii. &c) and now all his prophecies will have their fulfilling. Nebuchadrezzar was so proud of his might that he had no sense of right. These are the men that turn the world upside down, and yet expect to be admired and adored. Alexander thought himself a great prince when others thought him no better than a great pirate.

Verses 30–38

A further description of those terrible desolations which the king of Babylon with his armies should make in all the countries round about Jerusalem.

They will soon be aware of Nebuchadrezzar's making war upon them; but the prophet is directed to tell them that it is God himself that makes war upon them (v. 30): The Lord shall roar from on high. He shall mightily roar upon his habitation on earth from that above. He roars as a lion that has forsaken his covert (v. 38), and is going abroad to seek his prey. The Lord has a controversy with the nations. His quarrel with them is for their wickedness, their contempt of his authority and kindness to them. He will give those that are wicked to the sword. They have provoked God to anger, and thence comes all this destruction. A noise will come even to the ends of the earth, v. 31. The alarm is not given by trumpet, or beat of drum, but by a whirlwind, a great whirlwind, storm, or tempest, which shall be raised up from the coasts, the remote coasts of the earth, v. 32. The Chaldean army shall be like a hurricane raised in the north, but thence carried on with swiftness, bearing down all before it. Now the shepherds shall howl and cry, the kings, and princes, and the great ones of the earth, the principal of the flock. They used to be the most courageous but now their hearts shall fail them; they shall wallow themselves in the ashes, v. 34. There shall be a voice of the cry of the shepherds, and a howling of the principal of the flock shall be heard, v. 36. Perhaps, carrying on the metaphor of a lion roaring, it alludes to the great fright that shepherds are in when they hear a roaring lion coming towards their flocks, and find they have no way to flee (v. 35) for their own safety, neither can the principal of their flock escape. When our neighbour's house is on fire it is time to be concerned for our own. When one nation is a seat of war every neighbouring nation should hear, and fear, and make its peace with God. Multitudes shall fall by the sword of the merciless Chaldeans so that the slain of the Lord shall be everywhere found. The slain for sin are the slain of the Lord. They shall have no friends left to bury them, and the enemies shall not have so much humanity in them as to do it. The effect of this war will be the desolation of the whole land, that is the seat of it (v. 38), one land after another. But here are two expressions more that make the case piteous. (1) You shall fall like a pleasant vessel, v. 34. The most desirable persons among them, who were looked upon as vessels of honour, shall fall by the sword. You shall fall as a Venice glass or a China dish, which is soon broken all to pieces. (2) Even the peaceable habitations are cut down. Those who used to be quiet, and not molesting any of their neighbours, those who lived in peace, and gave no provocation to any, even those shall not escape. This is one of the direful effects of war. Blessed be God, there is a peaceable habitation above for all the sons of peace, which is out of the reach of fire and sword.

CHAP. XXVI

As in the Acts of the Apostles their preaching and their suffering are interwoven, so it is in the account we have of the prophet Jeremiah. I. How faithfully he preached, ver. 1–6. II. How spitefully he was persecuted for so doing by the priests and the prophets, ver. 7–11. III. How bravely he stood to his doctrine, in the face of his persecutors, ver. 12–15. IV. How wonderfully he was protected and delivered by the prudence of the princes and elders, ver. 16–19. Though Urijah, another prophet, was about the same time put to death by Jehoiakim (ver. 20–23), yet Jeremiah met with those that sheltered him, ver. 24.

Verses 1–6

The sermon that Jeremiah preached, which gave such offence that he was in danger of losing his life for it. It is left upon record, by way of appeal to the judgment of impartial men in all ages.

I. God directed him where to preach this sermon, and when, and to what auditory, v. 2. God gave him orders to preach in the court of the Lord's house, which was within the peculiar jurisdiction of his sworn enemies the priests. He must preach this, at the time of one of the most solemn festivals, when persons had come from all the cities of Judah to worship in the Lord's house. These worshippers had a great veneration for their priests, and would strengthen their hands against Jeremiah. But none of these things must daunt him; he must preach this sermon, which, if it were not convincing, would be provoking. God charges him particularly not to diminish a word, but to speak all the words, that he had commanded him.

II. God directed him what to preach. He must assure them that if they would repent of their sins, and turn from them, though judgments were just at the door, yet a stop should be put to them, and God would proceed no further in his controversy with them, v. 3. This was the main thing God intended in sending him to them. God waits to be gracious, waits till we are duly qualified, till we are fit, and in the meantime tries a variety of methods. He must, on the other hand, assure them that if they continued obstinate to all the calls God gave them, it would certainly end in the ruin of their city and temple, v. 4–6. That which God required of them was that they should walk in all his law which he set before them, the law of Moses and the ordinances and commandments of it, and should hearken to the words of his servants the prophets. The law was what God himself set before them. The prophets were his own servants, and were sent by him to them. They had hitherto been deaf both to the law and to the prophets: You have not hearkened. All he expects now is that at length they should heed what he said, and make his word their rule. In case of refusal this city, and the temple in it, shall fare as their predecessors did, Shiloh and the tabernacle there, for a like refusal to hearken. This was not the first time he had given them warning to this effect; see ch. vii. 12–14.

The sermon instead of awakening their convictions, did but exasperate their corruptions.

I. Jeremiah is charged with a crime that he had preached such a sermon, and is apprehended for it as a criminal. The priests, and false prophets, and people, heard him speak these words, v. 7. This shall suffice to ground an indictment upon: He hath said, This house shall be like Shiloh, v. 9. See how unfair they are in representing his words. He had said, in God's name, If you will not hearken to me, then will I make this house like Shiloh; but they leave out God's hand and their own hand in not hearkening to the voice of God, and charge it upon him that he blasphemed this holy place, the crime charged both on our Lord Jesus and on Stephen: He said, This house shall be like Shiloh. When the accusation was so weakly grounded, no marvel that the sentence was unjust: Thou shalt surely die. What he had said agreed with what God had said (1 Kings ix. 6–8), If you shall at all turn from following after me, then this house shall be abandoned; and yet he is condemned to die for saying it. This outcry of the priests and prophets raised the mob, and all the people were gathered together against Jeremiah in a popular tumult, ready to pull him to pieces.

II. He is arraigned and indicted for it. The princes of Judah were his judges, v. 10. The elders of Israel, hearing of this tumult in the temple, came up from the king's house of the Lord, to enquire into this matter. They sat down in the entry of the new gate of the Lord's house, and held a court. The priests and prophets were his prosecutors and accusers, and were violently set against him. They appealed to the princes, and to all the people, whether this man were not worthy to die, v. 11. When Jeremiah prophesied in the house of the king concerning the fall of the royal family (ch. xxii. 1, &c.), the court, though very corrupt, bore it patiently, and we do not find that they persecuted him for it; but when he comes into the house of the Lord, and touches the copyhold of the priests, and contradicts the lies and flatteries of the false prophets, then he is adjudged worthy to die, ch. v. 31.

III. Jeremiah makes his defence before the princes and the people. He does not deny the words. What he has said he will stand to, though it cost him his life; he had prophesied against this house and this city, but, 1. He asserts that he did this by good authority, not maliciously nor seditiously, but, The Lord sent me to prophesy thus: so he begins his apology (v. 12), and so he concludes it (v. 15): Of a truth the Lord hath sent me unto you, to speak all these words. As long as ministers keep closely to the instructions they have from heaven they need not fear the opposition they may meet with from hell or earth. He is under the divine protection, and whatever affront they offer to the ambassador will be resented by the Prince that sent him. It was said, not by way of fatal sentence, but of fair warning, v. 13. "As for me, the matter is not great what becomes of me; behold, I am in your hand; I neither have any power, to oppose you, nor is it so much my concern to save my own life: do with me as seems meet unto you." But, for themselves, he tells them that it is at their peril if they put him to death: You shall surely bring innocent blood upon yourselves, v. 15.

Verses 16–24

I. The acquitting of Jeremiah. He had indeed spoken the words laid in the indictment, but they are not looked upon to be seditious or treasonable, and the court find him not guilty. The priests and prophets continued to demand judgment against him; but the princes, and all the people, are clear that this man is not worthy to die (v. 16); for (say they) he hath spoken to us, not of himself, but in the name of the Lord our God. And are they willing to own that he did indeed speak to them in the name of the Lord and that that Lord is their God? Why then did they not amend their ways and doings?

II. A precedent quoted to justify them in acquitting Jeremiah. Some of the elders of the land, or the more intelligent men of the people, stood up, and put the assembly in mind of a former case. The case referred to is that of Micah. 1. Was it thought strange that Jeremiah prophesied against this city and the temple? Micah did so before him, even in the reign of Hezekiah, that reign of reformation, v. 18. Micah said it as publicly as Jeremiah had now spoken, Zion shall be ploughed like a field, the building shall be all destroyed, so that nothing shall hinder but it may be ploughed; Jerusalem shall become heaps of ruins, and the mountain of the house on which the temple is built shall be as the high places of the forest, overrun with briers and thorns, Mic. iii. 12. By this it appears that a man may be, as Micah was, a true prophet of the Lord, and yet may prophesy the destruction of Zion and Jerusalem. 2. Was it thought fit by the princes to justify Jeremiah in what he had done? It was what Hezekiah did before them in a like case. Did Hezekiah, and the people of Judah put Micah to death? On the contrary, they took the warning he gave them. Hezekiah set a good example before his successors, for he feared the Lord (v. 19). Micah's preaching drove him to his knees; he besought the Lord to turn away the judgment threatened and to be reconciled to them, and he found it was not in vain for the Lord repented him of the evil and returned in mercy to them; he sent an angel, who routed the army of the Assyrians, that threatened to plough Zion like a field.

III. An instance of another prophet that was put to death by Jehoiakim for prophesying as Jeremiah had done, v. 12, &c. Some make this to be urged by the prosecutors, as a case that favoured the prosecution, a modern case, in which speaking such words as Jeremiah had spoken was adjudged treason. Others think that the elders, who were advocates for Jeremiah, alleged this to show that thus they might procure great evil against their souls, for it would be adding sin to sin. Jehoiakim, the present king, had slain one prophet already; let them not fill up the measure by slaying another. But some good interpreters take this narrative from the historian that penned the book, Jeremiah himself, or Baruch. Urijah's prophecy was against this city, and this land, according to all the words of Jeremiah. The prophets of the Lord agreed in their testimony, and one would have thought that out of the mouth of so many witnesses the word would be regarded. Jehoiakim and his courtiers were exasperated against him, and sought to put him to death. When he heard that the king sought his life, he was afraid, and fled, and went into Egypt. This was certainly an effect of the weakness of his faith, and it sped accordingly. He distrusted God, and his power to protect him and bear him out. It was especially unbecoming to flee into Egypt. There are many that have much grace, but they have little courage, that are very honest, but withal very timorous. Jehoiakim's malice, one would think, might have contented itself with his banishment. So implacable is his revenge that he sends soldiers into Egypt, and they bring him back by force of arms. They brought him to Jehoiakim, and he slew him with the sword. He loads the dead body with infamy, cast it into the graves of the common people, as if he had not been a prophet of the Lord. Thus Jehoiakim hoped both to ruin his reputation with the people, that no heed might be given to his predictions, and to deter others from prophesying in like manner; but in vain. Herod thought he had gained his point when he had cut off John Baptist's head, but found himself deceived when, soon after, he heard of Jesus Christ, and said, in a fright, This is John the Baptist.

IV. Jeremiah's deliverance. Urijah was lately put to death, yet God wonderfully preserved Jeremiah, though he did not flee, but stood his ground. He that had an extraordinary mission might expect an extraordinary protection. God raised up a friend for Jeremiah; he took him by the hand in a friendly way, and assisted him. It was Ahikam the son of Shaphan, one that was a minister of state in Josiah's time; we read of him, 2 Kings xxii. 12. He had great influence among the princes, and he used it in favour of Jeremiah.

CHAP. XXVII

Jeremiah, the prophet, since he cannot persuade people to submit to God's precept, and so to prevent the destruction of their country, is here persuading them to submit to God's providence, by yielding tamely to the king of Babylon, and becoming tributaries to him, which was the wisest course they could now take, and would prevent the laying of their country waste by fire and sword. I. He gives this counsel, in God's name, to the kings of the neighbouring nations, assuring them that there was no remedy, but they must serve the king of Babylon; and yet there should be relief, for his dominion should last but 70 years, ver. 1–11. II. He gives this counsel to Zedekiah king of Judah particularly (ver. 12–15) and to the priests and people, assuring them that the king of Babylon should still proceed against them till things were brought to the last extremity, and a patient submission would be the only way to mitigate the calamity, ver. 16–22.

Verses 1–11

Some difficulty occurs in the date of this prophecy. Dr. Lightfoot solves it thus: In the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign Jeremiah is to make these bonds and yokes, and to put them upon his own neck, in token of Judah's subjection to the king of Babylon, which began at that time; but he is to send them to the neighbouring kings afterwards in the reign of Zedekiah, of whose succession to Jehoiakim, and the ambassadors sent to him, mention is made by way of prediction.

I. Jeremiah is to prepare a sign of the general reduction of all these countries into subjection to the king of Babylon (v. 2): Make thee bonds and yokes, yokes with bonds to fasten them, that the beast may not slip his neck out of the yoke. Into these the prophet must put his own neck for everyone would enquire, What is the meaning of Jeremiah's yokes? We find him with one on, ch. xxviii. 10. Hereby he intimated that he advised them to nothing but what he was resolved to do himself.

II. He is to send this, with a sermon annexed to it, to all the neighbouring princes; those are mentioned (v. 3) that lay next to the land of Canaan. It should seem, there was a treaty of alliance on foot between the king of Judah and all those other kings. Jerusalem was the place appointed for the treaty. Thither they all sent their plenipotentiaries; and it was agreed that they should bind themselves in a league offensive and defensive, in opposition to the threatening greatness of the king of Babylon. They had great confidence in their strength thus united; but, when the envoys were returning to their respective masters with the ratification of this treaty, Jeremiah gives each of them a yoke to carry to his master, to signify to him that he must become a servant to the king of Babylon, In the sermon, 1. God asserts his own indisputable right to dispose of kingdoms as he pleases, v. 5. He is the Creator of all things; he made the earth at first, established it, and it abides: it is still the same, though one generation passes away and another comes. He still by a continued creation produces man and beast upon the ground, and it is by his great power and outstretched arm. As he hath graciously given the earth to the children of men in general (Ps. cxv. 16), so he gives to each his share of it, be it more or less. 2. He publishes a grant of all these countries to Nebuchadnezzar. "This is to certify to all whom it may concern that I have given all these lands, with all the wealth of them, into the hands of the king of Babylon; even the beasts of the field, whether tame or wild, have I given to him, parks and pastures; they are all his own." Nebuchadnezzar was a proud wicked man, an idolater; and yet God, in his providence, gives him this large dominion, these vast possessions. Note, The things of this world are not the best things, for God often gives the largest share of them to bad men, that are rebels against him. Dominion is not founded in grace. Nebuchadnezzar is a bad man, and yet God calls him his servant, because he employed him as an instrument of his providence for the chastising of the nations. 3. He assures them that they should all be unavoidably brought under the dominion of the king of Babylon for a time (v. 7): All nations, all these nations and many others, shall serve him, and his son, and his son's son. His son was Evil-merodach, and his son's son Belshazzar, in whom his kingdom ceased: then the time of reckoning came, and many nations and great kings, incorporated into the empire of the Medes and Persians, served themselves of him, as before, ch. xxv. 14. 4. He threatens those that stood out and would not submit to the king of Babylon (v. 8): That nation that will not put their neck under his yoke I will punish with sword and famine, with one judgment after another, till it is consumed by his hand. 5. He shows them the vanity of all the hopes they fed themselves with, that they should preserve their liberties, v. 9, 10. These nations had their prophets too, that pretended to foretell future events by the stars, or by dreams, or enchantments; and they, to please their patrons, assured them that they should not serve the king of Babylon. Thus they designed to animate them to a vigorous resistance. But he tells them that it would prove to their destruction. Particular prophesies against these nations that bordered on Israel we shall meet with, ch. xlviii and xlix, and Ezek. xxv. 6. He puts them in a fair way to prevent their destruction by a quiet and easy submission, v. 11. The nations that will be content to serve the king of Babylon, and pay him tribute for seventy years (ten apprenticeships), those will I let remain still in their own land. Serve the king of Babylon and you shall till the land and dwell therein. Some would condemn this as the evidence of a mean spirit, but the prophet recommends it as that of a meek spirit, which yields to necessity, and by a quiet submission to the hardest turns of Providence makes the best of bad. Many might have prevented destroying providences by humbling themselves under humbling providences. It is better to take up a lighter cross in our way than to pull a heavier on our own head.

What was said to all the nations is here with a particular tenderness applied to the Jews, for whom Jeremiah was concerned. The case at present stood thus: Judah and Jerusalem had contested with the king of Babylon, and were worsted; many both of their valuable persons and goods were carried to Babylon already, and some of the vessels of the Lord's house. Now how this struggle would issue was the question. They had those at Jerusalem who pretended to be prophets, who bade them hold out and recover all that they had lost. Now Jeremiah is sent to bid them yield, for instead of recovering what they had lost, they would otherwise lose all that remained.

I. Jeremiah humbly addresses the king of Judah, to persuade him to surrender to the king of Babylon. His act would be the people's and therefore he speaks to him as to them all (v. 12): Bring your necks under the yoke of the king of Babylon and live. Is it their wisdom to submit to the heavy iron yoke of a cruel tyrant, that they may secure the lives of their bodies? And is it not much more our wisdom to submit to the sweet and easy yoke of our rightful Lord and Master Jesus Christ, that we may secure the lives of our souls? Bring down your spirits to repentance and faith, and that is the way to bring up your spirits to heaven and glory.

II. He addresses himself likewise to the priests and the people (v. 16), to persuade them to serve the king of Babylon, that they might live, and might prevent the desolation of the city (v. 17): "Wherefore should it be laid waste, as certainly it will be if you stand out?"

III. In both these addresses he warns them against giving credit to the false prophets that rocked them asleep in their security: "Hearken not to the word of the prophets (v. 14), your prophets, v. 16. They are not God's prophets; he never sent them; they are yours, for they say what you would have them say, and aim at nothing but to please you." Two things their prophets said: 1. That the power which the king of Babylon had gained over them should now shortly be broken. They said (v. 14), "You shall not serve the king of Babylon; you need not submit voluntarily, for you shall not be compelled to submit." This they prophesied in the name of the Lord (v. 15), as if God had sent them. But it was a lie: I have not sent them, saith the Lord. 2. They prophesied that the vessels of the temple, which the king of Babylon had already carried away, should now shortly be brought back (v. 16); knowing how acceptable it would be to the priests who loved the gold of the temple better than the temple that sanctified the gold. These vessels were taken away when Jeconiah was carried captive into Babylon, v. 20. We have the story, and it is a melancholy one, 2 Kings xxiv. 13, 15; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 10. The temple was their pride, and the stripping of that was too plain an indication of that which the true prophet told them, that their God had departed from them. Their false prophets therefore had no other way to make them easy than by telling them that the king of Babylon should be forced to restore them in a little while. Now here Jeremiah bids them think of preserving the vessels that remained by their prayers, rather than of bringing back those that were gone by their prophecies (v. 18): If they be prophets, as they pretend, and if the word of the Lord be with them—if they have any intercourse with heaven, let them stand between the living and the dead, between that which is carried away and that which remains, that the plague may be stayed; let them make intercession with the Lord of hosts, that the vessels which are left go not after the rest. Instead of prophesying, let them pray. He assures them that the brazen vessels should go after the golden ones, v. 19, 20. Nebuchadnezzar would be sure to come again and take all he could find, not only in the house of the Lord, but in the king's house. But he concludes with a gracious promise that the time should come when they should all be returned: Until the day that I visit them in mercy, and then I will bring those vessels up again, and restore them to this place. Surely they were under the protection of a special Providence, else they would have been melted down, but there was to be a second temple, for which they were to be reserved. We read particularly of the return of them, Ezra i. 8. Though the return of the church's prosperity do not come in our time, we must not therefore despair of it, for it will come in God's time.

CHAP. XXVIII

In the foregoing chapter Jeremiah had charged those prophets with lies who foretold the speedy breaking of the yoke of the king of Babylon and the return of the vessels of the sanctuary; now here we have his contest with a particular prophet. I. Hananiah, a pretender to prophecy, foretold the sinking of Nebuchadnezzar's power and the return both of the persons and of the vessels that were carried away (ver. 1–4), and, as a sign of this, he broke the yoke from the neck of Jeremiah, ver. 10, 11. II. Jeremiah wished his words might prove true, but appealed to the event, not doubting but that would disprove them, ver. 5–9. III. The doom both of the deceived and the deceiver is here read. The people should have their yoke of wood turned into a yoke of iron (ver. 12–14), and the prophet should be shortly cut off by death, ver. 15–17.

Verses 1–9

This struggle between a true prophet and a false one is said to have happened in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah, and yet in the fourth year, for the first four years of his reign might well be called the beginning, because during those years he reigned under the dominion of the king of Babylon and as a tributary to him; whereas the rest of his reign, which might well be called the latter part of it, in distinction from that former part, he reigned in rebellion against the king of Babylon. In this fourth year of his reign he went in person to Babylon (as we find, ch. li. 59). This gave the people some hope that in person he would put a good end to the war, in which hope the false prophets encouraged them, Hananiah particularly.

I. The prediction which Hananiah delivered solemnly, in the house of the Lord, and in the name of the Lord, in the presence of the priests and of all the people. In delivering this prophecy, he faced Jeremiah, he spoke it to him (v. 1), designing to contradict him, as much as to say, "Jeremiah, thou liest." Now this prediction is that the king of Babylon's power over Judah and Jerusalem should be speedily broken, that within two full years the vessels of the temple should be brought back, and Jeremiah, and all the captives carried away with him, should return; whereas Jeremiah had foretold that the yoke of the king of Babylon should be bound on yet faster, and that the vessels and captives should not return for 70 years, v. 2–4. Upon the reading of this sham prophecy, and comparing it with the messages that God sent by the true prophets, what a vast difference there is between them. Here is nothing of the spirit and life, the sublimity of expression, that appear in the discourses of God's prophets. But that which is especially wanting here is an air of piety; he speaks of the return of their prosperity, but not a word of good counsel given them to repent, and return to God, to pray, and seek his face. He promises them temporal mercies, in God's name, but makes no mention of those spiritual mercies which God always promised, ch. xxiv. 7: I will give them a heart to know me.

II. Jeremiah's reply to this pretended prophecy. 1. He heartily wishes it might prove true. Such an affection has he for his country, and so truly desirous is he that their ruin might be prevented. He said, Amen; the Lord do so; the Lord perform thy words, v. 5, 6. This was not the first time that Jeremiah had prayed for his people, though he had prophesied against them, as Christ prayed, Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me, when yet he knew it must not pass from him. God himself, though he has determined, does not desire, the death of sinners, but would have all men to be saved. 2. He appeals to the event, to prove it false, v. 7–9. The false prophets reflected upon Jeremiah, as Ahab upon Micaiah, because he never prophesied good concerning them, but evil. Prophets of old prophesied against many countries and great kingdoms, so bold were they in delivering the messages which God sent by them, and so far from fearing men, or seeking to please them, as Hananiah did. They made no difficulty, any more than Jeremiah did, of threatening war, famine, and pestilence, and what they said was regarded as coming from God; why then should Jeremiah be run down as a pestilent fellow, and a sower of sedition, when he preached no otherwise than God's prophets had always done before him? But the prophet that prophesied of peace and prosperity especially as Hananiah did, absolutely and unconditionally, without adding that necessary proviso, that they do not by wilful sin put a bar in their own door and stop the current of God's favours, will be proved a true prophet only by the accomplishment of his prediction; if it come to pass, then it shall be known that the Lord has sent him, but, if not, he will appear to be a cheat and an impostor.

Verses 10–17

I. The insolence of the false prophet. To complete the affront he designed Jeremiah, he took the yoke from off his neck which he carried as a memorial of what he had prophesied concerning the enslaving of the nations of Nebuchadnezzar, and he broke it, that he might give a sign of the accomplishment of his prophecy, as Jeremiah had given of his, and might seem to have defeated the intention of his prophecy. The lying spirit, in the mouth of this false prophet, mimics the language of the Spirit of truth: Thus saith the Lord, So will I break the yoke of the king of Babylon, not only from the neck of this nation, but from the neck of all nations, within two full years.

II. The patience of the true prophet. Jeremiah quietly went his way, not because he had nothing to answer, but because he was willing to stay till God was pleased to furnish him with a direct answer, which as yet he had not received. He expected that God would send a special message to Hananiah. I, as a deaf man, heard not, for thou wilt hear, and thou shalt answer, Lord, for me.

III. The justice of God in giving judgment between Jeremiah and his adversary. Jeremiah went his way, as a man in whose mouth there was no rebuke, but God soon put a word into his mouth. Let not Jeremiah himself distrust the truth of what he had delivered in God's name because it met with such contradiction. If what we have spoken be the truth of God, we must not unsay it because men gainsay it; for great is the truth and will prevail. Hananiah has broken the yokes of wood, but Jeremiah must make for them yokes of iron, which cannot be broken (v. 13), for (says God), "I have put a yoke of iron upon the neck of all these nations, which shall lie heavier, and bind harder, upon them (v. 14), that they may serve the king of Babylon." What was said before is repeated again: I have given him the beasts of the field also, as if there were something significant in that. Men had by their wickedness made themselves like the beasts that perish, and therefore deserved to be ruled as beasts are ruled, and such a power Nebuchadnezzar ruled with; for whom he would he slew and whom he would he kept alive. Hananiah is sentenced to die for contradicting it, and Jeremiah, when he has received commission from God, boldly tells him so to his face. The crimes of which Hananiah stands convicted are cheating the people and affronting God: Thou makest this people to trust in a lie; thou hast taught rebellion against the Lord. The judgment given against him is, "I will cast thee off from the face of the earth. This year thou shalt die, and die as a rebel against the Lord." This sentence was executed, v. 17. Hananiah died the same year, within two months.

CHAP. XXIX

The contest between Jeremiah and the false prophets was carried on before by preaching, here by writing. I. A letter which Jeremiah wrote to the captives in Babylon, against their prophets that they had there (ver. 1–3), in which letter, 1. He endeavours to reconcile them to their captivity, ver. 4–7. 2. He cautions them not to give any credit to their false prophets, who fed them with hopes of a speedy release, ver. 8, 9. 3. He assures them that God would restore them in mercy to their own land again, at the end of 70 years, ver. 10–14. 4. He foretells the destruction of those who yet continued, ver. 15–19. 5. He prophesies the destruction of two of their false prophets in Babylon, that soothed them in their sins and set them bad examples (ver. 20–23). II. Here is a letter which Shemaiah, a false prophet in Babylon, wrote to the priests at Jerusalem, to stir them up to persecute Jeremiah (ver. 24–29), and a denunciation of God's wrath against him for writing such a letter, ver. 30–32.

Verses 1–7

I. Jeremiah wrote to the captives in Babylon, in the name of the Lord. Jeconiah had surrendered himself a prisoner, with the queen his mother, the chamberlains of his household, called there the eunuchs, and many of the princes of Judah and Jerusalem. The carpenters and smiths likewise were yielded up, that those who remained might not have any proper hands to fortify their city. By this tame submission it was hoped that Nebuchadnezzar would be pacified, but the imperious conqueror grows upon their concessions. And, not content with this, when these had departed from Jerusalem he comes again, and fetches away many more of the elders, the priests, the prophets, and the people (v. 1). The case of these captives was very melancholy, the rather because they looked as if they were greater sinners than all men who dwelt at Jerusalem. Jeremiah therefore writes a letter to them, to comfort them. This letter of Jeremiah's was sent to the captives in Babylon by the hands of the ambassadors whom king Zedekiah sent to Nebuchadnezzar, probably to pay him his tribute and renew his submission to him. By such messengers Jeremiah chose to send this message, because it was a message from God.

II. A copy of the letter at large follows here to v. 24.

1. He assures them that he wrote in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; Jeremiah was but the scribe or amanuensis. It would be comfortable to them, in their captivity, to hear that God is the Lord of hosts, able to help and deliver them; and that he is the God of Israel still, in covenant with his people. This would be an admonition to stand upon their guard against all temptations to the idolatry of Babylon. God's sending to them in this letter might be an encouragement, as it was evidence that he had not cast them off, had not disinherited them, though he was displeased with them and corrected them.

2. God by him owns the hand he had in their captivity: I have caused you to be carried away, v. 4 and again, v. 7. If God caused them to be carried captives, they might be sure that he neither did them any wrong nor meant them any hurt.

3. He bids them think of nothing but settling there; and therefore let them resolve to make the best of it (v. 5, 6): Build yourselves houses and dwell in them, &c. They must not feed themselves with hopes of a speedy return out of their captivity. Let them therefore accommodate themselves to it as well as they can. Let them build, and plant, and marry, and dispose of their children there as if they were at home in their own land. If they live in the fear of God, what should hinder them but they may live comfortably in Babylon? They cannot but weep sometimes when they remember Zion. But let not weeping hinder sowing. In all conditions of life it is our wisdom and duty to make the best of that which is, and not to throw away the comfort of what we may have because we have not all we would have. We have a natural affection for our native country; if Providence remove us to some other country, we must resolve to live easy there. If the earth be the Lord's, then, wherever a child of God goes, he does not go off his Father's ground. They must not disquiet themselves with fears of intolerable hardships in their captivity.

4. He directs them to seek the good of the country where they were captives (v. 7), to pray for it, to endeavour to promote it. This forbids them to attempt anything against the public peace while they were subjects to the king of Babylon. They must live quiet and peaceable lives under him, in all godliness and honesty, not plotting to shake off his yoke, but patiently leaving it to God in due time to work deliverance for them. For in the peace thereof you shall have peace. Thus the primitive Christians, according to the temper of their holy religion, prayed for the powers that were, though they were persecuting powers. Every passenger is concerned in the safety of the ship.

Verses 8–14

I. God takes them from building upon the false foundation which their pretended prophets laid, v. 8, 9. They told them that their captivity should be short, and therefore that they must not think of taking root in Babylon. "Now herein they deceive you," says God; "they prophesy a lie to you, though they prophesy in my name. But let them not deceive you, suffer not yourselves to be deluded by them." Hearken not to your dreams, which you cause to be dreamed. He means either the dreams or fancies which the people pleased themselves with, or the dreams which the prophets dreamed and grounded their prophecies upon. They caused them to be dreamed; for they encouraged the prophets to put such deceits upon them, desiring them to prophesy nothing but smooth things, Isa. xxx. 10. They were dreams of their own bespeaking.

II. He gives them a good foundation to build their hopes upon. God here promises them that, though they should not return quickly, they should return at length, after seventy years be accomplished. He will put an end to their captivity. Though they are dispersed, some in one country and some in another, he will gather them from all the places whither they are driven, and incorporate them again in one body. They shall be brought again to their own land, to the place whence they were carried captive, v. 14. This shall be the performance of God's promise to them (v. 10): I will perform my good word towards you. This will make their return out of captivity very comfortable, that it will be the performance of God's good word to them, the product of a gracious promise. This shall be in pursuance of God's purposes concerning them (v. 11): I know the thoughts that I think towards you. His thoughts are all working towards the expected end, which he will give in due time. Let them have patience till the fruit is ripe, and then they shall have it. He will give them an end, and expectation, so it is in the original. When things are at the worst they will begin to mend; and he will give them to see the glorious perfection of their deliverance. He that in the beginning finished the heavens and the earth, and all the hosts of both, will finish all the blessings of both to his people. God does nothing by halves. He will give them to see the expectation, that end which they desire. He will give them not the expectations of their fears, nor the expectations of their fancies, but the expectations of their faith. This shall be in answer to their prayers (v. 12–14). Then shall you call upon me, and you shall go, and pray unto me. When deliverance is coming we must by prayer go forth to meet it. I will hearken unto you, and I will be found of you. God has said it, and we may depend upon it, Seek and you shall find. We have a general rule laid down (v. 13): You shall find me when you shall search for me with all your heart.

Verses 15–23

Jeremiah here turns to those who slighted the counsels and comforts that Jeremiah ministered and depended upon the false prophets. When this letter came from Jeremiah they would be ready to say, "Why should he make himself so busy, and take upon him to advise us? The Lord has raised us up prophets in Babylon, v. 15. We are satisfied with those prophets, and can depend upon them, and have no occasion to hear from any prophets in Jerusalem." These prophets of their own told them that no more should be carried captive, but that those who were in captivity should shortly return. In answer to this the prophet here foretells the utter destruction of those who remained still at Jerusalem: "As for the king and people that dwell in the city, who, you think, will be ready to bid you welcome when you return, you are deceived; they shall be followed with one judgment after another, sword, famine, and pestilence, which shall cut off multitudes; and the poor and miserable remains shall be removed into all kingdoms of the earth," v. 16, 18. And thus God will make them, or rather deal with them, like vile figs. This refers to the vision and the prophecy which we had ch. xxiv. And the reason given is the same (v. 19): Because they have not hearkened to my words. I called, but they refused. He calls upon all the children of the captivity, who boasted of them as prophets of God's raising up (v. 20): "Stand still, and hear the doom of the prophets you are so fond of." The two prophets are named here, Ahab and Zedekiah, v. 21. The crimes charged upon them—impiety and immorality: They prophesied lies in God's name (v. 21), and again (v. 23), They have spoken lying words in my name. Fathering their lies upon the God of truth was worst of all. Here it appears why they flattered others in their sins—because they could not reprove them without condemning themselves. The king of Babylon shall slay them before your eyes; nay, he shall put them to a miserable death, roast them in the fire, v. 22. We may suppose that it was not for their impiety and immorality that Nebuchadnezzar punished them thus severely, but for sedition, and some attempts of their turbulent spirits upon the public peace, and stirring up the people to revolt and rebel. Their names shall be a curse among the captives in Babylon, v. 22. When men would imprecate the greatest evil upon one they hated they could not load them with a heavier curse, in fewer words, than to say, The Lord make thee like Zedekiah and like Ahab.

Verses 24–32

The false prophets were enraged at the contents of Jeremiah's letter. One of them, Shemaiah, showed his malice against the prophet.

I. This busy fellow is called Shemaiah the Nehelamite, the dreamer (so the margin reads it), because all his prophecies he pretended to have received from God in a dream. He had got a copy of Jeremiah's letter to the captives, or information was given to him concerning it, and it nettled him exceedingly; he will answer it, yea, that he will. But how? He does not write to Jeremiah in justification of his own mission, but he writes to the priests, and instigates them to persecute Jeremiah. He writes in his own name as if he must be dictator to all mankind. But it is chiefly directed to Zephaniah, who was either the immediate son of Maaseiah, or of the 24th course of the priests, of which Maaseiah was the father and head. He was not the high priest, but suffragan to the high priest, or in some considerable post of command in the temple, as Pashur, ch. xx. 1. 1. He puts him and the other priests in mind of the duty of their place (v. 26): The Lord hath made thee priest instead of Jehoiada the priest. Some think that he refers to the famous Jehoiada, that great reformer in the days of Joash. Or, rather, it was some other Jehoiada, his immediate predecessor in this office, who perhaps was carried to Babylon among the priests, v. 1. Zephaniah is advanced, sooner than he expected, to this place of trust and power, and Shemaiah would have him think that Providence had preferred him that he might persecute God's prophets, that he had come to this government for such a time as this. These priests' business was to examine every man that is mad and makes himself a prophet. God's faithful prophets are here represented as prophets of their own making, usurpers of the office, and lay-intruders, as men that were mad, actuated by some demon, distracted men and men in a frenzy. 2. He informs them of the letter which Jeremiah had written to the captives (v. 28). The false prophets had formerly said that the captivity would never come, ch. xiv. 13. Jeremiah had said that it would come, and the event had already proved him in the right. 3. He demands judgment against him, taking it for granted that he is mad, and makes himself a prophet. He expects that they will order him to be put in prison and in the stocks (v. 26), hoping that the captives in Babylon would not be influenced by him. He takes upon him to chide Zephaniah for his neglect (v. 27): Why hast thou not rebuked and restrained Jeremiah of Anathoth? God had confirmed his word in the mouth of Jeremiah; it had taken hold of them (Zech. i. 6); and yet, because he does not prophesy to them the smooth things they desired, they are resolved to look upon him as not duly called to the office of a prophet. They were now sent into a miserable thraldom for mocking the messengers of the Lord and misusing his prophets. Afflictions will not of themselves cure men of their sins, unless the grace of God work with them, but will rather exasperate the corruptions they are intended to mortify (Prov. xxvii. 22), Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar, yet will not his foolishness depart from him.

II. Zephaniah read this letter in the ears of Jeremiah. He had a respect for Jeremiah (for we find him employed in messages to him as a prophet, ch. xxi. 1, xxxvii. 3), and therefore protected him. He made Jeremiah acquainted with the contents of the letter, that he might see what enemies he had even among the captives.

III. The sentence passed upon Shemaiah for writing this letter. God sent him an answer: it was ordered to be sent to those of the captivity, who encouraged and countenanced him as if he had been a prophet of God's raising up, v. 31, 32. Shemaiah had made fools of them. He promised them peace in God's name, but God did not send him; he forced a commission, and made the people to trust in a lie, and by preaching false comfort to them deprived them of true comfort. He had made traitors of them; he had taught rebellion against the Lord, as Hananiah had done, ch. xxviii. 16. At his end he shall also be a fool (as the expression is, ch. xvii. 11); his name and family shall be buried in oblivion: He shall not have a man to dwell among this people; and neither he nor any that come from him shall behold the good that I will do for my people.

CHAP. XXX

The sermon which we have in this and the following chapter is very different. Most hitherto was by way of reproof; but these two chapters are wholly taken up with precious promises of a return out of captivity, typical of the glorious things reserved for the church in the days of the Messiah. The prophet is told to write it, because it is intended for the comfort of the generation to come, ver. 1–3. It is here promised, I. That they should hereafter have a joyful restoration. 1. Though they were now in great terror, ver. 4–7. 2 Though their oppressors were strong, ver. 8–10. 3. Though they were not restored, ver. 11. 4. Though all means of their deliverance seemed to fail and be cut off, ver. 12–14. 5. Though God himself had sent them into captivity, ver. 15, 16. 6. Though all looked upon their case as desperate, ver. 17. II. That after their joyful restoration they should have a happy settlement, their city should be rebuilt (ver. 18), their numbers increased (ver. 19, 20), their government established (ver. 21), God's covenant with them renewed (ver. 22), and their enemies destroyed and cut off, ver. 23, 24.

Verses 1–9

I. Jeremiah is directed to write what God had spoken to him in hopes that those might take more notice of it when in reading it they had leisure for a more considerate review. He must collect them and put them together, and God will now add unto them many like words. He must write them for the generations to come, who should see them accomplished. He must write them not in a letter, but in a book, to be preserved in the archives. And this prophecy must be written, that it may be read so it may appear how exactly the accomplishment answers the prediction. It is intimated that they shall be beloved for their fathers' sake (Rom. xi. 28); for therefore God will bring them again to Canaan, because it was the land that he gave to their fathers, which therefore they shall possess.

II. He is directed what to write. The very words are such as the Holy Ghost teaches, v. 4. 1. He must write a description of the consternation which the people were now in, and were likely to be in upon every attack that the Chaldeans made upon them (v. 5): We have heard a voice of trembling—terror echoing to the alarms of danger. The false prophets told them that they should have peace, but there is fear and not peace, so the margin reads. Even the men of war shall be overwhelmed with the calamities of their nation, and shall look like women in labour, whose pains come upon them in great extremity and they know that they cannot escape them, v. 6. Alas! for that day is great, a day of judgment, which is called the great day, the great and terrible day of the Lord (Joel ii. 31, Jude 6), great, so that there has been none like it. The last destruction of Jerusalem is thus spoken of by our Saviour as unparalleled, Matt. xxiv. 21. It is even the time of Jacob's trouble, a sad time, when God's professing people shall be in distress above other people. The whole time of the captivity was a time of Jacob's trouble. 2. He must write the assurances which God had given that a happy end should at length be put to these calamities. (1) Jacob's troubles shall cease: He shall be saved out of them. (2) Jacob's troublers shall be disabled from doing him any further mischief, v. 8. "I will break his yoke from off thy neck, which has long lain so heavy, and has so sorely galled thee. I will burst thy bonds and restore thee to liberty and ease, they shall no more enrich themselves either by thy possessions or by thy labours." (3) That which crowns and completes the mercy is that they shall be restored to the free exercise of their religion again, v. 9. When the time shall come that they should be saved out of their trouble, God will prepare and qualify them for it by giving them a heart to serve him, and by giving them opportunity to serve him. Therefore we are delivered out of the hands of our enemies, that we may serve God, Luke i. 74, 75. They shall serve their own God, and neither be inclined, nor compelled, as they had been in the day of their captivity, to serve other gods. They shall serve David their king, such governors as God should from time to time set over them, of the line of David (as Zerubbabel). But this has a further meaning. The Chaldee paraphrase reads it, They shall obey (or hearken to) the Messiah (or Christ), the Son of David, their king. To him the Jewish interpreters apply it. That dispensation which commenced at their return out of captivity brought them to the Messiah. He is called David their king because he was the Son of David (Matt. xxii. 42) and he answered to the name, Matt. xx, 31, 32. God is often in the New Testament said to have raised up Jesus, raised him up as a King, Acts iii. 26; xiii. 23, 33. Those that serve the Lord as their God must give up themselves to Jesus Christ, to be ruled by him. For all men must honour the Son as they honour the Father, and come into the service and worship of God by him as Mediator. Those to whom he gives rest must take his yoke upon them.

Verses 10–17

The deplorable case of the Jews in captivity is set forth, but many precious promises are given them.

I. God himself appeared against them: he scattered them (v. 11); he did all these things unto them, v. 15. This was intended by him as a fatherly chastisement, and no other (v. 11): "I will correct thee in measure, or according to judgment, no more than thou deservest, no more than thou canst well bear." God hates sin most in those that are nearest to him. God here corrects his people for the multitude of their iniquity, and because their sins were increased, v. 14, 15. What God intended as a fatherly chastisement they and others interpreted as an act of hostility; they looked upon him as having wounded them with the wound of an enemy and with the chastisement of a cruel one (v. 14). It did indeed seem as if God had dealt thus severely with them, as if he had fought against them, Isa. lxiii. 10. Job complains that God had become cruel to him and multiplied his wounds.

II. Their friends forsook them, v. 13. If we be reproached, we expect that our friends should appear in vindication of us. If we be sick, or sore, or wounded, we expect our friends should sympathise with us, and, if occasion be, lend a hand for the healing. Here there is none to do that, none to bind up thy wounds. All thy lovers have forgotten thee. When God is against a people who will be for them? Their case seemed desperate and past relief (v. 12): Thy bruise is incurable, thy wound grievous, and (v. 15) thy sorrow is incurable. Their sorrow would not admit of any alleviation, but they seemed to be hardened in it. In this deplorable condition they are looked upon with disdain (v. 17): They called thee an outcast, abandoned to ruin; they said, This is Zion, whom no man seeks after. Now all was in ruins. When they looked on the people that formerly dwelt in Zion, but were now in captivity, they called them outcasts; these are those who belong to Zion, but no man seeks after them, or enquires concerning them.

III. For all this God will work deliverance and salvation for them in due time. 1. Though he seemed to stand at a distance from them, yet he assures them of his presence with them, I will save thee, v. 10 I am with thee, to save thee, v. 11. 2. Though they were remote from their own land, afar off in the land of their captivity, yet there shall salvation find them out, thence shall it fetch them, and their seed, v. 10. 3. Though they were now full of fears, yet the time shall come when they shall be in rest and quiet, safe and easy, and none shall make them afraid, v. 10. 4. Though the nations into which they were dispersed should be brought to ruin, yet they should be preserved (v. 11): Though I make a full end of the nations whither I have scattered thee, yet I will not make a full end of thee. God's church may sometimes be brought very low, but he will not make a full end of it, ch. v. 10, 18. 5. Though God correct them, and justly, yet he will return in mercy to them, and even their sin shall not prevent their deliverance when God's time shall come. 6. Though their adversaries were mighty, God will break their power (v. 16): All that devour thee shall be devoured. "They shall everyone of them, without exception, go into captivity, and the day will come when those that now spoil thee shall be a spoil." 7. Though the wound seem incurable, God will make a cure of it (v. 17): I will restore health unto thee.

IV. They are cautioned against inordinate fear and grief, for in these precious promises there is enough to silence both. Fear thou not, O my servant Jacob! neither be dismayed. They must not sorrow as those that have no hope, v. 15. "Why criest thou for thy affliction? It is for thy sin (v. 14, 15), and therefore, instead of repining, thou shouldst be repenting."

Verses 18–24

Further intimations of the favour God had in reserve for them after the days of their calamity were over.

I. The city and temple should be rebuilt, v. 18. Jacob's tents, and his dwelling-places, felt the effects of the captivity, for they lay in ruins, but the habitations shall be repaired, and therein God will have mercy upon their dwelling-places, that had been monuments of his justice. Then the city of Jerusalem shall be built upon her own heap, her own hill, though now it be no better than a ruinous heap. He that can make of a city a heap (Isa. xxv. 2) can when he pleases make of a heap a city again. The palace (the temple, God's palace) shall remain after the manner thereof; it shall be built after the old model.

II. The sacred feasts should again be solemnized (v. 19): Out of the city, and the temple, and all the dwelling-places of Jacob, shall proceed thanksgiving and the voice of those that make merry.

III. The people should be multiplied, and increased: They shall not be few, they shall not be small, but shall make a figure among the nations: for I will multiply them and I will glorify them. It is for the honour of the church to have many added to it that shall be saved. There shall be a constant succession of faithful magistrates in the congregation of the elders, and of faithful worshippers in the congregation of the saints.

IV. They shall be blessed with a good government (v. 21): Their nobles and judges shall be of themselves, of their own nation, and they shall no longer be ruled by strangers and enemies; their governor shall proceed from the midst of them, shall be one that has been a sharer with them in the afflictions of their captive state; and this has reference to Christ our governor, David our king (v. 9); he is of ourselves, in all things made like unto his brethren. And I will cause him to draw near; this may be understood either, 1. Of the people, Jacob and Israel: "I will cause them to draw near to me in the temple service, as formerly, to come into covenant with me, as my people" (v. 22). 2. It may be understood of the governor; for it is a single person that is spoken of: Their governor shall be duly called to his office, shall draw near to God to consult him upon all occasions. But it looks further, to Christ, to him as Mediator. The proper work and office of Christ, as Mediator, is to draw near and approach unto God, for us, and in our name and stead, as the high priest of our profession. God the Father did cause Jesus Christ thus to draw near and approach to him as Mediator. He anointed him for this purpose, and declared himself well pleased in him. His own voluntary undertaking, in compliance with his Father's will and in compassion to fallen man, engaged him.

V. They shall be taken again into covenant with God, according to the covenant made with their fathers (v. 22): You shall be my people; and it is God's good work in us that makes us to him a people, a people for his name, Acts. xv. 14.

VI. Their enemies shall be reckoned with and brought down (v. 20): I will punish all those that oppress them, so that it shall appear to all a dangerous thing to touch God's anointed, Ps. cv. 15. These two verses (23–24) we had before (ch. xxiii. 19, 20); there they were a denunciation of God's wrath against the wicked hypocrites in Israel; here against the wicked oppressors of Israel. The wrath of God against the wicked is here represented to be like a whirlwind, irresistible. Whirlwinds are usually short, but this shall be a continuing whirlwind. It shall accomplish that for which it is sent: The anger of the Lord shall not return till he have done it. The purposes of his wrath, as well as the purposes of his love, will all be fulfilled; he will perform the intents of his heart.

CHAP. XXXI

Good words and comfortable words for the encouragement of the captives, assuring them that God would in due time make them a great and happy nation again, especially by sending them the Messiah, in whose kingdom and grace many of these promises were to have their full accomplishment. I. They shall be restored to peace and joy, ver. 1–14. II. Their sorrow for the loss of their children shall be at an end, ver. 15–17. III. They shall repent of their sins, and God will graciously accept them, ver. 18–20. IV. They shall be increased, both their children and their cattle, ver. 21–30. V. God will renew his covenant with them, and enrich it with spiritual blessings, ver. 31–34. VI. These blessings shall be secured to theirs after them, ver. 25–37. VII. As an earnest of this the city of Jerusalem shall be rebuilt, ver. 38–40.

Verses 1–9

God assures his people,

I. That he will again take them into a covenant relation to himself. His own people shall be owned by him as the children of his love: I will be the God (that is, I will show myself to be the God) of all the families of Israel (v. 1)—not of the two tribes only, but of all the tribes; not only their state in general, but their particular families, and the interests of them, shall have a special relation to God. If we and our houses serve the Lord, we and our houses shall be protected and blessed by him, Prov. iii. 33.

II. That he will do for them, in bringing them out of Babylon, as he had done for their fathers when he delivered them out of Egypt. 1. He puts them in mind of what he did for their fathers when he brought them out of Egypt, v. 2. They were then, as these were, a people left of the sword, that sword of Pharaoh with which he cut off all the male children as soon as they were born. They were then in the wilderness, where they seemed to be lost and forgotten, as these were now in a strange land, and yet they found grace in God's sight, were owned and highly honoured by him, and he was at this time going to cause them to rest in Canaan. God is still the same. 2. They put him in mind of what God had done for their fathers, intimating that they now saw not such signs, and were ready to ask, as Gideon did, Where are all the wonders that our fathers told us of? The years of ancient times were glorious years; but now it is otherwise; what good will it do us that he appeared of old to us when now he is a God that hides himself from us? Isa. xlv. 15. 3. To this he answers with an assurance of the constancy of his love: Yea, I have loved thee, not only with an ancient love, but with an everlasting love, a love that shall never fail, however the comforts of it may for a time be suspended. Nothing can separate them from that love. Those whom God loves with this love he will draw into covenant and communion with himself, by the influences of his Spirit upon their souls.

III. That he will again form them into a people, and give them a very joyful settlement in their own land, v. 4, 5. They shall resume their harps which had been hung upon the willow-trees, shall tune them, and shall themselves be in tune to make use of them. Is the joy of the city maintained by the products of the country? It is so; and therefore it is promised (v. 5), Thou shalt yet plant vines upon the mountains of Samaria, which had been the head city of the kingdom of Israel, in opposition to that of Judah; but they shall now be united (Ezek. xxxvii. 22), and there shall be such perfect peace and security that men shall apply themselves wholly to the improvement of their ground: The planters shall plant, not fearing the soldiers' coming to eat the fruits of what they had planted, or to pluck it up; but they themselves shall eat them freely, as common things, not forbidden fruits.

IV. That they shall have liberty and opportunity to worship God in the ordinances of his own appointment (v. 6): There shall be a day, and a glorious day it will be, when the watchmen upon Mount Ephraim, that are set to stand sentinel there, to give notice of the approach of the enemy, finding that all is very quiet and that there is no appearance of danger, shall desire for a time to be discharged from their post, that they may go up to Zion, to praise God for the public peace. But that which is most observable here is that the watchmen of Ephraim are forward to promote the worship of God at Jerusalem, whereas formerly the watchman of Ephraim was hatred against the house of his God (Hos. ix. 8), and, instead of inviting people to Zion, laid snares for those that set their faces thitherward, Hos. v. 1.

V. That God shall have the glory and the church, the honour and comfort of this blessed change (v. 7): Sing with gladness for Jacob, that is, let all her friends and wellwishers rejoice with her, Deut. xxxii. 43. Rejoice, you Gentiles with his people, Rom. xv. 10. Publish you, praise you. In publishing these tidings, praise the God of Israel, praise the Israel of God, speak honourably of both.

VI. That, in order to a happy settlement in their own land, they shall have a joyful return out of the land of their captivity (v. 8, 9). 1. Though they are scattered to places far remote, yet they shall be brought together from the north country, and from the coasts of the earth. 2. Though many of them are very unfit for travel, yet that shall be no hindrance to them: The blind and the lame shall come; such a goodwill shall they have to their journey, and such a good heart upon it, that they shall not make their blindness and lameness an excuse for staying where they are. Their companions will be ready to help them, will be eyes to the blind and legs to the lame, as good Christians ought to be to one another in their travels heavenward, Job. xxix. 15. But, above all, their God will help them; and let none plead that he is blind who has God for his guide, or lame who has God for his strength. The women with child are heavy, and it is not fit that they should undertake such a journey, much less those that travail with child; and yet, when it is to return to Zion, neither the one nor the other shall make any difficulty of it. When God calls we must not plead any inability to come; for he that calls us will help us, will strengthen us. They shall weep with more bitterness and more tenderness for sin, when they are delivered out of their captivity, than ever they did when they were groaning under it. Prayers help to wipe away tears. With favours will I lead them (so the margin reads it). Is the country they pass through dry and thirsty? I will cause them to walk by the rivers of waters, not the waters of a landflood, which fail in summer. Is it a wilderness where there is no road, no track? I will cause them to walk in a straight way, which they shall not miss. Is it a rough and rocky country? Yet they shall not stumble. Whithersoever God gives his people a clear call he will either find them or make them a ready way. A reason given why God will take all this care of his people: For I am a Father to Israel, and therefore will maintain him (Ps. ciii. 13): and Ephraim is my firstborn; even Ephraim, who, having gone astray from God, was no more worthy to be called a son, shall yet be owned as a first-born, particularly dear, and heir of a double portion of blessings. The same reason that was given for their release out of Egypt is given for their release out of Babylon; they are free-born and therefore must not be enslaved, are born to God and therefore must not be the servants of men. Exod. iv. 22, 23, Israel is my son, even my first-born; let my son go that he may serve me.

Verses 10–17

The purposes of God's love concerning his people. This is a word of the Lord which the nations must hear, for it is a prophecy of a work of the Lord. It will be a piece of news that will spread all the world over.

It is foretold, 1. That those who are dispersed shall be brought together again from their dispersions: He that scattereth Israel will gather him, v. 10, and when he has gathered him into one body, one fold, he will keep him, as a shepherd does his flock, from being scattered again. 2. That those who are sold and alienated shall be redeemed and brought back, v. 11. Though the enemy that had got possession of him was stronger than he, yet the Lord, who is stronger than all, has redeemed and ransomed him, not by price, but by power. 3. That with their liberty they shall have plenty and joy, and God shall be honoured, v. 12, 13. When they shall have returned to their own land they shall come and sing in the high place of Zion; on the top of that holy mountain they shall sing to the praise and glory of God. We read that they did so when the foundation of the temple was laid there, Ezra iii. 11. They shall flow together to the goodness of the Lord; that is, they shall flock in great numbers and with great cheerfulness, as streams of water, to the goodness of the Lord, to the temple where he causes his goodness to pass before his people. They shall come together in solemn assemblies, to praise him for his goodness, and to pray for the continuance of it; they shall come to bless him for his goodness, in giving them wheat, and wine, and oil, and the young of the flock and of the herd. Therefore they honour God with the first-fruits out of which they bring offerings to his altar. Our souls are as gardens when they are watered with the dews of God's Spirit and grace. It is a precious promise that they shall not sorrow any more at all; it is only in that new Jerusalem that all tears shall be wiped away, Rev. xxi. 4. However, the returned captives had not any more those causes for sorrow which they had formerly had; and therefore (v. 13) young men and old shall rejoice together. 4. That both the ministers and those they minister to shall have abundant satisfaction in what God gives them (v. 14): I will satiate the soul of the priests with fatness; there shall be such a plenty of sacrifices brought to the altar that those who live upon the altar shall live comfortably, they and their families shall be satiated with fatness, and my people shall be satisfied with my goodness. This is applicable to the spiritual blessings which the redeemed of the Lord enjoy by Jesus Christ, infinitely more valuable than corn, and wine, and oil. 5. That those particularly who had been in sorrow for the loss of their children who were carried into captivity should have that sorrow turned into joy upon their return, v. 15–17. In Ramah was there a voice heard, at the time when the general captivity was nothing but lamentation, and bitter weeping, more there than in other places, because there Nebuzaradan had the general rendezvous of his captives, as appears, ch. xl. 1, where we find him sending Jeremiah back from Ramah. Rachel is here said to weep for her children. The sepulchre of Rachel was between Ramah and Bethlehem. Benjamin, one of the two tribes, and Ephraim, head of the ten tribes, were both descendants from Rachel. She had but two sons, the elder of whom was one for whom his father grieved and refused to be comforted (Gen. xxxvii. 35); the other she herself called Benoni—the son of my sorrow. Now the inhabitants of Ramah did in like manner grieve for their sons and their daughters that were carried away (as 1 Sam. xxx. 6). The tender parents even refused to be comforted for their children, because they were not, were not with them, but were in the hands of their enemies; they were never likely to see them any more. This is applied by the evangelists to the great mourning that was at Bethlehem for the murder of the infants there by Herod (Matt. ii. 17–18), and this scripture is said to be then fulfilled. Though we mourn, we must not murmur. In order to repress inordinate grief, we must consider that there is hope in our end, hope that the trouble will not last always, that it will be a happy end—the end will be peace. Though one generation falls in the wilderness, the next shall enter Canaan. Thy suffering work shall be rewarded. God makes his people glad according to the days wherein he has afflicted them, and so there is a proportion between the joys and the sorrows, as between the reward and the work, Rom. viii. 18. There is hope concerning children removed by death that they shall return to their own border, to the happy lot assigned them in the resurrection, a lot in the heavenly Canaan, that border of his sanctuary.

Verses 18–26

I. Ephraim's repentance, and return to God. Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols? Ephraim, the people, shall be as one man in their repentance. Ephraim is here weeping for sin, perhaps because Ephraim, the person from whom that tribe had its denomination, was a man of a tender spirit, mourned for his children many days (1 Chron. vii. 21, 22), and sorrow for sin is compared to that for an only son. He charges upon himself, in the first place, impatience under correction: "Thou hast chastised me; I have been under the rod, and I needed it, I deserved it; I was justly chastised, chastised as a bullock, who would never have felt the goad if he had not first rebelled against the yoke." This is the sin he finds himself guilty of now; but (v. 19) he reflects upon his sins in the days of his youth; now he remembers the reproach of his youth. He is here angry, having a holy indignation at himself for his sin and folly: He smote upon his thigh, as the publican upon his breast. He was amazed at his own stupidity and frowardness: He was ashamed, yea even confounded. He finds he cannot by any power of his own keep himself close with God, much less, when he has revolted, bring himself back to God, and therefore he prays, Turn thou me and I shall be turned. See ch. xvii. 14, Heal me and I shall be healed. He is here rejoicing in the experience he had of the blessed effect of divine grace: Surely after that I was turned I repented. All the pious workings of our heart towards God are the consequence of the working of his grace in us. When sinners come to a right knowledge they will come to a right way. Ephraim was chastised, and that did not produce the desired effect, it went no further: I was chastised, and that was all. But, when the instructions of God's Spirit accompanied the corrections of his providence, then the work was done.

II. God's compassion on Ephraim and the kind reception he finds with God, v. 20. 1. God owns him for a child, though he has been an undutiful child and a prodigal: Is Ephraim my dear son? Is he a pleasant child? Or, as it is sometimes supplied, Is not Ephraim my dear son? Is he not a pleasant child? Yes, now he repents and returns. I do earnestly remember him still, my thoughts towards him are thoughts of peace. When God afflicts his people, he does not forget them; when he casts them out of their land, he does not cast them out of sight, nor out of mind. It was God's compassion that mitigated Ephraim's punishment. My heart is turned within me (Hos. xi. 8, 9); and now the same compassion accepted Ephraim's repentance. He resolves to do him good: I will surely have mercy upon him, saith the Lord.

III. Gracious encouragements given to the people of God in Babylon to prepare for their return to their own land. Let them not tremble and lose their spirits; let them not trifle and lose their time; but with a firm resolution and a close application address themselves to their journey, v. 21, 22. "Turn again, O virgin of Israel! a virgin to be again espoused to thy God; turn again to these thy cities; though they are laid waste and in ruins, they are thy cities, which thy God gave thee, and therefore turn again to them." They must return the same way that they went, that the remembrance of the sorrows which attended them, or which their fathers had told them of, might make them the more thankful for their deliverance. Those that departed into the bondage of sin must return to the duties they neglected, must do their first works. Set thy heart towards the highway. The way from Babylon to Zion, from the bondage of sin to the glorious liberty of God's children, is a highway; yet none are likely to walk in it, unless they set their hearts towards it. Set thee up way-marks, and make thee high heaps or pillars; send before to have such set up in all places where there is any danger of missing the road. Let those that go first, and are best acquainted with the way, set up such directions for those that follow. How long wilt thou go about, O backsliding daughter? Let not their minds fluctuate, or be uncertain. Let them not distract themselves with care and fear, but let them cast themselves upon God, and then let their minds be fixed. They are encouraged to do this by an assurance God gives them that he would create a new thing in the earth, a woman shall compass a man. The church of God, that is weak and feeble as a woman, altogether unapt for military employments (Isa. liv. 6), shall besiege, and prevail against a mighty man. The church is compared to a woman, Rev. xii. 1. And, whereas we find armies compassing the camp of the saints (Rev. xx. 9), now the camp of the saints shall compass them. Many good interpreters understand this new thing to be the incarnation of Christ, which had sometimes been given them for a sign, Isa. vii. 14; ix. 6. A woman, the virgin Mary, enclosed in her womb the Mighty One; for so Geber, the word here used, signifies; and God is called Gibbor, the Mighty God (ch. xxxii. 18), as also is Christ in Isa. ix. 6. He is El-Gibbor, the mighty God.

IV. A prospect given them of a happy settlement in their own land again. All their neighbours will give them a good word and put up a good prayer for them (v. 23): As yet, or rather yet again (though Judah and Jerusalem have long been a hissing), this speech shall be used, as it was formerly, concerning the land of Judah and the cities thereof, The Lord bless you, O habitation of justice and mountain of holiness! This intimates that they shall return much reformed; and this reformation shall be so conspicuous that all about them shall take notice of it. The cities, that used to be nests of pirates, shall be habitations of justice; the mountain of Israel, and especially Mount Zion, shall be a mountain of holiness. There shall be great plenty among them (v. 24, 25): There shall dwell in Judah itself, though it has now long lain waste, both husbandmen and shepherds, the two ancient and honourable employments of Cain and Abel, Gen. iv. 2. "I have satiated the weary and sorrowful soul"; those that have been long sorrowful in their captivity, shall now enjoy great plenty. This is applicable to the spiritual blessings God has in store for all true penitents.

V. The prophet tells us what pleasure the discovery of this brought, v. 26. "Upon this I awaked, overcome with joy, which burst the fetters of sleep; and I reflected upon my dream, and it was such as had made my sleep sweet to me; I was refreshed, as men are with quiet sleep."

Verses 27–34

It is here further promised,

I. The people of God shall become both numerous and prosperous. Israel and Judah shall be replenished both with men and cattle, v. 27. This should be a type of the wonderful increase of the gospel-church. God will build them, and plant them, v. 28. He will watch over them to do them good. Everything for a long time had turned so much against them, that it seemed as if God had watched over them to pluck up and to throw down; but now everything shall happily strengthen and advance their interests.

II. They shall be reckoned with no further for the sins of their fathers (v. 29, 30). Our Saviour tells the wicked Jews in his days that they should smart for their fathers' sins, because they persisted in them, Matt. xxiii. 35, 36. But it is here promised that God would proceed no further for their fathers' sins, but remember his covenant with their fathers and do them good according to that covenant: They shall no more complain, as they have done, that the fathers have eaten sour grapes and the children's teeth are set on edge, but everyone shall die for his own iniquity still; he will reckon with particular persons that provoke him.

III. God will renew his covenant with them, so that all these blessings they shall have, not by providence only, but by promise. But this covenant refers to gospel times, the latter days that shall come; for of gospel grace the apostle understands it (Heb. viii. 8, 9, &c.), where this whole passage is quoted as a summary of the covenant of grace made with believers in Jesus Christ. This covenant is made—with the house of Israel and Judah, with the gospel church, the Israel of God on which peace shall be (Gal. vi. 16), with the spiritual seed of believing Abraham and praying Jacob. Judah and Israel had been two separate kingdoms, but were united after their return, in the joint favours God bestowed upon them; so Jews and Gentiles were in the gospel church and covenant. It is a new covenant and not according to the covenant made with them when they came out of Egypt. The ordinances and promises are more spiritual and heavenly, and the discoveries much more clear. That covenant God made with them when he took them by the hand, as if they had been blind, or lame, or weak, to lead them out of the land of Egypt, which covenant they broke. It was God that made this covenant, but it was the people that broke it; for our salvation is of God, but our sin and ruin are of ourselves. The particular articles of his covenant all contain spiritual blessings; not, "I will give them the land of Canaan and a numerous issue," but, "I will give them pardon, and peace, and grace, good heads and good hearts." He promises he will incline them to their duty: I will put my law in their inward part and write it in their heart. He will take them into relation to himself: I will be their God, a God all-sufficient to them, and they shall be my people, a loyal obedient people to me. Those that rightly know God's name will seek him, and serve him, and put their trust in him (v. 34): All shall know me; all shall be welcome to the knowledge of God and shall have the means of that knowledge; his ways shall be known upon earth, whereas, for many ages, in Judah only was God known. The priests preached but now and then, and in the temple, and to a few in comparison; but now all shall or may know God by frequenting the assemblies of Christians, wherein, through all parts of the church, the good knowledge of God shall be taught. In short, the things of God shall by the gospel of Christ be brought to a clearer light than ever (2. Tim. i. 10), and the people of God shall by the grace of Christ be brought to a clearer sight of those things than ever, Eph. i. 17, 18. Sin shall be pardoned. This is made the reason of all the rest: For I will forgive their iniquity, will forgive and forget: I will remember their sin no more.

Verses 35–40

The great thing here secured to us is that while the world stands God will have a church in it, which, though sometimes it may be brought very low, shall yet be raised again, and its interests re-established; it is built upon a rock, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.

I. The building of the world, and the firmness of that building, are evidences of the power and faithfulness of God who has undertaken the establishment of his church. He that built all things at first is God (Heb. iii. 4). The constancy of the kingdom of nature may encourage us to depend upon the divine promise for the continuance of the glories of the kingdom of grace.

1. The glories of the kingdom of nature. He gives the sun for a light by day (v. 35), not only made it at first to be so, but still gives it to be so; for the light and heat, and all the influences of the sun, continually depend upon its great Creator. He gives the ordinances of the moon and stars for a light by night; their motions are called ordinances because they are regular and under rule. See Job xxxviii. 31–33. Notice the government of the sea, and the check that is given to its proud billows: The Lord of hosts divides the sea, or (as some read it) settles the sea, when the waves thereof roar. Notice the vastness of the heavens and the unmeasurable extent of the firmament; the heavens above cannot be measured (v. 37), and yet God fills them. Notice the mysteriousness even of that part of the creation in which our lot is cast. Notice the immovable steadfastness of all these (v. 36): These ordinances cannot depart from before God; for all are his servants, Ps. cxix. 90, 91. The heavens are often clouded, and the sun and moon often eclipsed, the earth may quake and the sea be tossed, but they all keep their place, are moved, but not removed.

2. The securities of the kingdom of grace inferred hence: the seed of Israel shall not cease from being a nation, 1 Pet. ii. 9. When Israel according to the flesh is no longer a nation the children of the promise are counted for the seed (Rom. ix. 8) and God will not cast off all the seed of Israel, though they have done very wickedly, v. 37. The God that has undertaken the preservation of the church is a God of almighty power, who upholds all things by his almighty word. Our help stands in his name who made heaven and earth, and therefore can do anything. God would not take all this care of the world but that he designs glory; and how shall he have it but by securing to himself a church in it, a people that shall be to him for a name and a praise? If the order of the creation therefore continues firm because it was well-fixed at first, and is not altered because it needs no alteration, the method of grace shall for the same reason continue invariable, as it was at first well settled. He who has promised to preserve a church for himself has approved himself faithful to the word which he has spoken concerning the stability of the world.

II. The rebuilding of Jerusalem, now in ruins, shall be an earnest of these great things that God will do for the gospel church, the heavenly Jerusalem, v. 38–40. The days will come, though they may be long in coming, when Jerusalem shall be entirely built again, as large as ever it was. The wall which Nehemiah built, and which, the more punctually to fulfil the prophecy, began about the tower of Hananeel, here mentioned (Neh. iii. 1), enclosed as much ground as is here intended, though we cannot certainly determine the places here called the gate of the corner, the hill Gareb, &c. When built it shall be consecrated to God and to his service (v. 38), and even the suburbs and fields adjacent shall be holy unto the Lord. The whole city shall be as it were one temple, one holy place, as the new Jerusalem is, which therefore has no temple, because it is all temple. It shall continue very long, the time of the new city from the return to its last destruction being as long as that of the old from David to the captivity. But this promise was to have its full accomplishment in the gospel church, which is the spiritual Israel, and therefore God will not cast it off. It is the holy city, and therefore all the powers of men shall not pluck it up, nor throw it down.

CHAP. XXXII

I. Jeremiah imprisoned for foretelling the destruction of Jerusalem and the captivity of king Zedekiah, ver. 1–5. II. We have him buying land, by divine appointment, as an assurance that in due time a happy end should be put to the present troubles, ver. 6–15. III. We have his prayer, which he offered up to God upon that occasion, ver. 16–25. IV. We have a message which God entrusted him to deliver to the people. 1. He must foretell the utter destruction of Judah and Jerusalem for their sins, ver. 26–35. But, 2. At the same time he must assure them that, though the destruction was total, it should not be final, ver. 36–44.

Verses 1–15

The desolations of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldeans came gradually upon them, but, they not meeting him by repentance in the way of his judgments, he proceeded till all was laid waste, which was in the eleventh year of Zedekiah; now what is here recorded happened in the tenth. The king of Babylon's army had now invested Jerusalem and was carrying on the siege with vigour.

I. Jeremiah prophesies that both the city and the court shall fall into the hands of the king of Babylon. He tells them that God, whose city it was, will give it into their hands and put it out of his protection (v. 3)—that, though Zedekiah attempt to make his escape, he shall be overtaken, and shall be delivered a prisoner into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar. He shall hear the king of Babylon pronounce his doom, and see with what fury and indignation he will look upon him (His eyes shall behold his eyes, v. 4)—that Zedekiah shall be carried to Babylon, and continue a miserable captive there, until God visit him, that is, till God put an end to his life by a natural death, as Nebuchadnezzar had long before put an end to his days by putting out his eyes.

II. For prophesying thus he is imprisoned, not in the common gaol, but in the king of Judah's house, and there not closely confined, but would be sheltered from the abuses of the mob. However, it was a prison, and Zedekiah shut him up in it for prophesying as he did, v. 2, 3. So far was he from humbling himself before Jeremiah (2 Chron. xxxvi. 12), that he hardened himself against him. Though he had formerly so far owned him a prophet as to desire him to enquire of the Lord for them (ch. xxi. 2), yet now he chides him for prophesying (v. 3), and shuts him up in prison, perhaps to restrain him from prophesying any further.

III. Being in prison, he purchases from a near relation of his a piece of ground that lay in Anathoth, v. 6, 7, &c. It was most strange that he should buy a piece of land when he himself knew that the whole land was now to be laid waste and fall into the hands of the Chaldeans. But it was the will of God that he should buy it, and he submitted, though the money seemed to be thrown away. His kinsman came to offer it to him; it was not of his own seeking; besides, the right of redemption belonged to him (v. 8), and if he refused he would not do the kinsman's part. It was land that lay within the suburbs of a priests' city, and, if he should refuse it, there was danger lest, in these times of disorder, it might be sold to one of another tribe, which was contrary to the law. It would likewise be a kindness to his kinsman, who probably was at this time in great want of money. When Jeremiah knew by Hanameel's coming to him, as God had foretold he would, that it was the word of the Lord, that it was his mind that he should make this purchase, he made no more difficulty of it, but bought the field. He was very honest and exact in paying. He weighed him the money, did not press him to take it upon his report. It was seventeen shekels of silver. We shall not wonder at the smallness of the price if we consider what scarcity there was of money at this time and how little lands were counted upon. He was very prudent in preserving the writings. They were subscribed before witnesses. One copy was sealed up, the other was open. The deeds of purchase were lodged in the hands of Baruch, before witnesses, and he was ordered to lay them up in an earthen vessel that they might continue many days, for the use of Jeremiah's heirs. The design of having this bargain made was to signify that though Jerusalem was now besieged, and the whole country was likely to be laid waste, yet the time should come when houses, and fields, and vineyards should be again possessed in this land, v. 15. As God appointed Jeremiah to confirm his predictions of the approaching destruction of Jerusalem by his own practice in living unmarried, so he now appointed him to confirm his predictions of the future restoration of Jerusalem by his own practice in purchasing this field. Lucius Florus relates it as a great instance of the bravery of the Roman citizens that in the time of the second Punic War, when Hannibal besieged Rome and was very near making himself master of it, a field on which part of his army lay, being offered to sale at that time, was immediately purchased, in a firm belief that the Roman valour would raise the siege, lib. ii. cap. 6. And have not we much more reason to venture our all upon the word of God.

Verses 16–25

Jeremiah's prayer to God upon occasion of the discoveries God had made to him of his purposes concerning this nation, to pull it down, and in time to build it up again, which puzzled the prophet, who, though he delivered his messages faithfully, yet, in reflecting upon them, was greatly at a loss how to reconcile them; in that perplexity he poured out his soul before God in prayer. Jeremiah was in prison, in distress, in the dark about the meaning of God's providences, and then he prays.

I. Jeremiah adores God and gives him the glory due to his name as the Creator, v. 17–19. When at any time we are perplexed about the particular dispensations of Providence it is good for us to satisfy ourselves with the general doctrines of God's wisdom, power, and goodness. Let us consider, as Jeremiah does here, 1. That God is the fountain of all being, power, life, motion, and perfection: He made the heaven and the earth with his outstretched arm. 2. That with him nothing is impossible: Nothing is too hard for thee. 3. That he is a God of boundless mercy: "Thou not only art kind, but thou showest loving-kindness, not to a few, to here and there one, but to thousands, thousands of persons, thousands of generations." 4. That he is a God of impartial and inflexible justice. 5. That he is a God of universal dominion and command: He is the great God, for he is the mighty God. He is the Lord of hosts, of all hosts, that is his name. 6. That he contrives everything for the best: He is great in counsel, so deep are the designs of his wisdom.

II. He acknowledges the universal cognizance God takes of all the actions of the children of men (v. 19): Thy eyes are open upon all the sons of men, wherever they are, beholding the evil and the good, and upon all their ways, not as an unconcerned spectator, but as an observing judge; for men shall find God as they are found of him.

III. He recounts the great things God had done for his people Israel formerly. 1. He brought them out of Egypt, that house of bondage, with signs and wonders. Israel were reminded of it every year by the ordinance of the passover. All the neighbouring nations spoke of it, as that which redounded exceedingly to the glory of the God of Israel, and made him a name as at this day. 2. He brought them into Canaan, that land flowing with milk and honey. He swore to their fathers to give it them, and he did give it to the children (v. 22) and they came in and possessed it. It is good for us often to reflect upon the great things God did for his church formerly, especially in the first erecting of it, that work of wonder.

IV. He bewails the rebellions they had been guilty of against God, and the judgments God had brought upon them for these rebellions. It is a sad account he here gives of the ungrateful conduct of that people towards God. He had done everything that he had promised to do, but they had done nothing of all that he commanded them to do (v. 23). 1. He compares the present state of Jerusalem with the divine predictions, and finds that what God has spoken has come to pass. God had given them fair warning of it before; and, if they had regarded this, the ruin would have been prevented. 2. He commits the present state of Jerusalem to the divine compassion (v. 24): Behold the mounts, or ramparts, or the engines which they make use of to batter the city. "Behold thou seest it. Is this the city that thou hast chosen to put thy name there? And shall it be thus abandoned?" He neither complains of God for what he had done nor prescribes to God what he should do, but desires he would behold their case. Whatever trouble we are in we may comfort ourselves with this, that God sees it and sees how to remedy it.

V. He seems desirous to be let further into the meaning of the order God had now given him to purchase his kinsman's field (v. 25): "Though the city is given into the hands of the Chaldeans, and no man is likely to enjoy what he has, yet thou hast said unto me, Buy thou the field." As soon as he understood that it was the mind of God he did it; but, when he had done it, he desired better to understand why God had ordered him to do it. Though we are bound to follow God with an implicit obedience, yet we should endeavour that it may be more and more an intelligent obedience. We must never dispute God's statutes and judgments, but we may and must enquire, What mean these statutes and judgments? Deut. vi. 20.

Verses 26-44

God's answer to Jeremiah's prayer to quiet his mind. It is a full discovery of the purposes of God's wrath against the present generation and the purposes of his grace concerning the future generations. Jeremiah knew not how to sing both of mercy and judgment, but God here teaches to sing unto him of both. When Jeremiah was ordered to buy the field in Anathoth he hoped that God was about to order the Chaldeans to raise the siege. "No," says God, "the execution of the sentence shall go on; Jerusalem shall be laid in ruins." But, lest Jeremiah should think that his being ordered to buy this field intimated that all the mercy God had in store for his people, after their return, was only that they should have the possession of their own land again, he informs him that that was but a type of those spiritual blessings which should then be abundantly bestowed upon them, unspeakably more valuable than fields and vineyards; in this word of the Lord to Jeremiah, we have first as dreadful threatenings and then as precious promises as perhaps any we have in the Old Testament.

I. The ruin of Judah and Jerusalem is here pronounced. 1. God here asserts his own sovereignty and power (v. 27): Behold, I am Jehovah, a self-existent self-sufficient being; I am that I am; I am the God of all flesh, that is, of all mankind. 2. He abides by what he had often said of the destruction of Jerusalem by the king of Babylon (v. 28): I will give this city into his hand, and he shall take it, v. 29. The Chaldeans shall come and set fire to it, shall burn it and all the houses in it, God's house not excepted, nor the king's either. 3. The reason for these severe proceedings against the city. It is sin that ruins it. They were impudent and daring in sin. They offered incense to Baal, not in corners, as men ashamed, but upon the tops of their houses (v. 29). They did it to provoke me to anger, v. 29. They have only provoked me to anger with the works of their hands, v. 30. And again (v. 32), All the evil which they have done was to provoke me to anger. They resolved to try his jealousy and dare him to his face. "Jerusalem has been to me a provocation of my anger and fury," v. 31. They had continued provoking God: "They have done evil before me from their youth, ever since they were first formed into a people (v. 30), witness their murmurings and rebellions in the wilderness." And as for Jerusalem, though it was the holy city, it has been a provocation from the day that they built it, even to this day, v. 31. All contributed to the common guilt, and therefore were justly involved in the common ruin. Not only the children of Israel, that had revolted from the temple, but the children of Judah too, that still adhered to it. God had again and again called them to repentance, but they rudely turned their back on him. "I taught them better manners, rising up early, in teaching them, studying to adapt the teaching to their capacities, but all in vain." There was in their idolatries an impious contempt of God; for (v. 34) they set their abominations (their idols) in the house which is called by my name, to defile it. They were guilty of the most unnatural cruelty to their own children; for they sacrificed them to Moloch, v. 35. They caused Judah to sin, v. 35. The whole country was infected with the contagious idolatries and iniquities of Jerusalem.

II. The restoration of Judah and Jerusalem is here promised, v. 36, &c. God will in judgment remember mercy, and there will a time come, a set time, to favour Zion. This people were now at length brought to despair. When the judgment was threatened at a distance they had no fear; when it attacked them they had no hope. They said concerning the city (v. 36), It shall be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon, by the sword, famine, and pestilence. Concerning the country they said, with vexation (v. 43), It is desolate, without man or beast; there is no relief, there is no remedy. It is given into the hand of the Chaldeans. The hope that God gives them of mercy: Though their carcases must fall in captivity, yet their children shall again see this good land and the goodness of God in it. They shall be brought up from their captivity and shall come and settle again in this land, v. 37. He had dispersed them, and driven them into all countries. Those that fled dispersed themselves; those that fell into the enemies' hands were dispersed by them, in policy, to prevent combinations among them. God's hand was in both. But now God will gather them out of all the countries whither they were driven, as he promised in the law (Deut. xxx. 3, 4). Being reformed, and having returned to God, neither their own consciences within nor their enemies without shall be a terror to them. He promises (v. 41): I will plant them in this land assuredly; they shall here enjoy a holy security and repose, and they shall take root here, shall be planted in stability. God will renew his covenant with them, a covenant of grace, the blessings of which are spiritual. It is called an everlasting covenant (v. 40), not only because God will be for ever faithful to it, but because the consequences of it will be everlasting. For, doubtless, here the promises look further than to Israel according to the flesh, and are sure to all believers. Good Christians may apply them to themselves and plead them with God. They shall be my people. He will make them his by working in them all the characters and dispositions of his people. "And, to make them truly, completely, and eternally happy, I will be their God." God will give them a heart to fear him, v. 39. That which he requires of those whom he takes into covenant with him as his people is that they reverence his majesty, dread his wrath, stand in awe of his authority, pay homage to him, and give him the glory due unto his name. It is repeated (v. 40): I will put my fear in their hearts, that is, work in them gracious principles and dispositions, that shall influence and govern their whole conversation. Teachers may put good things into our heads, but it is God only that can put them into our hearts, that can work in us both to will and to do. He will effectually provide for their perseverance in grace and the perpetuating of the covenant between himself and them. God will never leave nor forsake them: I will not turn away from them to do them good. Earthly princes are fickle, but God's mercy endures for ever. God may seem to turn from this people (Isa. liv. 8), but even then he does not turn from doing and designing them good. We have no reason to distrust God's fidelity and constancy, but our own; and therefore it is here promised that God will give them a heart to fear him for ever (Prov. xxiii. 17). He will entail a blessing upon their seed, will give them grace to fear him, for the good of them and of their children after them. As their departures from God had been to the prejudice of their children, so their adherence to God should be to the advantage of their children. We cannot better consult the good of posterity than by setting up the fear and worship of God in our families. When he punishes them it is with reluctance. How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? But, when he restores them he rejoices in doing them good. He is himself a cheerful giver, and therefore loves a cheerful servant. All things shall appear at last so to have been working for the good of the church that it will be said, The governor of the world is entirely taken up with the care of his church. These promises shall as surely be performed as the foregoing threatenings were. As I have brought all this great evil upon them, pursuant to divine justice, so I will bring upon them all this good, pursuant to the promise, and for the glory of divine mercy. As an earnest of all this, houses and lands shall again fetch a good price in Judah and Jerusalem (v. 43, 44): Fields shall be bought in this land; here rather than anywhere else. In the places about Jerusalem, in the cities of Judah and of Israel, in all parts of the country, men shall buy fields, and subscribe evidences. Trade shall revive. Husbandry shall revive. Laws shall again have their due course, for they shall subscribe evidences and seal them. This is mentioned to reconcile Jeremiah to his new purchase. Though he had bought a piece of ground and could not go to see it, this was the pledge of many a purchase, and those but faint resemblances of the purchased possessions in the heavenly Canaan, reserved for all those who have God's fear in their hearts.

CHAP. XXXIII

This chapter is much the same—to confirm the promise of the restoration of the Jews, notwithstanding the present desolations of their country and dispersions of their people. And these promises have, in type, a reference as far forward as to the gospel church. It is here promised, I. That the city shall be rebuilt and re-established, ver. 1–6. II. That the captives, having their sins pardoned, shall be restored, ver. 7, 8. III. That this shall redound to the glory of God, ver. 9. IV. That the country shall have both joy and plenty, ver. 10–14. V. That way shall be made for the coming of the Messiah, ver. 15, 16. VI. That the house of David, the house of Levi, and the house of Israel, shall flourish again, and all three in the kingdom of Christ; a gospel ministry and the gospel church shall continue while the world stands, ver. 17–26.

Verses 1–9

I. The date of this comfortable prophecy was after that in the foregoing chapter, when things were still growing worse and worse; it was the second time. God speaketh once, yea, twice, for the encouragement of his people. We are not only so disobedient that we have need of precept upon precept to bring us to our duty, but so distrustful that we have need of promise upon promise to bring us to our comfort. This word, as the former, came to Jeremiah when he was in prison.

II. The prophecy itself.

1. Who it is that secures this comfort to them (v. 2): It is the Lord, the maker thereof, the Lord that framed it. He is the maker and former of heaven and earth. He is the maker and former of Jerusalem, of Zion, built them at first, and therefore can rebuild them—built them for his own praise, and therefore will. He is the maker and former of this promise; he has laid the scheme for Jerusalem's restoration, and he that has made the promise will make it good; for Jehovah is his name, a God giving being to his promises by the performance of them, known by that name (Exod. vi. 3), a perfecting God. When the heavens and the earth were finished, then, and not till then, the Creator is called Jehovah, Gen. ii. 4.

2. How this comfort must be obtained—by prayer (v. 3): Call upon me, and I will answer thee. Christ himself must ask, and it shall be given him, Ps. ii. 8. I will show thee great and mighty things, hidden things, which, though in part discovered already, yet thou knowest not. Promises are given, not to supersede, but to quicken and encourage prayer. See Ezek. xxxvi. 37.

3. The condition of Jerusalem made it necessary that such comforts as these should be provided for it (v. 4, 5): The houses of this city, not excepting those of the kings of Judah, are thrown down by the mounts, or engines of battery, and by the sword, or axes, or hammers. The strongest stateliest houses were levelled with the ground. Those that came to fight with the Chaldeans did more hurt than good, provoked the enemy to be more fierce and furious in their assaults, so that the houses in Jerusalem were filled with the dead bodies of men. God says that they were such as he had slain in his anger, for the enemies' sword was his sword. But, it seems, the men that were slain had distinguished themselves by their wickedness, the very men for whose wickedness God did now hide himself from this city.

4. The blessings which God has in store for Judah and Jerusalem, such as will redress all their grievances. God will provide for the healing, though the disease was thought mortal and incurable, ch. viii. 22. "The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint (Isa. i. 5); but (v. 6) I will bring it health and cure; I will prevent the death, remove the sickness, and set all to rights again," ch. xxx. 17. The sin of Jerusalem was the sickness of it (Isa. i. 6); its reformation therefore will be its recovery. "I will reveal unto them the abundance of peace and truth." Peace stands here for all good; peace and the true religion, peace and the true worship of God, in opposition to the many falsehoods and deceits by which they had been led away from God. We may apply it more generally. Peace and truth are the great subject-matter of divine revelation. These promises here lead us to the gospel of Christ, and in that God has revealed to us peace and truth—truth to direct us, peace to make us easy. Grace and truth, and abundance of both, come by Jesus Christ. Peace and truth are the life of the soul, and Christ came that we might have that life, and might have it more abundantly. Christ rules by the power of truth (John xviii. 37) and by it he gives abundance of peace, Ps. lxxii. 7; lxxxv. 10. The divine revelation of peace and truth brings health and cure to all those that by faith receive it. Are they scattered and enslaved, and is their nation laid in ruins? "I will cause their captivity to return (v. 7), both that of Israel and that of Judah." Is sin the procuring cause of all their troubles? That shall be pardoned and subdued, and so the root of the judgments shall be killed, v. 8. As those that were ceremonially unclean, and were therefore shut out from the tabernacle, when they were sprinkled with the water of purification had liberty of access to it again, so had they to their own land, and the privileges of it, when God had cleansed them from their iniquities. Have both their sins and their sufferings turned to the dishonour of God? Their reformation and restoration shall redound as much to his praise, v. 9. The neighbouring nations shall look upon the growing greatness of the Jewish nation as really formidable, and shall be afraid of making them their enemies. When the church is fair as the moon, and clear as the sun, she is terrible as an army with banners.

Verses 10–16

A further prediction of the happy state of Judah and Jerusalem after their glorious return out of captivity, issuing gloriously at length in the kingdom of the Messiah.

I. It is promised that the people who were long in sorrow shall again be filled with joy. Everyone concluded now that the country would lie for ever desolate, that no beasts would be found in the land of Judah, no inhabitant in the streets of Jerusalem (v. 10); but, though weeping may endure for a time, joy will return. There shall be common joy there, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride; marriages shall again be celebrated, as formerly, with songs. There shall be religious joy there; temple-songs shall be revived, the Lord's songs, which they could not sing in a strange land. They shall praise him both as the Lord of hosts and as the God who is good and whose mercy endures for ever. This, though a song of old, yet, being sung upon this fresh occasion, will be a new song. We find this literally fulfilled at their return out of Babylon, Ezra iii. 11. All the sacrifices were intended for the praise of God, but this seems to be meant of the spiritual sacrifices of humble adorations and joyful thanksgivings, the calves of our lips (Hos. xiv. 2), which shall please the Lord better than an ox or bullock.

II. It is promised that the country, which had lain long depopulated, shall be replenished and stocked again. In all the cities of Judah and Benjamin there shall be a habitation of shepherds, v. 12, 13. The country, after their return, shall not be a habitation of beggars, who have nothing, but of shepherds and husbandmen. The seed of Jacob, in their beginning, gloried in this, that they were shepherds (Gen. xlvii. 3), and so they shall now be again, giving themselves wholly to that innocent employment, causing their flocks to lie down (v. 12) and to pass under the hands of him that telleth them (v. 13); flocks to number them, that they may know if any be missing. Now because it seemed incredible that a people, reduced as now they were, should ever recover such a degree of peace and plenty as this, here is subjoined a general ratification of these promises (v. 14): I will perform that good thing which I have promised.

III. To crown all these blessings which God has in store for them, here is a promise of the Messiah, and of that everlasting righteousness which he should bring in (v. 15, 16), and probably this is that good thing, that great good thing, which in the latter days, days that were yet to come, God would perform, as he had promised to Judah and Israel, and to which their return out of captivity and their settlement again in their own land was preparatory. From the captivity to Christ is one of the famous periods, Matt. i. 17. This promise of the Messiah we had before (ch. xxiii. 5, 6), and there it came in as a confirmation of the promise of the shepherds whom God would set over them, which would make one think that the promise here concerning the shepherds and their flocks, which introduces it, is to be understood figuratively. Christ is here prophesied, 1. As a rightful King. He is a branch of righteousness, not a usurper, for he grows up unto David. 2. As a righteous king, righteous in enacting laws, waging wars, and giving judgment, righteous in vindicating those that suffer wrong and punishing those that do wrong: He shall execute judgment and righteousness in the land. 3. As a king that shall protect his subjects from all injury. By him Judah shall be saved from wrath and the curse, and, being so saved, Jerusalem shall dwell safely, quiet from the fear of evil, and enjoying serenity of mind, in dependence upon this prince of their peace. 4. As a king that shall be praised by his subjects: "This is the name whereby they shall call him" (so the Chaldee reads it, the Syriac, and vulgar Latin); "this name of his they shall celebrate and triumph in, and by this name they shall call upon him." The city is called The Lord our righteousness, because they glory in Jehovah as their righteousness. That which was before said to be the name of Christ is here made the name of Jerusalem, the city of the Messiah, the church of Christ. He it is that imparts righteousness to her, for he is made of God to us righteousness, and she, by bearing that name, professes to have her whole righteousness, not from herself, but from him.

Verses 17–26

Three of God's covenants, that of royalty with David and his seed, that of the priesthood with Aaron and his seed, and that with Abraham and his seed, seemed to be all broken and lost while the captivity lasted; but it is here promised that the true intents and meaning of them shall be abundantly answered in the New Testament blessings, typified by those conferred on the Jews after their return out of captivity.

I. The covenant of royalty shall have full accomplishment in the kingdom of Christ, the Son of David, v. 17. The throne of Israel was overturned in the captivity; there was not a man to sit on the throne of Israel. After their return the house of David made a figure again; but it is in the Messiah that this promise is performed that David shall never want a man to sit on the throne of Israel. For as long as Christ Jesus sits on the right hand of the throne of God, glorified head over all things, as long as he is King upon the holy hill of Zion, David does not want a successor, nor is the covenant with him broken. The Lord God shall give him the throne of his father David and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, Luke i. 32, 33. It is promised that the covenant with David shall be as firm as the ordinances of heaven. There is a covenant of nature here called a covenant of the day and the night (v. 20, 25), because this is one of the articles of it, That there shall be day and night in their season. God divided between the light and the darkness, and established a government to each, that the sun should rule by day and the moon and stars by night (Gen. i. 4, 5, 16). The morning and the evening have both of them their regular outgoings (Ps. lxv. 8); the day-spring knows its place, knows its time, and keeps both, so do the shadows of the evening; and, while the world stands, this course shall not be altered, this covenant shall not be broken. Thus firm shall the covenant of redemption be with the Redeemer—God's servant, but David our King, v. 21. Christ shall have a church on earth to the world's end; till time and day shall be no more. Christ's kingdom is an everlasting kingdom; and when the end cometh, and not till then, it shall be delivered up to God, even the Father. But the condition of it in this world shall be intermixed, prosperity and adversity succeeding each other, as day and night. Though the sun will set to-night, it will rise again to-morrow morning, whether we live to see it or no, so sure we may be that, though the kingdom of the Redeemer in the world may for a time be clouded by corruptions and persecutions, yet it will shine forth again in the time appointed. The seed of David shall be as numerous as the host of heaven, that is, the spiritual seed of the Messiah, born to him by the efficacy of his gospel and his Spirit working with it. Christ's seed are not, as David's were, his successors, but his subjects; yet the day is coming when they also shall reign with him (v. 22).

II. The covenant of priesthood shall be secured, and the promises of that also shall have their full accomplishment. During the captivity there was no altar, no temple service, for the priests to attend upon; but this also shall revive. Immediately upon their coming back to Jerusalem there were priests and Levites ready to offer burnt-offerings and to do sacrifice continually (Ezra iii. 2, 3), as is here promised, v. 18. But that priesthood soon grew corrupt; the covenant of Levi was profaned (as appears Mal. ii. 8), and in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans it came to a final period. The priesthood of Christ supersedes that of Aaron, and is the substance of that shadow. While that great high priest of our profession is always appearing in the presence of God for us, it may truly be said that the Levites do not want a man before God to offer continually, Heb. vii. 3, 17. He is a priest for ever. While there are faithful ministers to preside in religious assemblies, and to offer up the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise, the priests, the Levites, do not want successors, and such as have obtained a more excellent ministry. The apostle makes those that preach the gospel to come in the room of those that served at the altar, 1 Cor. ix. 13, 14. All true believers are a holy priesthood, a royal priesthood (1 Pet. ii. 5, 9), who are made to our God kings and priests (Rev. i. 6); they offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God, and themselves, in the first place, living sacrifices. Of these Levites this promise must be understood (v. 22), that they shall be as numerous as the sand of the sea, for all God's spiritual Israel are spiritual priests, Rev. v. 9, 10; vii. 9, 15.

III. The covenant of peculiarity likewise shall be secured and the promises of that covenant shall have their full accomplishment in the gospel Israel. This covenant was looked upon as broken during the captivity, v. 24. Either the enemies of Israel, or the unbelieving Israelites themselves, have broken covenant with God, as if he had not dealt faithfully with them. "Thus have they despised my people, that is, despised the privilege of being my people as if it were a privilege of no value at all." The covenant stands notwithstanding, as firm as that with day and night; sooner will God suffer day and night to cease than he will cast away the seed of Jacob. This cannot refer to the seed of Jacob according to the flesh, for they are cast away, but to the Christian church, in which all these promises were to be lodged, as appears by the apostle's discourse, Rom. xi. 1, &c. Christianity shall continue in the dominion of Christ, and the subjection of Christians to him, till day and night come to an end. I will cause their captivity to return; and, having brought them back, I will have mercy on them. To whom this promise refers appears Gal. vi. 16, where all that walk according to the gospel rule are made to be the Israel of God, on whom peace and mercy shall be.

CHAP. XXXIV

Two messages which God sent by Jeremiah. I. One to foretell the fate of Zedekiah king of Judah, that he should fall into the hands of the king of Babylon, a captive, but should die in peace in his captivity, ver. 1–7. II. Another to read the doom both of prince and people for their treacherous dealings with God, in bringing back into bondage their servants whom they had released according to the law (ver. 8–11), and therefore God would bring the Chaldean army again when they began to hope that they had got clear of them, ver. 12–22.

Verses 1–7

This prophecy concerning Zedekiah was delivered to Jeremiah, and by him to the parties concerned, before he was shut up in the prison, ch. xxxii. 4.

I. This message was sent to Zedekiah when the king of Babylon, with all his forces, fought against Jerusalem and the cities thereof (v. 1), designing to destroy them. The cities that now remained, and yet held out, are named (v. 7), Lachish and Azekah. This intimates that things were now brought to the last extremity, and yet Zedekiah obstinately stood it out.

II. The message was sent to him. He is told that which he had been often told before, that the city shall be taken by the Chaldeans and burnt with fire (v. 2), that he shall be made a prisoner, brought before Nebuchadnezzar, and be carried away captive into Babylon (v. 3); yet Ezekiel prophesied that he should not see Babylon; nor did he, for his eyes were put out, Ezek. xii. 13. He shall die a captive, but not by the sword; he shall die in peace, v. 5. What evil he had done in the sight of the Lord he repented of in his captivity, and, God being reconciled to him, he might truly be said to die in peace. A man may die in a prison and yet die in peace. His afflictions wrought such a change in him that his death was looked upon as a great loss. It is better to live and die penitent in a prison than to live and die impenitent in a palace. They will lament thee, saying, Ah lord! an honour which his brother Jehoiakim had not, ch. xxii. 18.

III. Jeremiah's faithfulness in delivering this message. Though he knew it might prove, as indeed it did, dangerous to himself (for he was imprisoned for it), yet he spoke all these words to Zedekiah, v. 6.

Verses 8–22

Another prophecy upon a particular occasion.

I. When Jerusalem was closely besieged by the Chaldean army the princes and people agreed upon a reformation concerning their servants. The law of God was very express, that those of their own nation should not be held in servitude above seven years, but, after they had served one apprenticeship, they should have their liberty; though they had sold themselves for the payment of their debts, or though they were sold by the judges for the punishment of their crimes. Those of other nations taken in war, or bought with money, might be held in perpetual slavery, but their brethren must serve but for seven years. This God calls the covenant that he had made with them when he brought them out of the land of Egypt, v. 13, 14. This was the first of the judicial laws which God gave them (Exod. xxi. 2). God had brought them out of slavery in Egypt, and he would have them thus to express their grateful sense of that favour, by letting those go to whom their houses were houses of bondage, as Egypt had been to their forefathers. God's compassions towards us should engage our compassions towards our brethren; we must release as we are released. This law they and their fathers had broken. Their worldly profit swayed more with them than God's covenant. When their servants had lived seven years with them they understood their business better than they did, and therefore they would by no means part with them. Your fathers hearkened not to me in this matter (v. 14), and they thought they might do it because their fathers did it. For this sin of theirs, and their fathers, God now brought them into servitude, and justly. When they were besieged by the Chaldeans, they, being told of their fault in this matter, immediately reformed, and let go all their servants that were entitled to their freedom, as Pharaoh, when the plague was upon him, consented to let the people go. The prophets admonished them concerning their sin. From them they heard that they should let their Hebrew servants go free, v. 10. The king, and the princes, and all the people, agreed to let go their servants. The people could not for shame but follow. They bound themselves by a solemn oath and covenant that they would do this, whereby they engaged themselves to God and one another. This covenant was made in a sacred place, made before me, in the house which is called by my name (v. 15), in the presence of God. It was ratified by a significant sign; they cut a calf in two, and passed between the parts thereof (v. 18, 19) with this dreadful imprecation, "Let us be in like manner cut asunder if we do not perform what we now promise." They conformed themselves herein to the command of God and let their servants go, though the city was besieged and they could very ill spare them. Thus they did right in God's sight, v. 15.

II. When there was some hope that the siege was raised and the danger over they undid the good they had done, and forced the servants they had released into their services again. The king of Babylon's army had now gone up from them, v. 21. Pharaoh was bringing an army of Egyptians to oppose the progress of the king of Babylon's victories, and the Chaldeans raised the siege for a time, ch. xxxvii. 5. It was especially an affront to God; in doing this they polluted his name, v. 16.

III. For this treacherous dealing with God they are here severely threatened. Be not deceived; God is not mocked. Those that think to put a cheat upon God by a partial temporary reformation, will put the greatest cheat upon their own souls. Since they had not given liberty to their servants to go where they pleased, God would give all his judgments liberty to take their course (v. 17): You have not proclaimed liberty to your servants. "Therefore I will proclaim a liberty for you; I will discharge you from my service, and put you out of my protection, which those forfeit that withdraw from their allegiance. You shall have liberty to choose which of these judgments you will be cut off by, sword, famine, or pestilence." Since they had brought their servants back into confinement in their houses, God would make them to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth, where they should live in servitude. "I will make the men which have transgressed my covenant as the calf which they cut in twain; I will divide them asunder as they divided it asunder." They had all dealt treacherously with God, and therefore shall all be involved in the common ruin without exception, v. 19. Since they had emboldened themselves in returning to their sin, contrary to their covenant, by the retreat of the Chaldean army from them, God would therefore bring it upon them again: "They have now gone up from you, and your fright is over for the present, but I will command them to face about as they were; they shall return to this city, and take it and burn it," v. 22. If we repent of the good we had purposed, God will repent of the good he had purposed. With the froward thou wilt show thyself froward.

CHAP. XXXV

A variety of methods is tried to awaken the Jews to a sense of their sin and to bring them to repentance. The scope and tendency of many of the prophet's sermons was to frighten them out of their disobedience, by setting before them what would be the end thereof if they persisted in it. The scope of this sermon, in this chapter, is to shame them out of their disobedience if they had any sense of honour left in them. I. He sets before them the obedience of the family of the Rechabites to the commands which were left them by Jonadab their ancestor, ver. 1–11. II. The disobedience of the Jews to God and their contempt of his precepts, ver. 12–15. III. He foretells the judgments of God upon the Jews for their impious disobedience, ver. 16, 17. IV. He assures the Rechabites of the blessing of God upon them for their pious obedience, ver. 18, 19.

Verses 1–11

What is contained in this chapter was said and done in the days of Jehoiakim (v. 1); in the latter part of his reign, for it was after the king of Babylon with his army came up into the land (v. 11), which seems to refer to the invasion mentioned 2 Kings xxiv. 2, upon occasion of Jehoiakim's rebelling against Nebuchadnezzar. Jeremiah sets before the rebellious people the example of the Rechabites, a family that kept distinct by themselves. They were originally Kenites, as appears 1 Chron. ii. 55, These are the Kenites that came out of Hemath, the father of the house of Rechab. The Kenites, at least those of them that gained a settlement in the land of Israel, were of the posterity of Hobab, Moses's father-in-law, Judges i. 16; 1 Sam. xv. 6; Judges iv. 17. One family of these Kenites had their name from Rechab. His son, or a lineal descendant from him, was Jonadab, a man famous in his time for wisdom and piety. He flourished in the days of Jehu, king of Israel, nearly 300 years before this (2 Kings x. 15, 16).

I. The rules of living which Jonadab charged his children, and his posterity religiously to observe; they were such as he himself had all his days observed.

1. They were comprised in two remarkable precepts: (1) He forbade them to drink wine, according to the law of the Nazarites. We are so apt to abuse it and get hurt by it that it is a commendable piece of self-denial either not to use it at all or very sparingly and medicinally, as Timothy used it, 1 Tim. v. 23. (2) He appointed them to dwell in tents, and not to build houses, nor purchase lands, nor rent or occupy either, v. 7. This was an instance of strictness and mortification. Tents were mean dwellings, so that this would teach them to be humble; they were cold dwellings, so that this would teach them to be hardy and not to indulge the body; they were movable dwellings, so that this would teach them not to think of settling or taking root anywhere in this world. They must dwell in tents all their days. They must thus accustom themselves to endure hardness.

2. Why did Jonadab prescribe these rules of living to his posterity? It was to show his wisdom, and the real concern he had for their welfare, not tying them by any oath or vow, but only advising them to conform to this discipline as far as they found it for edification, v. 11. His ancestors had addicted themselves to a pastoral life (Exod ii. 16), and he would have his posterity keep to it. Moses had put them in hopes that they should be naturalized (Num. x. 32); but they were still strangers in the land (v. 7), had no inheritance in it, and therefore must live by their employment and accustom themselves to hard fare and hard lodging. Humility and contentment in obscurity are often the best policy and men's surest protection. Jonadab saw a general corruption of manners; the drunkards of Ephraim abounded, and he was afraid lest his children should be debauched by them; and therefore he obliged them to live by themselves, retired in the country; and, that they might not run into any unlawful pleasures, to deny themselves the use even of lawful delights. Jonadab might foresee the destruction of a people so wretchedly degenerated, and he would have his family provide, that, even in the midst of the troubles, they might have peace. Let them sit loose to what they had, and then they might with less pain be stripped of it. They must learn to live by rule and under discipline. It is good for us all to do so, and to teach our children to do so.

II. How strictly his posterity observed these rules, v. 8–10. They had in their respective generations all of them obeyed the voice of Jonadab their father, had done according to all that he commanded them. They drank no wine, though they dwelt in a country where there was plenty of it. They built no houses, tilled no ground, but lived upon the products of their cattle. As to one of the particulars, in a case of necessity they dispensed with it (v. 11): When the king of Babylon came into the land with his army, though they had hitherto dwelt in tents, they now quitted their tents, and came and dwelt in Jerusalem, and in houses there. The rules of a strict discipline must not be made too strict, but so as to admit of a dispensation when the necessity of a case calls for it. These Rechabites would have tempted God, and not trusted him, if they had not used proper means for their own safety, notwithstanding the law and custom of their family. Jeremiah took them into the temple (v. 2), into a prophet's chamber, because he had a message from God. There he not only asked the Rechabites whether they would drink any wine, but he set pots full of wine before them, made the temptation as strong as possible, and said, "Drink you wine, you shall have it free. You have broken one of the rules of your order, in coming to live at Jerusalem; why may you not break this too, and when you are in the city do as they there do?" But they peremptorily refused. They all agreed in the refusal. "No, we will drink no wine; for with us it is against the law." The prophet saw they were steadfastly resolved.

Verses 12–19

The trial of the Rechabites' constancy was intended but for a sign; here we have the application of it.

I. The Rechabites' observance of their father's charge to them and the disobedience of the Jews to God. Let them see it and be ashamed. The prophet asks them, in God's name, "Will you not at length receive instruction? v. 13. Will nothing prevail to discover sin and duty to you? You see how obedient the Rechabites are to their father's commandment (v. 14); but you have not inclined your ear to me" (v. 15). The Rechabites were obedient to one who was but a man like themselves, but the Jews were disobedient to an infinite and eternal God, who had an absolute authority over them, as the Father of their spirits. The Rechabites were never put in mind of their obligations to their father; but God often sent his prophets to his people (v. 14). God had given his people a good land, and promised them that, if they would be obedient, they should still dwell in it, so that they were bound both in gratitude and interest to be obedient, and yet they would not hearken.

II. Judgments are threatened, as often before, against Judah and Jerusalem. The Rechabites shall rise up in judgment against them, for they performed the commandment of their father, and continued in their obedience to it (v. 16); but this people, this rebellious and gainsaying people, have not hearkened unto me. "I will bring upon them, by the Chaldean army, all the evil pronounced against them both in the law, and in the prophets, for I have spoken to them, I have called to them—spoken by my word, called by my providence, and yet they have not heard nor answered."

III. Mercy is here promised to the family of the Rechabites for their steady adherence to the laws of their house. Though it was only for the shaming of Israel that their constancy was tried, yet, being unshaken, it was found unto praise, and honour, and glory (v. 18, 19). The family shall never want a man to inherit what they had, though they had no inheritance to leave. Though they are neither priests nor Levites, nor appear to have had any post in the temple service, yet in a constant course of regular devotion, they stand before God, to minister to him.

CHAP. XXXVI

Another expedient tried to work upon this heedless and untoward people, but in vain. A roll of a book is provided, containing an abstract of all the sermons that Jeremiah had preached to them. I. The writing of this roll by Baruch, as Jeremiah dictated it, ver. 1–4. II. The reading of the roll by Baruch to all the people publicly on a fast-day (ver. 5–10), afterwards by Baruch to the princes privately (ver. 11–19), and lastly by Jehudi to the king, ver. 20, 21. III. The burning of the roll by the king, with orders to prosecute Jeremiah and Baruch, ver. 22–26. IV. The writing of another roll, with large additions, particularly of Jehoiakim's doom for burning the former, ver. 27–32.

Verses 1–8

In the beginning of Ezekiel's prophecy we meet with a roll written in vision, Ezek. ii. 9, 10; iii. 1. Here, in the latter end of Jeremiah's prophecy, we meet with a roll written in fact, for discovery of the things contained therein to the people.

I. The command which God gave to Jeremiah to write a summary of his sermons, ever since he first began to be a preacher, in the thirteenth year of Josiah, to this day, which was in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, v. 2, 3. What they had heard once must be recapitulated, and rehearsed to them again, that what was forgotten might be called to mind again and what made no impression upon them at the first hearing might take hold of them when they heard it the second time. The reason here given for the writing of this roll (v. 3): It may be the house of Judah will hear. What it is hoped they will thus hear: All that evil which I purpose to do unto them. What it is hoped will be produced thereby: They will hear, that they may return every man from his evil way. The conversion of sinners is that which ministers should aim at in preaching; and people hear the word in vain if that point be not gained with them. That I may forgive their iniquity. This plainly implies God's justice. It is not consistent that he should forgive the sin unless the sinner repent of it. It plainly expresses his mercy, that he is very ready to forgive sin and only waits till the sinner be qualified to receive forgiveness, and therefore uses various means to bring us to repentance, that he may forgive.

II. The instructions which Jeremiah gave to Baruch his scribe, pursuant to the command he had received from God, v. 4. God bade Jeremiah write, but, it should seem, he had not the pen of a ready writer, he could not write fast, or fair, as Baruch could, and therefore he made use of him as his amanuensis. St. Paul wrote but few of his epistles with his own hand, Gal. vi. 11; Rom. xvi. 22. God dispenses his gifts variously; some have a good faculty at speaking, others at writing, and neither can say to the other, We have no need of you, 1 Cor. xii. 21. The Spirit of God dictated to Jeremiah, and he to Baruch. If we may credit the apocryphal book that bears his name, he was afterwards himself a prophet to the captives in Babylon. Baruch wrote in a roll of a book, on pieces of parchment, or vellum, which were joined together, so making one long scroll, which was rolled perhaps upon a staff.

III. The orders which Jeremiah gave to Baruch to read what he had written to the people. Jeremiah, it seems, was shut up, and could not go to the house of the Lord himself, v. 5. Though he was not a close prisoner, for then there would have been no occasion to send officers to seize him (v. 26), yet he was forbidden by the king to appear in the temple. Thus St. Paul wrote epistles to the churches which he could not visit in person. When God ordered the reading of the roll he said, It may be they will hear and return from their evil ways, v. 3. When Jeremiah orders it, he says, It may be they will pray and will return from their evil way. Prayer to God for grace to turn us is necessary in order to our turning. According to these orders, Baruch did read out of the book the words of the Lord, whenever there was a holy convocation, v. 8.

Verses 9–19

It would seem that Baruch had been frequently reading the book, to all that would give him hearing, before the most solemn reading of it altogether; for the directions were given about it in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, whereas this was done in the fifth year, v. 9. But some think that the writing of the book took up so much time that it was another year ere it was perfected. 1. The government appointed a public fast to be religiously observed (v. 9), on account either of the distress brought by the army of the Chaldeans or of the want of rain (ch. xiv. 1): They proclaimed a fast to the people. Great shows of piety and devotion may be found even among those who, though they keep up these forms of godliness, are strangers and enemies to the power of it. But what will such hypocritical services avail? Fasting, without reforming and turning away from sin, will never turn away the judgments of God, Jonah iii. 10. 2. Baruch repeated Jeremiah's sermons publicly in the house of the Lord, on the fast-day. He stood in a chamber that belonged to Gemariah, and out of a window, or balcony, read to the people that were in the court, v. 10. 3. An account was brought to the princes that were now together in the secretary's office, here called the scribe's chamber, v. 12. It should seem, though the princes had called the people to meet in the house of God, to fast, and pray, and hear the word, they did not think fit to attend there themselves. Michaiah informed the princes of what Baruch had read; for his father Gemariah so far countenanced Baruch as to lend him his chamber. 4. Baruch is sent for, and is ordered to sit down among them and read it all over again to them (v. 14, 15), which he readily did. 5. The princes were for the present much affected with the word that was read to them, v. 16. And, when they had heard all, they were afraid, were all afraid, one as well as another; like Felix, who trembled at Paul's reasonings. The reproofs were just, and the predictions now in a fair way to be fulfilled; so that they were in a great consternation. We are not told what impressions this reading of the roll made upon the people (v. 10), but the princes were put into a fright by it, and (as some read it) looked one upon another, not knowing what to say. They agreed to tell the king of all these words; and, if he think fit to give credit to them, they will. At the same time they knew the king's mind so far that they advised Baruch and Jeremiah to hide themselves (v. 19) and to shift for their own safety, expecting that the king, instead of being convinced would be exasperated. 6. They asked Baruch a trifling question, How he wrote all these words (v. 17), as if they suspected there was something extraordinary in it; but Baruch gives them a plain answer—Jeremiah dictated, and he wrote, v. 18.

Verses 20-32

The roll and the king.

I. Upon notice given him concerning it, he sent for it, and ordered it to be read to him, v. 20, 21. He did not desire that Baruch would read it himself, who could read it more intelligently and with more authority and affection than anyone else; but Jehudi, one of his pages now in waiting, who was sent to fetch it, is bidden to read it. Those who thus despise the word of God will soon make it to appear, as this king did, that they hate it, and have not only low, but ill thoughts of it.

II. He had not patience to hear it read through as the princes had, but, when he had heard three or four leaves read, in a rage he cut it with his penknife, and threw it piece by piece into the fire, that he might be sure to see it all consumed, v. 22, 23. This was a most impudent affront to the God of heaven, whose message this was. Thus he showed his impatience of reproof. 2. Thus he showed his indignation at Baruch and Jeremiah; he would have cut them in pieces, and burnt them, if he had had them in his reach, when he was in this passion. 3. Thus he expressed an obstinate resolution never to comply with the intentions of the warnings given him. 4. Thus he foolishly hoped to defeat the threatenings denounced against him. He thought he had effectually provided that the things contained in this roll should spread no further.

III. Neither the king himself nor any of his princes were at all affected with the word: They were not afraid (v. 24), no, not those princes that trembled at the word when they heard it the first time, v. 16. They showed some concern till they saw how light the king made of it, and then they shook off all that concern.

IV. There were three of the princes who had so much sense and grace left as to interpose for the preventing of the burning of the roll, but in vain. v. 25.

V. Jehoiakim, when he had thus in effect burnt God's warrant by which he was arrested, in a way of revenge, now signed a warrant for the apprehending of Jeremiah and Baruch, God's ministers (v. 26): But the Lord hid them.

VI. Jeremiah had orders and instructions to write in another roll the same words that were written in the roll which Jehoiakim had burnt, v. 27, 28. Enemies may prevail to burn many a Bible, but they cannot abolish the word of God, nor defeat the accomplishment of it. Though the tables of the law were broken, they were renewed again; and so out of the ashes of the roll that was burnt arose another Phoenix. The word of the Lord endures for ever.

VII. The king of Judah, though a king, was severely reckoned with by the King of kings for this indignity done to the written word. Jehoiakim was angry because it was written therein, saying, Surely the king of Babylon shall come and destroy this land, v. 29. God and his prophets had therefore become his enemies because they told him the truth, told him of the desolation that was coming, but at the same time putting him in a fair way to prevent it. The wrath of God shall come upon him and his family, in the first place, by the hand of Nebuchadnezzar. He shall be cut off, and in a few weeks his son shall be dethroned, and exchange his royal robes for prison-garments, so that he shall have none to sit upon the throne of David; his dead body shall lie unburied, or he shall be buried with the burial of an ass, that is, thrown into the ditch. Even his seed and his servants shall fare the worse for their relation to him (v. 31), for they shall be punished, not for his iniquity, but so much the sooner for their own. All the evil pronounced against Judah and Jerusalem in that roll shall be brought upon them.

VIII. When the roll was written anew, there were added to the former many like words (v. 32), many more threatenings, for, since they will yet walk contrary to God, he will heat the furnace seven times hotter.

CHAP. XXXVII

This chapter brings us near the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, for the story of it lies in the latter end of Zedekiah's reign. I. A general idea of the bad character of that reign, ver. 1, 2. II. The message which Zedekiah, notwithstanding, sent to Jeremiah to desire his prayers, ver. 3. III. The flattering hopes that the Chaldeans would quit the siege of Jerusalem, ver. 5. IV. The assurance God gave them by Jeremiah (who was now at liberty, ver. 4) that the Chaldean army should renew the siege and take the city, ver 6–10. V. The imprisonment of Jeremiah, under pretence that he was a deserter, ver. 11–15. VI The kindness which Zedekiah showed him when he was a prisoner, ver. 16–21.

Verses 1–10

1. Jeremiah's preaching slighted, v. 1, 2. Zedekiah succeeded Coniah, or Jeconiah, and, though he saw in his predecessor the fatal consequences of condemning the word of God, yet he did not take warning. Neither he, nor his courtiers, nor the people of the land, hearkened unto the words of the Lord, though they already began to be fulfilled. 2. Jeremiah's prayers desired. Zedekiah sent messengers to him, saying, Pray now unto the Lord our God for us. He did so before (ch. xxi. 1, 2), and one of the messengers, Zephaniah, is the same there and here. Zedekiah is to be commended for this, and it shows that he had some good in him, some sense of his need of God's favour. When we are in distress we ought to desire the prayers of our ministers and Christian friends, for thereby we put an honour upon prayer, and an esteem upon our brethren. Kings themselves should look upon their praying people as the strength of the nation, Zech. xii. 5, 10. And yet this does but help to condemn Zedekiah out of his own mouth. If indeed he looked upon Jeremiah as a prophet, whose prayers might avail, why did he not hearken to the words of the Lord which he spoke by him? How can we expect that God should hear others speaking to him for us if we will not hear them speaking to us from him and for him? When Zedekiah sent to the prophet to pray for him, he had better have sent for the prophet to pray with him. 3. Jerusalem flattered by the retreat of the Chaldean army from it. Jeremiah was now at liberty (v. 4); Jerusalem also, for the present, was at liberty, v. 5. Zedekiah, though a tributary to the king of Babylon, had entered into a private league with Pharaoh king of Egypt (Ezek. xvii. 15), pursuant to which, when the king of Babylon came to chastise him for his treachery, the king of Egypt sent forces to relieve Jerusalem when it was besieged. The Chaldeans raised the siege, probably not for fear of them, but in policy, to fight them at a distance, before any of the Jewish forces could join them. From this they encouraged themselves to hope that Jerusalem was delivered for good. 4. Jerusalem threatened with the return of the Chaldean army. Zedekiah sent to Jeremiah to desire him to pray that the Chaldean army might not return; but Jeremiah sends him word back that the decree had gone forth, and that it was but a folly for them to expect peace. Thus saith the Lord, Deceive not yourselves, v. 9. Satan himself though he is the great deceiver, could not deceive us if we did not deceive ourselves. Jeremiah uses no dark metaphors, but tells them plainly, (1) That the Egyptians shall retreat into their own land, v. 7. (2) That the Chaldeans shall return, and shall renew the siege: They shall not depart for good and all (v. 9); they shall come again (v. 8); they shall fight against the city. (3) That Jerusalem shall certainly be delivered into the hand of the Chaldeans: They shall take it, and burn it with fire, v 8. "Though you had smitten their army, so that many were slain and all the rest wounded, yet those wounded men should rise up and burn this city," v. 10.

Verses 11–21

A further account concerning Jeremiah, who relates more passages concerning himself than any other of the prophets.

I. Jeremiah, when he had opportunity, attempted to retire out of Jerusalem into the country (v. 11, 12): When the Chaldeans had broken up from Jerusalem because of Pharaoh's army, Jeremiah determined to go into the country, and (as the margin reads it) to slip away from Jerusalem in the midst of the people, who, in that interval of the siege, went out into the country to look after their affairs. He endeavoured to steal away in the crowd; for, though he was a man of great eminence, he was content to be lost in the multitude and buried alive in a cottage. Jeremiah found he could do no good in Jerusalem; he laboured in vain among them, and therefore determined to leave them.

II. In this attempt he was seized as a deserter and committed to prison (v. 13–15): He was in the gate of Benjamin, when a captain of the ward, who probably had the charge of that gate, discovered him and took him into custody. He was the grandson of Hananiah, who, the Jews say, was Hananiah the false prophet, who contested with Jeremiah (ch. xxviii. 10), and they add that this young captain had a spite to Jeremiah upon that account. That which he charges upon him is, Thou fallest away to the Chaldeans—an unlikely story, for the Chaldeans had now gone. Jeremiah therefore with good reason, and with both the confidence and the mildness of an innocent man, denies the charge: "It is false; I fall not away to the Chaldeans; I am going upon my own lawful occasions." Jeremiah's protestation of his integrity, though he is a prophet, and is ready to say it on the word of a priest, is not regarded; but is brought before the privy-council, who without examining him, but upon the base insinuation of the captain, fell into a passion with him: they were wroth. They beat him and then put him in prison, in the worst prison they had, that in the house of Jonathan the scribe. Into this prison Jeremiah was thrust, into the dungeon, which was dark and cold, damp and dirty. In the cells or cabins, there he must lodge. There Jeremiah remained many days.

III. Zedekiah at length sent for him, and showed him some favour; but probably not till the Chaldean army had returned and had laid fresh siege to the city. When their vain hopes had all vanished, then they were in a greater confusion and consternation than ever. "O then" (says Zedekiah), "send in all haste for the prophet; let me have some talk with him." 1. The king sent for him to give him private audience as an ambassador from God. He asked him secretly in his house, being ashamed to be seen in his company, "Is there any word from the Lord? (v. 17)—any word of comfort? Canst thou give us any hopes that the Chaldeans shall again retire?" Jeremiah's life and comfort are in Zedekiah's hand, and he has now a petition to present to him for his favour, and yet, having this opportunity, he tells him plainly that there is a word from the Lord, but no word of comfort for him or his people: Thou shalt be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon. If Jeremiah had consulted with flesh and blood, he would have given him a plausible answer; he might have chosen whether he would tell him the worst at this time. But Jeremiah was one that had obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, and would not, to obtain mercy of man, be unfaithful either to God or to his prince; he therefore tells him the truth, the whole truth. Jeremiah takes this occasion to upbraid him and his people with the credit they gave to the false prophets, who told them that the king of Babylon should not come at all, or, when he had withdrawn, should not come again against them, v. 19. "Where are now your prophets, who told you that you should have peace?" 2. He improved this opportunity for the presenting of a private petition, as a poor prisoner, v. 18, 20. He humbly expostulates with the king: "What have I offended against thee, or thy servants, or this people, what law have I broken, that you have put me in prison?" He likewise earnestly begs, and very pathetically (v. 20), Cause me not to return to yonder noisome gaol, to the house of Jonathan the scribe, lest I die there. Hear me, I pray thee, O my Lord the king! let my supplication, I pray thee, be accepted before thee. Here is not a word of complaint of the princes that unjustly committed him, but a modest supplication to the king. A lion in God's cause must be a lamb in his own. (1) The king gave him his request, took care that he should not die in the dungeon, but ordered that he should have the liberty of the court of the prison, where he might breathe a free air. (2) He ordered him his daily bread out of the public stock, till all the bread was spent. Zedekiah ought to have released him, but he had not courage to do that; it was well he did as he did. God can make even confinement turn to advantage and the court of a prison to become as green pastures.

CHAP. XXXVIII

Jeremiah greatly debased under the frowns of the princes, and yet greatly honoured by the favour of the king. They used him as a criminal; he used him as a privy-counsellor. I. Jeremiah for his faithfulness is put into the dungeon by the princes, ver. 1–6. II. At the intercession of Edeb-melech the Ethiopian, by special order from the king, he is taken up out of the dungeon and confined only to the court of the prison, ver. 7–13. III. He has a private conference with the king upon present affairs, ver. 14–23. IV. Care is taken to keep that conference private, ver. 24–28.

Verses 1–13

1. Jeremiah persists in his plain preaching (v. 3): This city shall be given into the hand of the king of Babylon; though it hold out long, it will be taken at last. Nor would he have so often repeated this unwelcome message but that he could put them in a certain way, though not to save the city, yet to save themselves, v. 2. Let him go forth to the Chaldeans, and throw himself upon their mercy, before things come to extremity, and then he shall live; they will give him quarter, and he shall escape the famine and pestilence, which will be the death of multitudes within the city. 2. The princes persist in their malice against Jeremiah. He was faithful to his country and to his trust as a prophet, and, though at this time he ate the king's bread, yet that did not stop his mouth. But his persecutors complained that he abused the liberty he had of walking in the court of the prison; for, though he could not go to the temple to preach, yet he said the same things in private conversation to those that came to visit him, and therefore (v. 4) they represented him to the king as a dangerous man, disaffected to the government he lived under: He seeks not the welfare of this people, but the hurt—yet no man had done more for the good of Jerusalem than he. They represent his preaching as weakening their hands and discouraging them. It is common for wicked people to look upon God's faithful ministers as their enemies, only because they show them what enemies they are to themselves while they continue impenitent. 3. Jeremiah hereupon, by the king's permission, is put into a dungeon, with a view to his destruction there. Zedekiah, though he felt a conviction that Jeremiah was a prophet, sent of God, had not courage to own it. He is in your hand. Those will have a great deal to answer for who, though they have a secret kindness for good people, dare not own it in a time of need. The princes, having this general warrant from the king, immediately put poor Jeremiah into the dungeon of Malchiah, that was in the court of the prison (v. 6), a deep dungeon, for they let him down into it with cords, and a dirty one, for there was no water in it, but mire; and he sunk in the mire, up to his neck, says Josephus. Those that put him here doubtless designed that he should die of hunger and cold, and so die obscurely, fearing, if they should put him to death openly, the people might be incensed against them. Many of God's faithful witnesses have thus been privately made away, and starved to death, in prisons, whose blood will be brought to account in the day of discovery. What Jeremiah did in this distress, he tells us himself (Lam. iii. 55, 57), I called upon thy name, O Lord! out of the low dungeon, and thou drewest near, saying, Fear not. 4. Application is made to the king by Ebed-melech, one of the gentlemen of the bed-chamber, in behalf of the poor sufferer. Ebed-melech was an Ethiopian a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, and yet had in him more humanity and more divinity too, than Israelites had. Christ found more faith among Gentiles than among Jews. Ebed-melech lived in a wicked court and in a corrupt degenerate age, and yet had a great sense both of equity and piety. God has his remnant in all places. There were saints even in Cæsar's household. The king was now sitting in the gate of Benjamin to receive appeals and petitions. Thither Ebed-melech went immediately, for the case would not admit delay. He boldly asserts that Jeremiah had a deal of wrong done him, and is not afraid to tell the king so. He does not mince the matter; he tells the king faithfully, let him take it as he will, These men have done ill in all that they have done to Jeremiah. God can raise up friends for his people in distress where they little thought of them. 5. Orders are immediately given for his release, and Ebed-melech takes care to see them executed. The king had his heart wonderfully changed on a sudden, and will now have Jeremiah released in defiance of the princes, for he orders no less than thirty men to be employed in fetching him out of the dungeon, lest the princes should raise a party to oppose it, v. 10. Ebed-melech gained his point, and soon brought Jeremiah the good news. Special notice is taken of his great tenderness in providing old soft rags for Jeremiah to put under his arm-holes, to keep the cords wherewith he was to be drawn up from hurting him, his arm-holes being probably galled by the cords wherewith he was let down. Nor did he throw the rags down to him, lest they should be lost in the mire, but carefully let them down, v. 11, 12. Jeremiah is brought up out of the dungeon, and is now where he was, in the court of the prison, v. 13.

Verses 14–28

The king in close conference with Jeremiah, though (v. 5) he had before given him up into the hands of his enemies.

I. The honour that Zedekiah did to the prophet. When he was newly fetched out of the dungeon he sent for him to advise with him privately. He met him in the third entry, or (as the margin reads it) the principal entry, that is in, or leads towards, the house of the Lord, v. 14. Perhaps he intended to show a respect for the house of God, now that he was desiring to hear the word of God. Zedekiah would ask Jeremiah a thing; it should rather be rendered, a word. "I am here asking thee for a word of prediction, of counsel, of comfort, a word from the Lord, ch. xxxvii. 17. Whatever word thou hast hide it not from me; let me know the worst." He hopes to get a more pleasing answer, as if God, who is in one mind, were such a one as himself, who was in many minds.

II. The bargain that Jeremiah made with him before he would give him his advice, v. 15. "And if I do," says Jeremiah, "wilt thou not put me to death? I am afraid thou wilt" (so some take it); "what else can I expect when thou art led blindfold by the princes?" Not that Jeremiah was backward to seal the doctrine he preached with his blood, but, in doing our duty, we ought to use all lawful means for our own preservation; even the apostles of Christ did so. He is willing to give him wholesome advice, and does not upbraid him with his unkindness in suffering him to be put into the dungeon. "Wilt thou not hearken unto me? Surely thou wilt; I am in hopes to find thee pliable at last, and now in this thy day willing to know the things that belong to thy peace." Some read it as spoken despairingly: "If I give thee counsel, thou wilt not hearken unto me; I have reason to fear thou wilt not, and then I might as well keep my counsel to myself." Zedekiah makes him no answer, will not promise to hearken to his advice. As to the prophet's safety, he promises him, upon the word of a king, I will neither put thee to death nor deliver thee into the hands of those that will, v. 16. Zedekiah's oath on this occasion is solemn: "As the Lord liveth, who made us this soul, who gave me my life and thee thine, I dare not take away thy life unjustly, knowing that then I should forfeit my own to him that is the Lord of life."

III. The good advice that Jeremiah gave him, with good reason why he should take it, not from any prudence or politics of his own, but in the name of the Lord, the God of hosts and God of Israel. Not as a statesman, but as a prophet, he advises him by all means to surrender himself and his city to the king of Babylon's princes: "Go forth to them, and make the best terms thou canst with them," v. 17. This was the advice he had given to the people (v. 2, and before, ch. xxi. 9), to submit to divine judgments. To persuade him to take this counsel, he sets before him good and evil, life and death. If he will yield he shall save his children from the sword and Jerusalem from the flames. If he will but acknowledge God's justice, he shall experience his mercy: The city shall not be burnt, and thou shalt live and thy house. But, if he will obstinately stand out, it will be the ruin both of his house and Jerusalem (v. 18). This is the case of sinners with God; let them humbly submit to his grace and government and they shall live.

IV. The objection which Zedekiah made against the prophet's advice, v. 19. If he had had a due regard to the divine authority, wisdom, and goodness, as soon as he understood what the mind of God was he would immediately have acquiesced, but he advances against it some prudential considerations of his own. All he suggests is, "I am afraid, not of the Chaldeans; their princes are men of honour, but of the Jews, that have already gone over to the Chaldeans; when they see me follow them, who had so much opposed their going, they will laugh at me, and say, Hast thou also become weak as water?" Isa. xiv. 10. Though it had been really the greatest personal mischief that he could imagine it to be, yet he ought to have ventured it, in obedience to God, and for the preservation of his family and city.

V. The pressing importunity with which Jeremiah followed the advice he had given the king. He assures him that, if he would comply with the will of God herein, the thing he feared should not come upon him (v. 20): They shall not deliver thee up, but treat thee as becomes thy character. Obey, I beseech thee, the voice of the Lord, because it is his voice, so it shall be well unto thee. But he tells him what would be the consequence if he would not obey. He himself would fall into the hands of the Chaldeans. "Thou shalt not escape, as thou hopest to do," v. 23. He would himself be chargeable with the destruction of Jerusalem: "Thou shalt cause this city to be burnt with fire, for by a little submission and self-denial thou mightest have prevented it." He should certainly fall under a just reproach for standing out, and that from women too, v. 22. Thus will Zedekiah be bantered by the women, when all his wives and children shall be made a prey to the conquerors, v. 23.

VI. The care which Zedekiah took to keep this conference private (v. 24): Let no man know of these words. He has nothing to object against Jeremiah's advice, and yet he will not follow it. Zedekiah is concerned to keep it private, not so much for Jeremiah's safety, but for his own reputation. He is instructed what to say to the princes if they should examine him about it. He must tell them that he was petitioning the king not to remand him back to the house of Jonathan the scribe (v. 25, 26), and he did tell them so (v. 27), and no doubt it was true.

CHAP. XXXIX

The prophet Jeremiah, after he had largely foretold the delivering of Jerusalem into the hands of the king of Babylon, gives a particular account of that sad event. That melancholy story we have in this chapter, which serves to confirm the word of God's messengers. I. Jerusalem, after eighteen months' siege, was taken by the Chaldean army, ver. 1–3. II. King Zedekiah, attempting to make his escape, was seized and made a miserable captive to the king of Babylon, ver. 4–7. III. Jerusalem was burnt to the ground, and the people were carried captive, except the poor, ver. 8–10. IV. The Chaldeans were very kind to Jeremiah, and took particular care of him, ver. 11–14. V. Ebed-melech too, for his kindness, had a protection from God himself in this day of desolation, ver. 15–18.

Verses 1–10

Jeremiah abode patiently in the court of the prison, until the day that Jerusalem was taken. He gave the princes no further disturbance by his prophesying, nor they him by their persecutions.

I. The city is at length taken by storm. Nebuchadnezzar's army sat down before it in the ninth year of Zedekiah, in the tenth month (v. 1). Nebuchadnezzar left his generals to carry on the siege: they renewed it with redoubled vigour. At length, in the eleventh year, in the fourth month, they entered the city, the soldiers being so weakened by famine, that they were not able to make any resistance, v. 2. Sin had provoked God to withdraw his protection, and then, like Samson when his hair was cut, it was weak as other cities.

II. The princes of the king of Babylon take possession of the middle gate, v. 3. Some think that this was the second gate (Zeph. i. 10), in the middle wall that divided one part of the city from the other. Here they cautiously made a halt, and durst not go forward among men that perhaps would sell their lives as dearly as they could, until they searched all places, that they might not be surprised by any ambush. There, where Eliakim and Hilkiah, who bore the name of the God of Israel, used to sit, now sit Nergal-sharezer, and Samgar-nebo, &c., who bore the names of the heathen gods. Sarsechim was Rab-saris, that is, captain of the guard; and Nergal-sharezer, camp-master, or quarter-master. And now was fulfilled what Jeremiah prophesied (ch. i. 15), that the families of the kingdoms of the north should set everyone his throne at the entering of the gates of Jerusalem.

III. Zedekiah thought it high time to shift for his own safety, and, loaded with guilt and fear, he went out of the city, under protection of the night (v. 4). He was discovered, pursued, and overtaken in the plains of Jericho, v. 5. Thence he was brought prisoner to Riblah, where the king of Babylon passed sentence. He slew his sons before his eyes. Zedekiah himself was now but thirty-two years of age, and the death of these babes must needs be so many deaths to himself, especially when he considered that his own obstinacy was the cause of it. They shall bring forth thy wives and children to the Chaldeans, ch. xxxviii. 23. He slew all the nobles of Judah (v. 6). He ordered Zedekiah to have his eyes put out (v. 7), so condemning him to darkness for life who had shut his eyes against the clear light of God's word. He bound him with two brazen chains or fetters (so the margin reads it), to carry him away to Babylon, there to spend the rest of his days in misery.

IV. Some time afterwards the city was burnt, temple and palace, and the wall of it broken down, v. 8.

V. The people that were left were all carried away captives to Babylon, v. 9. They must be driven hundreds of miles, like beasts, before the conquerors, that were now their cruel masters; must lie at their mercy in a strange land. Some few, the poor of the people, never made any resistance, and were left to tarry at home. The captain of the guard gave them vineyards and fields at the same time, such as they were never masters of before, v. 10. The rich had been proud oppressors, and now they were justly punished for their injustice; the poor had been patient sufferers, and now they were graciously rewarded for their patience.

Verses 11–18

I. A gracious providence concerning Jeremiah. Nebuchadnezzar had given orders that care should be taken of him, and that he should be in all respects well used, v. 11, 12. Nebuzar-adan and the rest of the king of Babylon's princes discharged him out of prison, and did everything to make him easy, v. 13, 14. 1. A very generous act of Nebuchadnezzar, who took cognizance of this poor prophet. It was honourably done of the king to give this charge even before the city was taken, and of the captains to observe it even in the heat of action, and it is recorded for imitation. 2. A reproach to Zedekiah and the princes of Israel. They put him in prison, and the king of Babylon and his princes took him out. 3. The performance of God's promise to Jeremiah, in recompence for his services. I will cause the enemy to treat thee well in the day of evil, ch. xv. 11. Jeremiah had been fathful to his trust as a prophet, and now God approves himself faithful to him and the promise he had made him. The same that were the instruments of punishing the persecutors were the instruments of relieving the persecuted; and Jeremiah thought never the worse of his deliverance for its coming by the hand of the king of Babylon, but saw the more of the hand of God in it.

II. A gracious message to Ebed-melech, to assure him of a recompence for his kindness to Jeremiah. He relieved a prophet in the name of a prophet, and thus he had a prophet's reward. Jeremiah tells him that God would certainly bring upon Jerusalem the ruin that had been long threatened; and, for his further satisfaction in having been kind to Jeremiah he should see him abundantly proved a true prophet, v. 16. He shall be delivered from having a share in the common calamity: I will deliver thee; I will surely deliver thee. He had been instrumental to deliver God's prophet out of the dungeon, and now God promises to deliver him, because thou hast put thy trust in me, saith the Lord. Ebed-melech trusted in God that he would own him, and stand by him, and then he was not afraid of the face of man. And those who trust God, as this good man did, in the way of duty, will find that their hope shall not make them ashamed in times of the greatest danger.

CHAP. XL

In this and the four following chapters the story of those few Jews that were left in the land after their brethren were carried away, is a very melancholy story, for they soon appeared as obstinate in sin as ever, unhumbled and unreformed. I. A more particular account of Jeremiah's discharge and his settlement with Gedaliah, ver. 1–6. II. The great resort of the Jews that remained scattered in the neighbouring countries to Gedaliah, who was made their governor under the king of Babylon; and the good posture they were in for a while under him, ver. 7–12. III. A treacherous design formed against Gedaliah, by Ishmael, ver. 13–16.

Verses 1–6

In these verses we have Jeremiah's adhering, by the advice of Nebuzar-adan, to Gedaliah. Jeremiah was very honourably fetched out of the court of the prison by the king of Babylon's princes (ch. xxxix. 13, 14), but afterwards being found among the people in the city, when orders were given to the inferior officers to bind all they found in order to their being carried captives to Babylon, he, through ignorance and mistake, was bound among the rest and hurried away. But when the captives were brought manacled to Ramah, Jeremiah was soon distinguished from the rest, and discharged. 1. The captain of the guard solemnly owns him to be a true prophet (v. 2, 3): "The Lord thy God has by thee pronounced this evil upon this place; they had fair warning given, but they would not take the warning, and now the Lord hath brought it, and, as by thy mouth he said it, so by my hand he hath done what he said." He tells all the people that were now in chains before him, It is because you have sinned against the Lord that this thing has come upon you. The princes of Israel would never be brought to acknowledge this, but this heathen prince plainly sees it. 2. He gives the prophet leave to dispose of himself as he thought fit. He loosed him from his chains a second time (v. 4), invited him to come to Babylon as a friend, as a companion; and I will set my eye upon thee (so the word is), "I will show thee respect, and will see that thou be well provided for." If he was not disposed to go to Babylon, he might dwell where he pleased in his own country. 3. He advises him to go to Gedaliah and settle with him. This Gedaliah, made governor of the land under the king of Babylon, was an honest Jew who (it is probable) went over to the Chaldeans, and approved himself so well that he had this great trust put into his hands, v. 5. While Jeremiah had not yet gone back, but stood considering what he should do, Nebuzar-adan bade him by all means go to Gedaliah. Nor does he only give him his liberty, and an approbation of the measures he shall take, but provides for his support: He gave him victuals and a present, either in clothes or money, and so let him go. Jeremiah accepted his kindness, took his advice, and went to Gedaliah, to Mizpah, and dwelt with him, v. 6. It did not prove at all to his comfort. However, we may commend his pious affection to the land of Israel, that he would not forsake it, but chose rather to dwell with the poor in the holy land than with princes in an unholy one.

Verses 7–16

I. A bright sky opening upon the remnant of the Jews that were left in their own land, and a prospect given them of peace and quietness after the many years of trouble and terror. Providence seemed to raise and encourage such an expectation, and it would be to that miserable people as life from the dead.

1. Gedaliah, one of themselves, is made governor in the land, by the king of Babylon, v. 7. He was the son of Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, one of the princes. His father (ch. xxvi. 24) took Jeremiah's part against the people. He seems to have been a man of great wisdom and a mild temper, and under whose government the few that were left might have been very happy.

2. All those that were now the Jews of the dispersion came and put themselves under his government and protection. The great men that had escaped the Chaldeans came and quietly submitted to Gedaliah. Several are here named, v. 8. They came with their men, their servants, their soldiers, and the king of Babylon had such a good opinion of Gedaliah that he was not jealous of the increase of their numbers, but rather pleased with it. The poor men that had escaped by flight into the neighbouring countries of Moab, Ammon, and Edom, were induced by the love they bore to their own land to return as soon as they heard that Gedaliah was in authority there, v. 11, 12. God remembered mercy, and admitted some of them upon a further trial of their obedience.

3. The model of this new government is drawn up and settled by an original contract (v. 9): "Come" (says Gedaliah), "fear not to serve the Chaldeans." Though the divine law had forbidden them to make leagues with the heathen, yet the divine sentence had obliged them to yield to the king of Babylon. It is no disgrace to any to comply with him. Fear not the consequences of it. If you will but live peaceably, peaceably, you shall live; disturb not the government, and it will not disturb you. Serve the king of Babylon and it shall be well with you. Gedaliah, probably by instruction from the king of Babylon, undertakes upon all occasions to act for them (v. 10): "As for me, behold, I will dwell at Mizpah, to serve the Chaldeans, to do homage to them in the name of the whole body if there be occasion, to receive orders, and to pay them their tribute when they come to us." Gedaliah gives them the assurance of an oath that he will protect them, but, being charitable, he did not require an oath from them that they would be faithful to him, else the following mischief might have been prevented. Though they own their lands to belong to the Chaldeans, yet, upon that condition, they shall have the free enjoyment of them and all the profits of them (v. 10): "Gather you wine and summer fruits, and take them for your own use; put them in your vessels, to be laid up for winter-store, as those do that live in a land of peace and hope to eat the labour of your hand." And accordingly they gathered wine and summer fruits very much, for their corn-harvest was over some time before Jerusalem was taken. Gedaliah left them to enjoy the advantages of the public plenty, and, for aught that appears, demanded no tribute from them; for he sought not his own profit.

II. Here is a dark cloud gathering over this infant state, and threatening a dreadful storm. Baalis the king of the Ammonites hated Gedaliah, and was contriving to kill him, either out of malice to the Jews, or personal pique against Gedaliah, v. 14. Some make Baalis to signify the queen-mother of the king of the Ammonites, or queen-dowager. One would have thought this little remnant might be safe when the great king of Babylon protected it; and yet it is ruined by the artifices of this petty prince or princess. Happy are those that have the King of kings on their side, for the greatest earthly king cannot with all his power secure us against treachery. He employed Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, as the instrument of his malice, instigated him to murder Gedaliah, and, that he might have a fair opportunity, directed him to enrol himself among his subjects and promise him fealty. Ishmael was of the seed royal, and would therefore be easily tempted to envy one that set up for a governor in Judah, who was not of David's line. Johanan, a brisk and active man, having got scent of this plot, informed Gedaliah of it: Dost thou certainly know? surely thou dost, v. 14. He gave him private intelligence of it (v. 15). He proffered his service to prevent it: I will slay him. Wherefore should he slay thee? Gedaliah, being a man of sincerity himself, would by no means give credit to Ishmael's treachery. He said, Thou speakest falsely of Ishmael. Many have been ruined by being over-confident of the fidelity of those about them.

CHAP. XLI

It is a very tragical story that is related in this chapter, and shows that evil pursues sinners. The black cloud bursts in a dreadful storm. Those few Jews that escaped the captivity were proud to think that they were still in their own land, and secure under Gedaliah's protectorship. I. Gedaliah is barbarously slain by Ishmael, ver. 1, 2. II. All the Jews that were with him were slain likewise (ver. 3) and a pit filled with their dead bodies, ver. 9. III. Some devout men, to the number of fourscore, that were going towards Jerusalem, were drawn in by Ishmael, and murdered likewise, ver. 4–7. Only ten of them escaped, ver. 8. IV. Those that escaped the sword were taken prisoners by Ishmael, and carried off towards the country of the Ammonites, ver. 10. V. By the conduct and courage of Johanan, the prisoners are recovered, and he now becomes their commander-in-chief, ver. 11–16. VI. His project is to carry them into the land of Egypt (ver. 17, 18).

Verses 1–10

Such base, barbarous, bloody work is here done by men who by their birth should have been men of honour, by their religion just men, and this done upon those of their own nation, their own religion, and their brethren in affliction, upon no provocation—all done in cold blood.

I. Ishmael and his party treacherously killed Gedaliah himself in the first place. The king of Babylon had made him a great man, governor of the land. God had made him a good man and a great blessing to his country, and his agency for its welfare was as life from the dead. Ishmael was of the seed royal (v. 1) and therefore jealous of Gedaliah's growing greatness. He had ten men with him that were princes of the king too, guided by the same peevish resentments. These had put themselves under his protection (ch. xl. 8), and now came again, and they did eat bread together in Mizpah. He entertained them generously. They pretended friendship and gave him no warning to stand on his guard. But those that did eat bread with him lifted up the heel against him. They watched an opportunity, when they had him alone, and assassinated him, v. 2.

II. They likewise put all to the sword, both Jews and Chaldeans, all that were employed under Gedaliah, v. 3. The vine-dressers and the husbandmen were busy in the fields, and knew nothing of this bloody massacre; so artfully concealed.

III. Some good honest men, that were going to lament the desolations of Jerusalem, were murdered with the rest. They came (v. 5)—from Shechem, Samaria, and Shiloh, places that had been famous, but were now reduced. They were going—to the house of the Lord, the temple at Jerusalem, to pay their respects to its ashes. They took offerings and incense in their hand, that they might not be without something to offer. They showed their goodwill, though the altar was gone. These went with their clothes rent and their heads shaven. They were decoyed into a fatal snare by Ishmael's malice. These pilgrims towards Jerusalem he hated for the sake of their errand. Ishmael went out to meet them with crocodiles' tears, pretending to bewail the desolations of Jerusalem as much as they; and, to try how they stood to Gedaliah and his government, he courted them and found them to have a respect for him, which confirmed him in his resolution to murder them. He said, Come to Gedaliah, pretending he would have them come and live with him, when really he intended that they should come and die with him, v. 6. Ishmael, when he had them in the midst of the town, fell upon them and slew them (v. 7). The dead bodies of these and the rest that he had slain he tumbled into a great pit (v. 7), the same pit that Asa king of Judah had digged long before, to be a frontier-garrison against Baasha king of Israel and for fear of him, v. 9. Among these last that were doomed to the slaughter there were ten that obtained a pardon, by working on the covetousness of those that had them at their mercy, v. 8. They said to Ishmael, Slay us not, for we have treasures in the field, country treasures, large stocks upon the ground, wheat and barley, and oil and honey. This bait prevailed. Ishmael saved them, not for the love of mercy, but for the love of money.

IV. He carried off the people prisoners. The king's daughters and the poor of the land, the vine-dressers and husbandmen, that were committed to Gedaliah's charge, were all led away prisoners towards the country of the Ammonites (v. 10). These prisoners thought, Surely the bitterness of death, and of captivity, is past; and yet some died by the sword and others went into captivity. There is many a ship wrecked in the harbour. We can never be sure of peace on this side heaven.

Verses 11–18

It would have been well if Johanan, when he gave information to Gedaliah of Ishmael's treasonable design, had stayed with Gedaliah; for he, and his captains and their forces, might have been a life-guard to Gedaliah, but it seems they were out upon some expedition when they should have been upon the best service. Those that affect to ramble are many times out of their place when they are most needed. However, at length they hear of all the evil that Ishmael had done (v. 11). Johanan prevailed only to rescue the captives. Johanan gathered what forces he could and went to fight with Ishmael (v. 12). He pursued him, and overtook him by the great pool of Gibeon, which we read of, 2 Sam. ii. 13. And, upon his appearing with such a force, Ishmael's heart failed him, and he durst not stand his ground. The poor captives were glad when they saw Johanan and the captains that were with him, looking upon them as their deliverers (v. 13), and they found a way to wheel about and come over to them (v. 14), Ishmael not offering to detain them. Ishmael quitted his prey to save his life, and escaped with eight men, v. 15. It seems, two of his ten men, that were his banditti or assassins (spoken of v. 1), deserted him. He made his way to the Ammonites, and we hear no more of him. The resolution of Johanan and the captains was very rash; nothing would serve them but they would go to enter into Egypt (v. 17), and, in order to that, they encamped for a time in the habitation of Chimham, by Bethlehem, David's city. Here Johanan made his headquarters, steering his course towards Egypt, either from a personal affection to that country or an ancient confidence in the Egyptians. Some of the mighty men of war, it seems, had escaped; those he took with him, and the women and children, whom he had recovered from Ishmael.

CHAP. XLII

Johanan and the captains being bent upon going into Egypt, either their affections or politics advising them to take that course, they had a great desire that God should direct them to do so too like Balaam, who, when he was determined to go and curse Israel, asked God leave. I. The bargain that was made between Jeremiah and them about consulting God in this matter, ver. 1–6. II. The message which God sent them, in which, 1. They are commanded to continue in the land of Judah, and assured that if they did so it should be well with them, ver. 7–12. 2. They are forbidden to go to Egypt; if they did it would be their ruin, ver. 13–18. 3. They are charged with dissimulation in asking what God's will was, and disobedience when they were told what it was; and sentence is passed upon them, ver. 19–22.

Verses 1-6

Jeremiah the prophet escaped the sword of Ishmael; and it was not the first time that the Lord hid him. At length, to serve a turn, Jeremiah is sought out, and all the captains, Johanan himself not excepted, with all the people from the least to the greatest, make him a visit; they came near (v. 1). Hitherto they had kept at a distance from the prophet and had been shy of him.

I. They desire him by prayer to ask direction from God what they should do in the present critical juncture, v. 2, 3. They express themselves with great respect to the prophet. Though he was poor and low, yet they apply to him with humility as petitioners for his assistance: Let, we beseech thee, our supplication be accepted before thee. They compliment him thus to persuade him to say as they would have him say. "Pray for us, who know not how to pray for ourselves. Pray to the Lord thy God, for we are unworthy to call him ours, nor have we reason to expect any favour from him." They speak of themselves as objects of compassion: "We are but a remnant, but a few of many; how easily will such a remnant be swallowed up. Thy eyes see what distress we are in; if thou canst do anything, help us. Let the Lord thy God take this ruin into his thoughts, and show us the way wherein we may walk and may expect to have his presence with us, and the thing that we may do, the course we may take for our own safety."

II. Jeremiah faithfully promises to pray for direction for them, and, whatever message God should send to them by him, he would deliver it to them just as he received it, v. 4. Though they had slighted him, yet, like Samuel when he was slighted, he will not sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for them, 1 Sam. xii. 23. He will declare to them the whole counsel of God, that they may approve themselves true to their trust.

III. They promise that they will be governed by the will of God, as soon as they know what it is (v. 5, 6). They now call God their God, for Jeremiah had encouraged them to call him so (v. 4): I will pray to the Lord your God. They promise to obey his voice because they sent the prophet to him to consult him. They will do what God appoints them to do, whether it be good or whether it be evil; "Though it may seem evil to us, yet we will believe that if God command it it is certainly good, and we must not dispute it, but do it. Whatever God commands, whether it be easy or difficult, if it be our duty, we will do it."

Verses 7–22

The answer which Jeremiah was sent to deliver to those who employed him to ask counsel of God.

I. It did not come till ten days after, v. 7. They were thus long held in suspense, perhaps, to punish them for their hypocrisy or to show that Jeremiah did not speak of himself, but must wait for instructions. The vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak.

II. When it did come he delivered it publicly, both to the captains and to all the people, fully and faithfully as he received it. What he has to advise is what the Lord the God of Israel saith, to whom they had sent him.

1. It is the will of God that they should stay where they are, and his promise that, if they do so, it shall be well with them, v. 10. Their brethren were forced out of it into captivity; let those therefore count it a mercy that they may stay in it and a duty to stay in it. He expresses a very tender concern for them in their calamitous condition: It repenteth me of the evil that I have done unto you. Not that he changed his mind, but he was very ready to change his way and to return in mercy to them. He answers the argument they had against abiding in this land. They feared the king of Babylon (ch. xii. 18), lest he should come and avenge the death of Gedaliah upon them, though they were no way accessory to it. "Be not afraid of the king of Babylon, for that fear will bring a snare: fear not for I am with you; and, if God be for you to save you, who can be against you to hurt you?" He assures them that if they will still abide in this land they shall not only be safe from the king of Babylon, but be made happy by the King of kings: "I will build you and plant you; you shall take root again, and be the new foundation of another state, a phoenix-kingdom, rising out of the ashes of the last." God will show them mercy in this, that not only the king of Babylon shall not destroy them, but he shall have mercy upon them and help to settle them. God has made that our duty which is really our privilege, and our obedience will be its own recompence.

2. They must by no means think of going into Egypt of all places, not to that land out of which God had delivered their fathers and with which he had so often warned them not to make alliance. "You begin to say, We will not dwell in this land (v. 13); no, not though God himself undertake our protection. We will go into the land of Egypt, and there will we dwell, whether God give us leave and go along with us or no," v. 14. It is supposed that their hearts were upon it: "If you wholly set your faces to enter into Egypt, then take what follows." Now the reason for their resolution is that "in Egypt we shall see no war, nor have hunger of bread, as we have had for a long time in this land," v. 14. The sentence passed upon them for this sin, if they will persist in it is pronounced in God's name (v. 15): "Hear the word of the Lord, you remnant of Judah, who think that because you are a remnant you must be spared" (v. 2). Did the sword and famine frighten them? Those very judgments shall pursue them into Egypt and overcome them there (v. 16, 17): "You think, because war and famine have long been raging in this land, that they are entailed upon it; whereas, if you trust in God, he can make even this land a land of peace to you." The men that go to Egypt in contradiction to God's will, to escape the sword and famine, shall die in Egypt by sword and famine. Did the desolations of Jerusalem frighten them? Were they willing to get as far as they could from them? They shall meet with the second part of them too in Egypt (v. 18). When God's professing people mingle with infidels, and make their court to them, they lose their dignity and make themselves a reproach.

3. God knew their hypocrisy in their enquiries of him, and that when they asked what he would have them to do they were resolved to take their own way; and therefore the sentence. The prophet solemnly protests that he had faithfully delivered his message, v. 19. The conclusion of the whole matter is, "Go not down into Egypt; you disobey the command of God if you do. I have plainly admonished you; you cannot now plead ignorance of the mind of God." He charges them with base dissimulation in the application they made to him for divine direction (v. 20) "You dissembled in your hearts; you professed one thing and intended another, promising what you never meant to perform." You have used deceit against your souls (so the margin reads it). Know certainly that you shall die by the sword, v. 22. God's threatenings may be vilified, but cannot be nullified, by the unbelief of man.

CHAP. XLIII

Jeremiah had faithfully delivered his message from God. Here is, I. The people's contempt of this message; they denied it to be the word of God (ver. 1–3). Into Egypt they went, and took Jeremiah himself along with them, ver. 4–7. II. God's pursuit of them with another message, foretelling the king of Babylon's pursuit of them into Egypt, ver. 8–13.

Verses 1–7

What God said to the builders of Babel may be truly said of this people: Now nothing will be restrained from them which they have imagined to do, Gen. xi. 6. They have a fancy for Egypt, and to Egypt they will go, whatever God himself says. Jeremiah made them hear all he had to say; it was what the Lord their God had sent him to speak to them, and they shall have it all.

I. They deny it to be a message from God: Johanan, and all the proud men, said to Jeremiah, Thou speakest falsely, v. 2. The cause of their disobedience was pride. They were proud men that gave the lie to the prophet. They could not bear the control of their designs, no, not by the divine wisdom, by the divine will itself. Either they were not convinced that what was said came from God or though they were convinced of it they would not own it. Had they not consulted Jeremiah as a prophet? Had he not waited to receive instructions from God what to say to them? And had not God proved him a prophet indeed? They had some good thoughts of Jeremiah, but they suggest (v. 3), Baruch sets thee on against us. If Jeremiah and he had been so well affected to the Chaldeans they would have gone away with Nebuzaradan to Babylon, and not have stayed to take their lot with this despised ungrateful remnant. If Baruch had been so ill disposed, could they think Jeremiah would be so influenced by him as to make God's name an authority to patronise so villainous a purpose?

II. They determine to go to Egypt notwithstanding. They resolve not to dwell in the land of Judah, as God had ordered them (v. 4), but to go with one consent to Egypt. Those that came from all the nations whither they had been driven, to dwell in the land of Judah, out of a sincere affection to that land, they would not leave to their liberty, but forced them to go with them into Egypt (v. 5), men, women, and children (v. 6). These proud men compelled even Jeremiah the prophet and Baruch his scribe to go along with them to Egypt. They came to Tahpanhes, a famous city of Egypt (so called from a queen of that name, 1 Kings xi. 19). Pharaoh's house was there, v. 9. If they had had the spirit of Israelites, they would have chosen rather to dwell in the wilderness of Judah than in the most pompous populous cities of Egypt.

Verses 8–13

Here, as also in the next chapter, Jeremiah is prophesying in Egypt. Jeremiah was now in Tahpanhes, among idolatrous Egyptians and treacherous Israelites; but there he received the word of the Lord; it came to him. God can find his people, with the visits of his grace, wherever they are. The spirit of prophecy was not confined to the land of Israel. When Jeremiah went into Egypt by constraint, God withdrew not his wonted favour from him. What he received of the Lord he delivered to the people. These two messages Jeremiah was appointed and entrusted to deliver when he was in Egypt—one in this chapter, relating to Egypt, and foretelling its destruction, the other in the next chapter, relating to the Jews in Egypt. God had told them that if they went into Egypt the sword should follow them; here he tells them further that the sword of Nebuchadrezzar should follow them.

I. This is foretold by a sign. Jeremiah must take great stones and lay them in the clay of the furnace, or brick-kiln, which is in the open way, or beside the way that leads to Pharaoh's house (v. 9). Egypt was famous for brick-kilns (Exod. v. 7). The foundation of Egypt's desolation was laid in those brick-kilns, in that clay. This he must do in the sight of the men of Judah to whom he was sent, that, since he could not prevent their going into Egypt, he might bring them to repent of their going.

II. It is foretold, 1. That the present king of Babylon, Nebuchadrezzar, should come in person against the land of Egypt, and should set his throne in that very place where these stones were laid, v. 10. This circumstance is particularly foretold, that, when it was accomplished, they might be confirmed in their belief of the certainty of the divine prescience, to which the smallest events are evident. God calls Nebuchadnezzar his servant, because herein he executed God's will. 2. That he should destroy many of the Egyptians, and have them all at his mercy (v. 11): He shall smite the land of Egypt; whom he will he shall slay. And whom he will he shall save alive and carry into captivity. 3. That he shall destroy the idols of Egypt, the temples and the images of their gods (v. 12): He shall burn the houses of the Gods of Egypt. Beth-shemesh, or the house of the sun, was so called from a temple there built to the sun. The statues he shall break in pieces (v. 13) The king of Babylon was himself a great idolater and had his temples and images in honour of the sun. Yet he is employed to destroy the idols of Egypt. 4. That he shall make himself master of the land. He shall array himself with the rich spoils of the land of Egypt. He shall array himself with them as ornaments and as armour; and this, though it shall be a heavy booty, he shall slip on with as much ease as a shepherd slips on his garment, when he goes to turn out his sheep in a morning. He shall make no more of the spoils of the land of Egypt than of a shepherd's coat. He shall go forth in peace, without any molestation so effectually reduced shall the land of Egypt be. This destruction of Egypt by the king of Babylon is foretold, Ezek. xxix. 19 and xxx. 10.

CHAP. XLIV

I. An awakening sermon which Jeremiah preaches to the Jews in Egypt, to reprove them for their idolatry, ver. 1–14. II. The contempt which the people put upon this admonition, and their resolution to persist in their idolatries in despite of God and Jeremiah, ver. 15–19. III. The sentence passed upon them that they should all be cut off and perish in Egypt except a very small number; and, as a sign or earnest of it, the king of Egypt should shortly fall into the hands of the king of Babylon and be unable any longer to protect them, ver. 20–30.

Verses 1–14

The Jews in Egypt were now dispersed into various parts of the country, into Migdol, and Noph, and other places, and Jeremiah was sent on an errand from God to them (v. 15).

I. God puts them in mind of the desolations of Judah and Jerusalem, which the fugitives in the cities of Egypt seem to have forgotten (v. 2): You have seen what a deplorable condition Judah and Jerusalem are brought into; now will you consider whence those desolations came? From the wrath of God; it was his anger which made Jerusalem and the cities of Judah waste and desolate (v. 6).

II. He puts them in mind of the sins that brought those desolations upon Judah and Jerusalem. It was for their wickedness (v. 3), giving honour to counterfeit deities, which should have been given to the true God only. They forsook the God who was known among them. "Neither they nor you, nor your fathers, could give any rational account why the God of Israel was exchanged for such impostors."

III. He puts them in mind of the frequent and fair warnings he had given them by his word not to serve other gods, v. 4. The prophets were sent with a great deal of care to call to them, saying, Oh! do not this abominable thing that I hate. It becomes us to give warning of the danger of sin: "Oh! do not do it. If you love God, do not, for it is provoking to him; if you love your own souls do not, for it is destructive to them." If God hates it, thou shouldst hate it. But "They hearkened not, nor inclined their ear (v. 5). Now this was intended for warning to you, who have not only heard the judgments of God's mouth, as they did, but have likewise seen the judgments of his hand."

IV. He reproves them for their continued idolatries (v. 8): You burn incense to other gods in the land of Egypt. They went against God's mind into Egypt, and when we thrust ourselves into places of temptation, it is just with God to leave us to ourselves. They did a great deal of injury to themselves and their families: "You commit this great evil against your souls" (v. 7). "It is the ready way to cut yourselves off from all comfort and hope (v. 8), to cut off your name and honour; so that you will by your sin and by your misery, become a curse and a reproach among all nations." They filled up the iniquity of their fathers, and added to it (v. 9): "Have you forgotten the wickedness of those who are gone before you?" Have you forgotten the punishments of your fathers? so some read it. He reminds them of the sins and punishments of the kings of Judah, and the wickedness of their wives, who had seduced them to idolatry. In the original it is, And of his wives, which, Dr. Lightfoot thinks, tacitly reflects upon Solomon's wives, particularly his Egyptian wives. Have you forgotten your own wickedness and the wickedness of your wives, when you lived in prosperity in Jerusalem, and what ruin it brought upon you?

V. He threatens their utter ruin for their persisting in their idolatry now that they were in Egypt. They shall perish in Egypt. Those that think not only to affront, but to confront, God Almighty, will find themselves outfaced. They shall not be wasted by natural deaths, as Israel in the wilderness, but by sore judgments. None (except a very few that will narrowly escape) shall ever return to the land of Judah again, v. 14. Those that are fretful and discontented will be uneasy and fond of change wherever they are. The Israelites, when they were in the land of Judah, desired to go into Egypt (ch. xlii. 22), but when they were in Egypt they desired to return to the land of Judah again; they lifted up their soul to it (so it is in the margin), which denotes an earnest desire.

Verses 15–19

The people's obstinate refusal to submit to the power of the word of God in the mouth of Jeremiah.

I. The persons who thus set God and his judgments at defiance were such as knew either themselves or their wives to be guilty of the idolatry Jeremiah had reproved, v. 15. The women had been more guilty of idolatry and superstition than the men, not because the men stuck closer to the true God, but because they were generally atheists, and were for no God and no religion at all, and therefore could easily allow their wives to be of a false religion. It was consciousness of guilt that made them impatient of reproof: They knew that their wives had burnt incense to other gods, and that they had countenanced them in it, and the women that stood by knew that they had joined with them in idolatrous usages; so that what Jeremiah said touched them in a sore place.

II. The reply which these persons made to Jeremiah, and in him to God himself.

1. They declare their resolution not to do as God commanded them, but what they themselves had a mind to do; that is, they would worship the moon, here called the queen of heaven; some understand it of the sun, which was much worshipped in Egypt (ch. xliii. 13) and had been so at Jerusalem (2 Kings xxiii. 11). And others understand it of all the host of heaven, or the frame of heaven, the whole machine, ch. vii. 18. These daring sinners do not now go about to make excuses for their refusal, nor suggest that Jeremiah spoke from himself and not from God (as before, ch. xliii. 2), but they tell him flatly, "We will not hearken unto thee; we will do that which is forbidden and run the hazard of that which is threatened." Those that live in disobedience to God commonly grow worse and worse, and the heart is more and more hardened by the deceitfulness of sin. What they said many think. It is that which the young man would be at in the days of his youth; he would have and do everything he has a mind to, Eccles. xi. 9.

2. They give some sort of reasons for their resolution. They plead antiquity: We are resolved to burn incense to the queen of heaven, for our fathers did so. They plead authority. Those that had power practised it themselves and prescribed it to others: Our kings and our princes did it, whom God set over us, and who were of the seed of David. They plead unity. We all with one consent, we that are a great multitude (v. 15), we did it. They plead universality. It was done in the cities of Judah. They plead visibility. It was not done in dark and shady groves only, but in the streets, openly. They plead that it was the practice of the mother-church; it had been done in Jerusalem. They plead prosperity: Then had we plenty of bread, and of all good things: we were well and saw no evil. But, supposing all to be true, yet this does not excuse them from idolatry; it is the law of God that we must be judged by, not the practice of men. They suggest that the judgments they had been under were brought upon them for leaving off to burn incense to the queen of heaven, v. 18. Thus, in the first ages of Christianity, when God chastised the nations by any public calamities for opposing the Christians and persecuting them, they put a contrary sense upon the calamities, as if they were sent to punish them for conniving at the Christians and tolerating them, and cried, Christianos ad leones—Throw the Christians to the lions. They plead that, though the women were most active in their idolatries, yet they did it with the approbation of their husbands; the women were busy to make cakes for meat-offerings to the queen of heaven and to prepare and pour out the drink-offerings, v. 19. Some understand this as spoken by the husbands (v. 15), who plead that they did not do it without their men, that is, without their elders and rulers, but, because the making of the cakes and the pouring out of the drink-offerings are expressly spoke of as the women's work (ch. vii. 18), it seems rather to be understood as their plea.

Verses 20–30

I. Jeremiah has something to say to them from himself. They said that these miseries came upon them because they had now left off burning incense to the queen of heaven. "No," says he, "it was because you had formerly done it, not because you had now left it off." The incense which they and their fathers had burnt to other gods did indeed go unpunished a great while, for God was long-suffering, and during the day of his patience it was perhaps, as they said, well with them, and they saw no evil; but at length they grew so provoking that the Lord could no longer bear (v. 22), whereupon some of them did a little reform. But their old corrupt inclinations being still the same, God remembered against them the idolatries of their fathers, their kings, and their princes, in the streets of Jerusalem, which they gloried in (v. 21). All the abominations which they had committed were brought to account; and therefore is their land a desolation and a curse, as at this day (v. 22); therefore for their old transgressions, has all this evil happened to them, as at this day, v. 23.

II. Jeremiah has something to say to them, to the women particularly, from the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel. They have given their answer; now let them hear God's reply, v. 24.

1. Since they were fully determined to persist in their idolatry, he would go on to punish them. God repeats what they had said (v. 25): "You and your wives are agreed in this obstinacy; you have spoken with your mouths and fulfilled with your hands; you have said, We will surely perform our vows that we have vowed, to burn incense to the queen of heaven," as if, though it were a sin, yet their having vowed to do it were sufficient to justify them in the doing of it; whereas no man can by his vow make that lawful to himself, much less duty, which God has already made sin. He had sworn that what little remains of religion there were among them, should be lost, v. 26. Though they joined with the Egyptians in their idolatries, yet they continued to make mention of the name of Jehovah, particularly in their solemn oaths; they said, Jehovah liveth, he is the living God, so they owned him to be, though they worshipped dead idols; they swear, The Lord liveth (ch. v. 2). But God declares that his name shall no more be thus named by any man of Judah in all the land of Egypt. Those are very miserable whom God has so far left to themselves that they have quite forgotten their religion. To those whom God finds impenitent sinners he will be found an implacable Judge. They said that they should recover themselves when they returned to worship the queen of heaven; God said they should ruin themselves.

2. He tells them that few of them should escape the sword, and return into the land of Judah, a small number (v. 28), in comparison with the great numbers that should return out of the land of the Chaldeans.

3. He gives them a sign that all these threatenings shall be accomplished in Egypt. Pharaoh-hophra, the present king of Egypt, shall be delivered into the hand of his enemies that seek his life—of his own rebellious subjects (so some) under Amasis, who usurped his throne—of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon (so others), who invaded his kingdom; the former is related by Herodotus, the latter by Josephus. They expected more from him than from Zedekiah king of Judah; he was a more potent prince. "But," says God, "I will give him into the hand of his enemies, as I gave Zedekiah."

CHAP. XLV

The prophecy in this chapter concerns Baruch only. It is placed here after the story of the destruction of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the Jews, but was delivered long before, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim. I. How Baruch was terrified when he was brought into trouble for writing and reading Jeremiah's roll. ver. 1–3. II. How his fears were checked and silenced with a promise of special preservation, ver. 4, 5.

Verses 1–5

Baruch was employed in writing Jeremiah's prophecies, and reading them, ch. xxxvi, and was threatened for it by the king. He escaped under a divine protection to which story this chapter is a sequel.

I. The consternation that poor Baruch was in when he was sought for by the king's messengers, and the notice which God took of it. He was a young man willing to serve God and his prophet. But when he found it exposed him to contempt, he cried out, "I am undone; I shall fall into the pursuers' hands, and be imprisoned, and put to death, or banished: The Lord has added grief to my sorrow. After the grief of writing and reading the prophecies of my country's ruin, I have the sorrow of being treated as a criminal for so doing; it is a burden too heavy for me. I fainted in my sighing and I find no rest." Young beginners in religion are apt to be discouraged with the little difficulties which they meet at first in the service of God. They do but run with the footmen, and it wearies them; they faint upon the very dawning of the day of adversity, and it is an evidence that their strength is small (Prov. xxiv. 10), their faith weak. Baruch should have rejoiced that he was counted worthy to suffer in such a good cause and with such good company, but, instead of that, he reflects upon his god, as if he had dealt hardly with him.

II. Jeremiah was troubled to see him in such agitation, and knew not what to say to him. He was loth to chide him, and willing to comfort him, but God tells him what he shall say to him, v. 4. It is our over-fondness for the good things of this present time that makes us impatient under its evil things. Now God shows him that it was his fault and folly to desire an abundance of the wealth and honour of this world. The ship was sinking. Ruin was coming upon the Jewish nation: "That which I have built, to be a house for myself, I am breaking down, and that which I have planted, to be a vineyard for myself, I am plucking up, even this whole land, the Jewish church and state; and dost thou now seek great things for thyself? Dost thou expect to be rich and honourable and to make a figure now? Canst thou expect to be high when all are brought low?"

III. God gave him hope that though he should not be great, yet he should be safe: "I will bring evil upon all flesh, all nations, but thy life will I give to thee for a prey" (thy soul, so the word is) "in all places whither thou goest. Thou must be hurried from place to place, and in danger, but thou shalt escape, though often very narrowly, shalt have thy life, but it shall be as a prey, got with much difficulty and danger; thou shalt be saved as by fire."

CHAP. XLVI

Judgment began at the house of God, but it did not end there. In this and the following chapters we have predictions of the desolations of the neighbouring nations, brought upon them mostly by the king of Babylon, till at length Babylon itself comes to be reckoned with. The prophecy against Egypt is put first. I. A prophecy of the defeat of Pharaoh-necho's army by the Chaldean forces at Carchemish, ver. 1–12. II. A prophecy of the descent which Nebuchadnezzar should make upon the land of Egypt, which was accomplished some years after the destruction of Jerusalem, ver. 13–26. III. A word of comfort to the Israel of God in the midst of those calamities, ver. 27, 28.

Verses 1–11

The first verse is the title of that part of this book which relates to the neighbouring nations. It is the word of the Lord which came to Jeremiah against the Gentiles. In the Old Testament we have the word of the Lord against the Gentiles; in the New Testament we have the word of the Lord for the Gentiles, that those who were afar off are made nigh.

He begins with Egypt, because they were of old Israel's oppressors and of late their deceivers. In these verses he foretells the overthrow of the army of Pharaoh-necho, by Nebuchadnezzar, in the fourth year of Jehoakim. This defeat (as we find, 2 Kings xxiv. 7), made him pay dearly for his expedition against the king of Assyria four years before, in which he slew Josiah, 2 Kings xxiii. 29. This event is here foretold in lofty expressions of triumph over Egypt thus foiled, which Jeremiah would speak of with pleasure, because the death of Josiah was now avenged on Pharaoh-necho.

I. The Egyptians are upbraided with the mighty preparations they made for this expedition, in which the prophet challenges them to do their utmost: "Come then, order the buckler, let the weapons of war be got ready," v. 3. Egypt was famous for horses —let them be harnessed and the cavalry well mounted: Get up, you horsemen, and stand forth, &c., v. 4. He compares this expedition to the rising of their river Nile (v. 7, 8): Egypt now rises up like a flood, threatening to overflow all the neighbouring lands. It is a very formidable army. The prophet summons them (v. 9): Come up, you horses; rage, you chariots. He challenges them to bring all their confederate troops together, the Ethiopians, who descended from the same stock as the Egyptians (Gen. x. 6), and were their neighbours and allies, the Libyans and Lydians, both in Africa, to the west of Egypt, from whom the Egyptians fetched their auxiliary forces. It shall be all in vain; they shall be shamefully defeated, for God will fight against them, Prov. xxi. 30, 31.

II. They are upbraided with the great expectations they had from this expedition. They knew their own thoughts, and God knew them, but they knew not the thoughts of the Lord, for he gathers them as sheaves into the floor, Mic. iv. 11, 12. Egypt saith (v. 8): I will go up; I will cover the earth, and none shall hinder me; I will destroy the city, whatever city it is that stands in my way. Like Pharaoh of old, I will pursue, I will overtake. But God saith that it shall be his day: This is the day of the Lord God of hosts (v. 10), in which he will be exalted in the overthrow of the Egyptians.

III. They are upbraided with their cowardice (v. 5, 6): "Wherefore have I seen them, notwithstanding all these mighty and vast preparations, when the Chaldean army faces them, dismayed, turned back, and no spirit left in them." Even their mighty ones, who, one would think, should have stood their ground, flee a flight, flee by consent, in confusion; they have neither time nor heart to look back, but fear is round about them. They cannot make their escape. They shall stumble in their flight, and fall towards the north, towards their enemies' country; for such confusion were they in that instead of making homeward, they made forward.

IV. They are upbraided with their inability ever to recover this blow, v. 11, 12. The damsel, the daughter of Egypt, that lived in great pomp and state, is sorely wounded by this defeat. Let her now seek for balm in Gilead; let her use all the medicines her wise men can prescribe for the repairing of the loss sustained by this defeat; but all in vain; no cure shall be to them; they shall never be able to bring such a powerful army into the field again. "The nations that rang of thy glory and strength have now heard of thy shame, how shamefully thou wast routed and how thou art weakened by it." Thy cry hath filled the country about; such confusion were they in.

Verses 12–28

I. Confusion and terror spoken to Egypt. The accomplishment of the prediction in the former part of the chapter disabled the Egyptians from making any attempts upon other nations. But still they remained strong at home, and none of their neighbours durst make any attempts upon them. The scope of the prophecy here is to show how the king of Babylon should shortly come and smite the land of Egypt, v. 13. This was fulfilled by the same hand with the former, even Nebuchadnezzar's, but many years after.

1. The alarm of war sounded in Egypt (v. 14). The enemy is approaching, the sword is devouring round about in the neighbouring countries, and it is time for the Egyptians to prepare to give the enemy a warm reception. This must be proclaimed in all parts of Egypt, particularly in Migdol, Noph, and Tahpanhes, because in these places the Jewish refugees had planted themselves, in contempt of God's command (ch. xliv. 1). Let them hear what a sorry shelter Egypt is likely to be to them.

2. The retreat of the forces of other nations which the Egyptians had in their pay is here foretold. Some were posted upon the frontiers to guard them, where they were beaten off by the invaders and put to flight. Then were the valiant men swept away (v. 15) as with a sweeping rain (it is the word that is used Prov. xxviii. 3); they can none of them stand their ground, because the Lord drives them from their posts; he drives them by enabling the Chaldeans to drive them. If God please, they shall be made to fall upon one another, every man's sword against his fellow. Her hired men, the troops Egypt has in her service, are indeed in the midst of her like fatted bullocks, lusty men, able bodied, who were likely to make good against the enemy: but they are turned back; and, instead of fighting, they have fled away together. They all made homeward towards their own country (v. 16): They said, "Arise, and let us go again to our own people, safe from the oppressing sword of the Chaldeans, that bears down all before it." In times of exigence little confidence is to be put in mercenary troops, that fight purely for pay. They exclaimed vehemently against Pharaoh, to whose bad management their defeat was owing. When he posted them there upon the borders of his country it is probable that he told them he would come himself with a gallant army to support them, but he failed them. No marvel that they deserted crying out, Pharaoh king of Egypt is but a noise (v. 17). He has passed the time appointed; he did not keep his word.

3. The formidable power of the Chaldean army is described as bearing down all before it. The King of kings, whose name is the Lord of hosts, hath said it, As I live, saith this King, as Tabor overtops the mountains and Carmel overlooks the sea, so shall the king of Babylon overpower all the force of Egypt, v. 18. He and his army shall come against Egypt with axes, as hewers of wood (v. 22), and the Egyptians shall be no more able to resist them than the tree is to resist the man that comes with an axe to cut it down.

4. The desolation of Egypt is foretold, and the waste that should be made of that rich country. Egypt is now like a very fair heifer, or calf (v. 20), fat and shining, and not accustomed to the yoke of subjection, wanton as a heifer that is well fed. Some think here is an allusion to Apis, the bull or calf which the Egyptians worshipped, from whom the children of Israel learned to worship the golden calf. Egypt is as fair as a goddess, but destruction comes; cutting up comes (so some read it); it comes out of the north; thence the Chaldean soldiers shall come to kill and cut up this fair heifer. The daughters of Egypt shall be confounded (v. 24), shall be filled with astonishment. Their voice shall go like a serpent, that is, it shall be very low and submissive. They shall not dare to make loud complaints of the cruelty of the conquerors, but vent their griefs in silent murmurs. They shall not now answer roughly, but, with the poor, use entreaties and beg for their lives. They shall be carried away prisoners into their enemy's land (v. 19): "O thou daughter! dwelling securely and delicately in Egypt, furnish thyself to go into captivity; instead of rich clothes, which will but tempt the enemy to strip thee, get plain and warm clothes; and inure thyself to hardship, that thou mayest bear it the better." The Egyptians must prepare to flee; for their cities shall be evacuated. Noph particularly shall be desolate, without an inhabitant. The multitude of No shall be punished: it is called populous No, Nah. iii. 8. Though hand join in hand, they shall not escape; nor think to go off in the crowd. Pharaoh shall be brought down, and all those that trust in him (v. 25), particularly the Jews that came to sojourn in his country, trusting in him rather than in God. All these shall be delivered into the hands of the northern nations (v. 24).

5. An intimation is given that in process of time Egypt shall recover itself again (v. 26): Afterwards it shall be inhabited.

II. Comfort and peace are here spoken to the Israel of God, v. 27, 28. It may refer to the captives in Babylon, whom God had mercy in store for, or, more generally, to all the people of God, designed for their encouragement in the most difficult times, when the judgments of God are abroad among the nations. Let the wicked of the earth tremble, but fear not thou, O my servant Jacob! and be not dismayed, O Israel! and again, Fear thou not, O Jacob! God would not have his people to be a timorous people. God's people shall be found out and gathered though they be far off. The wicked is like the troubled sea when it cannot rest; they flee when none pursues. But Jacob, being at home in God, shall be at rest and at ease, and none shall make him afraid; for what time he is afraid he has a God to trust to. Nations have their periods, but the gospel church, God's spiritual Israel, still continues, and will to the end of time.

CHAP. XLVII

This chapter reads the Philistines their doom, as the former read the Egyptians theirs and by the same hand, that of Nebuchadnezzar. It is short, but terrible; and Tyre and Zidon come in sharers with them in the destruction. I. It is foretold that forces should come from the north, ver. 1–5. II. That the war should continue long, and their endeavours to put an end to it should be in vain, ver. 6–7.

Verses 1–7

As the Egyptians had often proved false friends, so the Philistines had always been sworn enemies, to the Israel of God, and the more dangerous, for their being such near neighbours to them. They were humbled in David's time, but, it seems, they had got head again till Nebuchadnezzar cut them off with their neighbours, which is the event here foretold. The date of this prophecy was before Pharaoh smote Gaza. When this blow was given to Gaza by the king of Egypt is not certain, but this word of the Lord came to Jeremiah against the Philistines when they were in no peril from any adversary, yet then Jeremiah foretold their ruin. It is here foretold, 1. That a foreign enemy shall be brought upon them: Waters rise up out of the north, v. 2. Now a terrible storm comes out of that cold climate. The Chaldean army shall overflow the land like a deluge. 2. That they shall all be in a consternation upon it. The men shall have no heart to fight: All the inhabitants of the land shall howl, so that nothing but lamentation shall be heard in all places. Before it comes to killing and slaying, the very stamping of the horses and rattling of the chariots, shall strike terror to such a degree that parents in their fright shall seem void of natural affection, for they shall not look back to their children, to provide for their safety. 3. That the country of the Philistines shall be spoiled and laid waste, v. 4. Tyre and Zidon were strong and wealthy cities, and they used to help the Philistines in a strait, but now they shall themselves be involved in the common ruin, and God will cut off from them every helper that remains. Who the remnant of the country of Caphtor were is uncertain, but the Caphtorim were near akin to the Philistines (Gen. x. 14), and probably when their own country was destroyed such as remained settled with their kinsmen the Philistines. Some particular places are here named, Gaza, and Ashkelon, v. 5. Baldness has come upon them; the invaders have stripped them of all their ornaments, and they are cut off. The prophet, with his usual tenderness, asks them first (v. 5), How long will you cut yourselves, as men in extreme sorrow and anguish do? But he turns from the effect to the cause: They cut themselves, for the sword of the Lord cuts them. O thou sword of the Lord! how long will it be ere thou be quiet? He begs it would put up itself into the scabbard. This expresses the prophet's earnest desire to see an end of the war, looking with compassion, even upon the Philistines themselves. Yet he stops the mouth of his own complaint (v. 7): How can it be quiet, seeing the Lord hath given it a charge against such and such places. When the sword is drawn we cannot expect it should be sheathed till it has fulfilled its charge. As the word of God, so his rod and his sword, shall accomplish that for which he sends them.

CHAP. XLVIII

Isaiah's predictions concerning Moab had had their accomplishment (we had the predictions Isa. xv and xvi and the like Amos ii. 1), and they were fulfilled when the Assyrians, under Salmanassar, invaded and distressed Moab. But this is a prophecy of the desolations of Moab by the Chaldeans, which were accomplished under Nebuzaradan, about five years after he had destroyed Jerusalem. I. The destruction foretold (ver. 1–6, 8, and again ver. 21–25, 34), that spoilers should come upon them and force some to flee (ver. 9), should carry many into captivity (ver. 12, 46), that the enemy should come shortly (ver. 16), come swiftly and surprise them (ver. 40, 41), that he should make thorough work (ver. 10) and lay the country waste (ver. 14, 15), that there should be no escaping (ver. 42, 45), that this should force them to quit their idols (ver. 13, 35) and put an end to all their joy (ver. 33, 34), that their neighbours shall lament them (ver. 17–19) and the prophet himself does, ver. 31, 36, &c. II. The causes of this destruction assigned; it was their pride, and security, and carnal confidence (ver. 7, 11, 14, 29), and their contempt of God and his people, ver. 26, 27, 30. III. A promise of the restoration of Moab, ver. 47.

Verses 1–13

I. The author of Moab's destruction is the Lord of hosts, and the God of Israel (v. 1), who will herein plead the cause of his Israel against a people that have always been vexatious to them, and will punish them now for the injuries done to Israel of old.

II. The instruments of it: Spoilers shall come (v. 8), shall come with a sword, a sword that shall pursue them, v. 2. "I will send unto him wanderers, such as come from afar, as if they had missed their way, but they shall cause him to wander." These destroyers have devised evil against Heshbon, one of the principal cities of Moab, and they aim at the ruin of the kingdom: Come, and let us cut it off from being a nation (v. 2). The prophet, in God's name, engages them to make thorough work of it (v. 10): Cursed be he that does the work of the Lord deceitfully. To this work is applied that general rule given to all that are employed in any service for God, Cursed be he that does the work of the Lord deceitfully or negligently.

III. The effects of this destruction. The cities shall be laid in ruins; they shall be spoiled (v. 1) and cut down (v. 2); they shall be desolate (v. 9), without any to dwell therein. The country also shall be wasted, the valley shall perish, and the plain be destroyed, v. 8. The corn and the flocks, which used to cover the plains and make the valleys rejoice, shall all be destroyed, eaten up, trodden down, or carried off. The priests and princes shall go together into captivity. Chemosh, the god they worship, shall share with them in the ruin; his temples shall be laid in ashes and his image carried away with the rest of the spoil. The consequence will be shame and confusion: Kirjathaim is confounded, and Misgah is so. There shall be no more vaunting in Moab concerning Heshbon (so it might be read, v. 2). Nor shall they any more boast of their gods (v. 13); they shall be ashamed of Chemosh, as Israel was ashamed of Beth-el, of the golden calf they had at Beth-el, for it was not able to save them from the Assyrians; nor shall Chemosh be able to save the Moabites from the Chaldeans. Go up to the hills, go down to the valleys, and you meet with continual weeping (weeping with weeping); all are in tears; you meet none with dry eyes. They will cry to one another: "Away, away! flee, save your lives (v. 6); shift for your own safety, though you escape as naked as the heath, or grig, or dry shrub, in the wilderness. Take shelter, though it be in a barren wilderness. The danger will come suddenly and swiftly; and therefore give wings unto Moab (v. 9)."

IV. God will now reckon with Moab because they have been secure, and have trusted in their wealth and strength, in their works and in their treasures, v. 7. They trusted in the abundance of their riches and strengthened themselves in their wickedness, Ps. lii. 7. They had been long undisturbed: Moab has been at ease from his youth. It was an ancient kingdom before Israel was, and had enjoyed great tranquillity, though a small country. He has not been unsettled, nor gone into captivity, and yet Moab is a wicked idolatrous nation, and one of the confederates against God's hidden ones, Ps. lxxxiii. 3, 6. They had been long corrupt and unreformed: He has settled on his lees; he has been secure and sensual in his prosperity. His taste remained in him, and his scent is not changed; he is still the same, as bad as ever he was.

Verses 14–47

The destruction is here further prophesied in moving language, designed not only to awaken them by a national repentance to prevent the trouble, or by a personal repentance to prepare for it, but to affect us with the calamitous state of human life, and with the power of God's anger with a provoking people.

I. It is a surprising destruction, and very sudden, that is here threatened. They thought themselves strong for war and able to deal with the most powerful enemy (v. 14), and yet the calamity is near, and he is not able to keep it off. As an eagle flies upon his prey, he shall spread his wings, the wings of his army, over Moab; that none may escape. The strongholds of Moab are taken by surprise (v. 41), so that all their strength stood them in no stead. It requires more than ordinary courage not to be afraid of sudden fear.

II. It lays Moab all in ruins: Moab is spoiled (v. 15), quite spoiled, is confounded and broken down (v. 20). The kingdom is deprived of its dignity and authority: The horn of Moab is cut off, the horn of its strength and power, both offensive and defensive; his arm is broken, that he can neither give a blow nor prevent a blow, v. 25. The youth of the kingdom went down to the battle promising themselves that they should return victorious; but God told them that they went down to the slaughter. Those that are enemies to God's people will soon be made no people.

III. It is a lamentable destruction and will turn joy into heaviness. The prophet does himself lament it. His very heart shall mourn for them (v. 31); he will weep for the vine of Sibmah (v. 32); his heart shall sound like pipes for Moab, v. 36. The ruin of sinners is no pleasure to God, and therefore should be a pain to us. These passages, and many others in this chapter, are much the same as Isaiah's in his prophecies against Moab (Isa. xv. 1); for, though there was a long distance of time between that prophecy and this, yet they were both dictated by one and the same Spirit. Moabites themselves shall lament. Those that sat in glory, in the midst of wealth, and mirth, shall sit in thirst, in a dry land, where no water, no comfort is, v. 18. The Moabites in the remote corners of the country, will ask everyone that escapes, What is done? v. 19. And when they are told that all is gone, they will howl and cry, in anguish of spirit (v. 20). They will leave the cities and dwell in the rock, where they may have their fill of melancholy; they shall no more be singing birds, but mourning birds, like the dove (v. 28), the doves of the valley, Ezek. vii. 16. That which Moab used to rejoice in was their pleasant fruits and the abundance of their rich wines. The delights of sense were all the matter of their joy. Take away these, destroy their gardens and vineyards, and you make all their mirth to cease, Hos. ii. 11, 12. Take joy and gladness from the plentiful field, and you take it from the land of Moab, v. 33. Those who make the delights of sense their chief joy, since these are things they may easily be deprived of in a little time, subject themselves to the tyranny of the greatest grief; whereas those who rejoice in God may do that even when the fig-tree does not blossom and there is no fruit in the vine. All their neighbours are called to mourn with them, and to condole with them on their ruin (v. 17): All you that are about him bemoan him. Let none be puffed up with or put confidence in their strength or beauty, for neither will be a security against the judgments of God.

IV. It is a shameful destruction and such as shall expose them to contempt: Moab is made drunk (v. 26).

V. It is the destruction of that which is dear to them, not only of their summer fruits and their vintage, but of their wealth (v. 36): The riches that he has gotten have perished. Riches, like dust, slip through our fingers even when we hold them fast. Yet this is not the worst; even those whose religion was false were fond of it above anything, and therefore, though it was really a promise, yet to them it was a threatening (v. 35), that God will cause to cease him that offers in the high places, for the high places shall be destroyed, and the fields of offerings shall be laid waste, and the priests themselves, who burnt incense to their gods, shall be slain or carried into captivity, v. 7.

VI. It is a just destruction which they have deserved and brought upon themselves by sin.

1. The sin which they had been most notoriously guilty of, was pride. It is mentioned six times, v. 29. We have all heard of the pride of Moab. It was charged upon them, Isa. xvi. 6, but here it is expressed more largely than there. Two instances are here given of the pride of Moab: (1) He had conducted himself insolently towards God. He must be brought down with shame (v. 26), for he has magnified himself against the Lord. The Moabites preferred Chemosh before Jehovah, and thought themselves a match for the God of Israel. (2) He had conducted himself scornfully towards Israel, in their late troubles; therefore Moab shall fall into the same troubles, and be a derision, for Israel was a derision to him, v. 26, 27. But the Moabites industriously proclaimed their joy, triumphing over every Israelite they met with in distress and laughing at him.

2. Besides this they had been guilty of malice against God's people, and treachery in their dealings with them, v. 30. The nation, whose fall they triumph in, shall recover itself. What was said of sinners in general (Isa. xxiv. 17, 18), that those who flee from the fear shall fall into the pit and those who come up out of the pit shall be taken in the snare, is here particularly foretold concerning the sinners of Moab

(v. 44). The figurative expressions used v. 44 are explained in one instance (v. 45): Those that fled out of the villages for fear of the enemy's forces put themselves under the shadow of Heshbon, stood there, and supposed they stood safely, as now armies sometimes retire under the cannon of a fortified city, but here they should be disappointed, for, when they flee out of the pit, they fall into the snare; Heshbon, which they thought would shelter them, devours them as Moses had foretold long since (Num. xxi. 28). The chapter concludes with a short promise of their return out of captivity in the latter days. God, who brings them into captivity, will bring again their captivity, v. 47. Thus tenderly does God deal with Moabites, much more with his own people! Even with Moabites he will not contend for ever, nor be always wrath. This prophecy concerning Moab is long, but here it ends; it ends comfortably: Thus far is the judgment of Moab.

CHAP. XLIX

The cup of trembling still goes round, and the nations must all drink of it, ch. xxv. 15. This chapter puts it into the hands, I. Of the Ammonites, ver. 1–6. II. Of the Edomites, ver. 7–22. III. Of the Syrians, ver. 23–27. IV. Of the Kedarenes, and the kingdoms of Hazor, ver. 28–33. V. Of the Elamites, ver. 34–39.

Verses 1–6

The Ammonites were next, both in kindred and neighbourhood, to the Moabites. 1. An action is here brought, in God's name, against the Ammonites, for an illegal encroachment upon the rightful possessions of the tribe of Gad, that lay next them, v. 1. Those territories upon the carrying away of the Gileadites, by the king of Assyria (2 Kings xv. 29, 1 Chron. v. 26), were left almost dispeopled, and an easy prey to the next invader. "Are there no Gadites left, to whom the right of inheritance belongs? Or, if there were not, are there no Israelites, none left of Judah, that are nearer akin to them than you are?" Why then does their king, as if he were entitled to the forfeited estates, or Milcom, their idol, as if he had the right to dispose of it to his worshippers, inherit Gad, and his people dwell in the cities which fell by lot to that tribe of God's people? They magnified themselves against their border and boasted it was their own, Zeph. ii. 8. Those will find themselves mistaken who think everything their own which they can lay their hands on. As there is justice owing to owners, so also to their heirs, whom it is a great sin to defraud, though they either know not their right or know not how to come at it. 2. Judgment is here given against them for this violence. God will cause an alarm of war to be heard, even in Rabbah, their capital city and a very strong one, v. 2. Their cities shall be laid in ruins. Their country, which they were so proud of, shall be wasted (v. 4). They are charged with backsliding, for they were the posterity of righteous Lot. They were untoward and refractory (so some read it); and, when they had forsaken their God, they gloried in their valleys. These they had violently taken away from Israel. They gloried in the strength of their valleys, so surrounded with mountains that they were inaccessible, gloried in the products of them. They flattered themselves that they should never be disturbed in the enjoyment of them: To-morrow shall be as this day; therefore they set God and his judgments at defiance. Their king and his princes, and Milcom, their god, and his priests, shall go into captivity (v. 3), and every man shall be driven out right forth, shall make the best of it in his flight (v. 5). And, to complete their misery, none shall gather up him that wanders, none shall open their doors to them. Then the country of the Ammonites shall fall into the hands of the remaining Israelites (v. 2). 3. Yet there is a prospect given them of mercy hereafter (v. 6), as before to Moab.

Verses 7–22

The Edomites come next to receive their doom from God, by the mouth of Jeremiah: they also were old enemies to the Israel of God. Many of the expressions used in this prophecy concerning Edom are borrowed from the prophecy of Obadiah, which is concerning Edom; for, all the prophets are inspired by one and the same Spirit.

I. That the country of Edom should be all wasted and made desolate, that the calamity of Esau should be brought upon him, the calamity he has deserved, for his old sins, v. 8. The time is at hand when God will visit him, and call him to an account, and then they shall flee from the sword, turn back from the battle, and dwell deep in caverns, where they shall hide. All they have shall be carried off by the conqueror; those that destroy them shall never be satiated (v. 9, 10); they shall make Esau quite bare, shall strip the Edomites of all they have. His brethren the Moabites, and his neighbours the Philistines, whom he might have expected succours from, or at least shelter, are spoiled as well as he. The Chaldee makes these to be the words of God to his people, distinguishing them from the Edomites in this calamity; and they read it, "But you, O house of Israel! you shall not leave your orphans; I will secure them, and let your widows rest on my word. Whatever becomes of the widows and fatherless of the Edomites, I will take care of yours." They had made a mighty figure, but God will make them small among the heathen; and those that despised God's people shall themselves be despised among men (v. 15, Obad. 2). Edom shall be such a desolation that none shall care for coming near the ruins of it, no man shall abide there (v. 18).

II. That the instruments of this destruction should be very resolute and formidable. God has determined that Edom shall be laid waste, and then he that is to be employed in wasting it shall come swiftly and strongly. Nebuchadnezzar is he of whom it is here foretold. He shall come up like a lion, with fierceness and fury, like a lion enraged by the swelling of Jordan overflowing his banks, which forces him out of his covert by the water-side into the higher grounds, v. 19. Even the least of the flock shall draw them out (v. 20); the meanest servant in Nebuchadnezzar's retinue shall draw them out for the slaughter, shall force them to surrender. Nebuchadnezzar shall come, not only like a lion, the king of beasts, but like an eagle, the king of birds (v. 22): He shall fly as the eagle upon his prey, so swiftly, so strongly, and immediately the hearts of the mighty men shall fail them, for they shall see he is an enemy that it is in vain to struggle with.

III. That the Edomites' confidences should all fail them in the day of their distress. 1. They trusted to their wisdom, but that shall stand them in no stead. This is the first thing fastened upon in this prophecy against Edom, v. 7. That nation used to be famous for wisdom, and their statesmen were thought to excel in politics; and yet now they shall take such wrong measures, and be so baffled in all their designs, that people shall ask, with wonder, What is the matter with the Edomites? Is wisdom no more in Teman? It is so, when God is designing the ruin of a people; for whom he will destroy he infatuates. See Job xii. 20. Has their wisdom vanished? Is it tired? (so some); is it worn out? (so others); has it become useless? (so others). 2. They trusted to their strength, but neither shall that avail them, v. 16. They had been a terror to all their neighbours, because no neighbouring nation durst meddle with them, they thought no nation in the world durst. Their country was mountainous, having many passes, which they thought themselves able to make good against any invader. See Obad. 3, 4, 8.

IV. That their destruction should be inevitable. 1. God hath determined it (v. 12); (v. 13), he hath sworn it, that they shall drink the cup of trembling, which is put into the hands of all their neighbours. 2. All the world shall take notice of it (v. 21): The earth is moved, and all the nations are put into a concern, at the noise of their fall. The noise of the outcry is heard to the Red Sea, which flowed upon the coasts of Edom. It shall be heard among the ships that lie in the Red Sea to take in lading (1 Kings ix. 26).

Verses 23–27

The kingdom of Syria, north of Canaan, had been often vexatious to the Israel of God. Damascus was the metropolis of that kingdom. Hamath and Arpad, two other considerable cities, are named (v. 23), and the palaces of Ben-hadad, which he built, are particularly marked for ruin, v. 27; see also Amos i. 4. The judgment of Damascus begins with fright and faint-heartedness. They hear evil tidings, that the king of Babylon, with all his force, is coming against them, and they are confounded; their souls are melted, they are faint-hearted, they are like the troubled sea, that cannot be quiet (Isa. lvii. 20), or like men in a storm at sea (Ps. cvii. 26); or the sorrow that begins in the city shall go to the sea-coast, v. 23. Damascus now waxes feeble (v. 24), and owns it is to no more purpose to think of contending with her fate than for a woman in labour to contend with her pains, which she cannot escape. It was a city of praise (v. 25), not praise to God, but to herself, a city much admired by all strangers that visited it. It was a city of joy. But now it is all overwhelmed with fear and grief. It ends with a terrible fall and fire. The inhabitants are slain (v. 26): The young men, who should defend the city, shall fall by the sword in her streets; and all the men of war shall be cut off. The city is laid in ashes (v. 27): The fire is kindled by the besiegers in the wall, but it shall devour the palaces of Ben-hadad particularly, where so much mischief had formerly been hatched against God's Israel.

Verses 28–33

These verses foretell the desolation that Nebuchadnezzar and his forces should make among the people of Kedar (who descended from Kedar the son of Ishmael, and inhabited a part of Arabia the Stony), and of Hazor, who perhaps were originally Canaanites, of the kingdom of Hazor, in the north of Canaan, which had Jabin for its king, but, being driven thence, settled in the deserts of Arabia. They dwelt in tents and had no walls, but curtains (v. 29), no fortified cities; they had neither gates nor bars, v. 31. They were shepherds, and had no treasures, no money, but flocks and camels. They had no soldiers among them, for they were in no fear of invaders for they dwelt alone, v. 31. Though they had no trade, no treasures, yet they are here said to be a wealthy nation (v. 31). Those are truly rich who have enough to supply their necessities, and know when they have enough. We need not go to the treasures of kings and provinces, or to the cash of merchants, to look for wealthy people; they may be found among shepherds that dwell in tents. The king of Babylon resolves it shall never be said that he, who had conquered so many strong cities, will leave those unconquered that dwell in tents. It was strange that that eagle should stoop to catch these flies. These people had lived inoffensively among their neighbours. God said (v. 28): Arise, go up to Kedar, and spoil the men of the east. God orders it for the correcting of an unthankful people. The amazement that this put them into, and the desolation hereby made among them: They shall cry unto them; those on the borders shall send the alarm into all parts of the country, which shall be put into the utmost confusion by it; they shall cry, "Fear is on every side—We are surrounded by the enemy." They shall none of them have any heart to make resistance. The enemy need not strike a stroke; they shall shout them out of their tents, v. 29. There are fears on every side when there are foes on every side. The Chaldeans shall take to themselves their curtains and vessels; though they are but plain and coarse, yet they shall spoil for spoiling sake. They shall carry away their tents and their flocks, v. 29. Their camels shall be a booty to those that came for nothing else, v. 32. It is not said that any of them shall be slain, for they attempt not to make any resistance and their tents and flocks are accepted as a ransom for their lives; but they shall be dislodged and dispersed. Their country shall lie uninhabited; remote and having neither cities nor lands inviting to strangers, none shall care to succeed them, so that Hazor shall be a desolation for ever, v. 33.

Verses 34–39

This prophecy is dated in the beginning of Zedekiah's reign. The Elamites were the Persians, descended from Elam the son of Shem (Gen. x. 22); yet some think it was only that part of Persia which lay nearest to the Jews which, say they, had acted against God's Israel, bore the quiver in an expedition against them (Isa. xxii. 6), and therefore must be reckoned with among the rest. It is here foretold, in general, that God will bring evil upon them, even his fierce anger, v. 37. Their forces shall be disabled. The Elamites were famous archers, but, Behold, I will break the bow of Elam (v. 35), will ruin their artillery, and then the chief of their might is gone. God often orders it so that that which we most trust to first fails us, and that which was the chief of our might proves the least of our help. Their people shall be dispersed. There shall come enemies against them from all parts and they shall all carry some of them away captive into their respective countries, v. 36. The four winds shall be brought upon them; the storm shall come sometimes from one point and sometimes from another. Their princes shall be destroyed and the government quite changed (v. 38): I will set my throne in Elam. The throne of Nebuchadnezzar shall be set there, or the throne of Cyrus, who began his conquests with Elymais. Or it may be meant of the throne on which God sits for judgment. The king of Elam was famous of old, Gen. xiv. 1. Chedorlaomer was king of Elam, and a mighty man he was in his day; his successors, we may suppose, made a great figure; but the king of Elam is no more to God than another man. Yet the destruction of Elam shall not be perpetual (v. 39): In the latter days I will bring again the captivity of Elam. When Cyrus had destroyed Babylon, brought the empire into the hands of the Persians, the Elamites no doubt returned in triumph, and settled again in their own country. But this promise was to have its full accomplishment in the days of the Messiah, when we find Elamites among those who, when the Holy Ghost was given, heard spoken in their own tongues the wonderful works of God (Acts ii. 9, 11), and that is the most desirable return of the captivity.

CHAP. L

In this chapter, and that which follows, we have the judgment of Babylon, which is put last of Jeremiah's prophecies against the Gentiles because it was last accomplished. Babylon was employed as the rod in God's hand for the chastising of all the other nations, and now at length that rod shall be thrown into the fire. The destruction of Babylon by Cyrus was foretold by Isaiah, and now again, when it has come to its height, by Jeremiah; for, though at this time he saw that kingdom flourishing "like a green bay-tree," yet at the same time he foresaw it withered and cut down. And as Isaiah's prophecies of the destruction of Babylon and the deliverance of Israel seem designed to typify the evangelical triumphs of all believers over the powers o darkness, and the great salvation wrought out by our Lord Jesus Christ, so Jeremiah's prophecies of the same events seem designed to point at the apocalyptic triumphs of the gospel church over the New Testament Babylon. The kingdom of Babylon being much larger and stronger than any other of the kingdoms here prophesied against, its fall was the more considerable in itself; and what was foretold in general often before (ch. xxv. 12 and xxvii. 7) is here more particularly described, and with a great deal of prophetic heat as well as light. Babylon was destroyed to make way for the turning again of the captivity of God's people. Here is, I. The ruin of Babylon, ver. 1–3, and again ver. 9–16, and again ver. 21–22, and again ver. 35–46. II. The redemption of God's people, ver. 4–8, and again ver. 17–20, and again ver. 33, 34.

Verses 1–8

I. Here is a word spoken against Babylon. The king of Babylon had been very kind to Jeremiah, and yet he must foretell the ruin of that kingdom; for God's prophets must not be governed by favour or affection. Whoever are our friends, if, notwithstanding, they are God's enemies, we dare not speak peace to them. 1. The destruction of Babylon is here spoken of as a thing done, v. 2. 2. It is spoken of as a thing done thoroughly. The very idols of Babylon, which the people would protect with all possible care, shall be destroyed. Bel and Merodach their two principal deities shall be confounded, and the images of them broken to pieces. The country shall be laid waste (v. 3) out of the north, from Media, which lay north of Babylon, and from Assyria, through which Cyrus made his descent upon Babylon; thence the nation shall come that shall make her land desolate.

II. Here is a word spoken for the people of God for their comfort, both the children of Israel and of Judah.

1. It is promised that they shall return to their God first and then to their own land; and the promise of their conversion and reformation is that which makes way for all the other promises, v. 4, 5. They shall lament after the Lord as the whole house of Israel did in Samuel's time (1 Sam. vii. 2); they shall go weeping. These tears flow from godly sorrow; they are tears of repentance for sin, tears of joy for the goodness of God, in the dawning of the day of their deliverance. That prevails to lead them to repentance when captivity did not prevail to drive them to it. They shall enquire after the Lord; they shall not sink under their sorrows, but shall go weeping to seek the Lord their God. They shall seek the Lord as their God, and shall now have no more to do with idols. They shall think of returning to their own country again; they shall think of it not only as a mercy, but as a duty (v. 5): They shall ask the way to Zion with their faces thitherward. The journey is long and they know not the road, but they will ask the way. This represents the return of poor souls to God. In all true converts there are both a sincere desire to attain the end and a constant care to keep in the way. They shall renew their covenant to walk with God more closely for the future: Come, and let us join ourselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant.

2. Their present case is lamented as very sad, and as having been long so: "My people have been lost sheep (v. 6); they have gone from mountain to hill, and could find no pasture; they have forgotten their resting-place in their own country and cannot find their way to it." They were led astray by their own shepherds, their own princes and priests; they turned them from their duty, and so provoked God to turn them out of their own land. It is with them as with wandering sheep, all that found them have devoured them and made a prey of them; they laughed at them, telling them it was what their own prophets had many a time told them they deserved. They had put a contempt upon the temple and upon the tradition of their ancestors, and therefore deserved to suffer these hard things.

3. They are called upon to hasten away, as soon as ever the door of liberty was opened to them (v. 8): "Remove, not only out of the borders, but out of the midst of Babylon; hasten to Zion, and be as the he-goats before the flocks; strive which shall be foremost, which shall lead in so good a work."

Verses 9–20

God is here by his prophet proceeding in his controversy with Babylon.

I. The commission and charge given to the instruments that were to be employed in destroying Babylon. The army that is to do it is called an assembly of great nations (v. 9), the Medes and Persians, and all their allies and auxiliaries. God will raise them up to do it, and fit them for this service, and then he will cause them to come up, to put themselves in array against Babylon (v. 14). God shall bid them shoot at her and spare no arrows (v. 14). When God gives commission he will give success. They are bidden not only to shoot at her (v. 14), but to shout against her (v. 15) with a triumphant shout, as those that are already sure of victory.

II. The desolation and destruction that shall be brought upon Babylon is set forth in a great variety of expressions. 1. The wealth of Babylon shall be a rich and easy prey to the conquerors (v. 10). 2. The country of Babylon shall be depopulated and lie uninhabited (v. 13). 3. Their ancestors shall be ashamed of their cowardice, in fleeing from the first onset (v. 12), or, Your mother, Babylon itself, the mother-city, shall be confounded, when she sees herself deserted. 4. The great admirers of Babylon shall see it rendered despicable: the very tail of the nations, shall it be, a wilderness, a dry land, a desert, v. 12. 5. The great city, the head of it, shall be quite ruined. It is the vengeance of the Lord, which nothing can contend with either in law or battle. 6. There shall not be left in Babylon so much as the poor of the land, for vine-dressers and husbandmen (v. 16). Harvest shall come, and there shall be no reapers; seed-time shall come, but there shall be no sower.

III. The cause of this destruction. It comes from God's displeasure; it is because of the wrath of the Lord that Babylon shall be wholly desolate (v. 13), and his wrath is righteous, for (v. 14) she hath sinned against the Lord, therefore spare no arrows. What they did against Jerusalem they did with pleasure (v. 11): You were glad, you rejoiced. When Titus Vespasian destroyed Jerusalem he wept over it, but these Chaldeans triumphed over it. The spoils of Jerusalem they made use of to feed their own luxury. Those that have thus swallowed riches must vomit them up again. Therefore they have given their hand (v. 15). They aimed at nothing less than the utter ruin of God's Israel: Israel is a scattered sheep, as before (v. 6), that is not only barked at and worried by dogs, but even lions have roared and driven him away, v. 17. One king of Assyria carried the ten tribes away and devoured them; another invaded Judah, and impoverished it, tore the fleece and flesh of this poor sheep; and now at last this Nebuchadnezzar has fallen upon him and broken his bones, and therefore the king of Babylon must be punished as the king of Assyria was, v. 18.

IV. The mercy promised to the Israel of God. They shall be released out of their bondage, and brought again to their own habitation as sheep that were scattered to their own fold, v. 19. He will restore their prosperity; they shall not only live, but live comfortably, in their own land again; they shall feed upon Carmel and Bashan, the richest and most fruitful parts of the country. They enquired the way to Zion (v. 5), where God was to be served and worshipped. This was what they chiefly aimed at in their return; but God will bring them to Carmel and Bashan, where they shall abundantly feed themselves. God will pardon their iniquity; this is the root of all the rest (v. 20): In these days the iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, and there shall be none. Not only the punishments of their iniquity shall be taken off, but the offence which it gave to God shall be forgotten, and he will be reconciled to them. This denotes how fully God forgives sin; he remembers it no more. This may include also a thorough reformation of hearts and lives, as well as a full remission of sins. Those whose sins God pardons he reserves for something very great; for whom he justifies, them he glorifies.

Verses 21–32

1. The forces are mustered and commissioned to destroy Babylon. The forces of Cyrus are called to go up against Babylon (v. 21), to come against her from the utmost border. Let all come together, for there will be both work and pay enough for them all, v. 26. The archers particularly must be called together against Babylon, v. 29. Thus the Lord hath opened his armoury (v. 25), his treasury (so the word is), and hath brought forth the weapons of his indignation. Media and Persia are now God's armoury; thence he fetches the weapons of his wrath, Cyrus and his officers and armies. 2. Instructions are given them what to do, v. 21. They must open her store-houses (v. 26), rifle her treasures, cast her up as heaps. Their princes and great men shall fall by the sword, not as men of war in the field of battle, but as beasts (v. 27). 3. Assurances are given them of success. Let them do what God commands, and they shall accomplish what he threatens. Cyrus shall no doubt prevail, for he fights under God. 4. Reasons are given for these severe dealings with Babylon. (1) Babylon has been very troublesome, vexatious, and injurious, to all its neighbours; it has been the hammer of the whole earth (v. 23). He that is the God of nations will sooner or later assert the injured rights of nations against those that unjustly and violently invade them. (2) Babylon has bidden defiance to God himself: Thou hast striven against the Lord (v. 24), hast joined issue with him (so the word signifies) as in law or battle, hast openly opposed him, therefore thou art now found, and caught, as in a snare. (3) Babylon ruined Jerusalem, the holy city, and the holy house there, v. 28. The burning of the temple, and the carrying away of its vessels, were articles in the charge against Babylon on which greater stress was laid than upon its being the hammer of the whole earth; for Zion was the joy and glory of the whole earth. (4) Babylon has been haughty and insolent, and therefore must have a fall, Job. xl. 12. They shall fall not so much by others thrusting them down as by their own stumbling; for they hold their heads so high that they never look under their feet.

Verses 33–46

I. Israel's sufferings, and their deliverance out of those sufferings. Israel and Judah were oppressed together, v. 33. Those that remained of the captives of the ten tribes, upon the uniting of the kingdoms of Assyria and Chaldea, seem to have come and mingled with those of the two tribes, so that they were oppressed together. This is their comfort in distress, that, though they are weak, their Redeemer is strong (v. 34), their Avenger (so the word signifies). The Lord of hosts is his name, and he will answer to his name, and will be that to them for which they depend upon him. He shall thoroughly plead their cause that he may give rest to the land, to his people's land, rest from all their enemies round about. This is applicable to all believers, who complain of the dominion of sin and corruption, and of their own weakness. Let them know that their Redeemer is strong; he is able to keep what they commit to him. Sin shall not have dominion over them; he will make them free, and they shall be free indeed; he will give them rest, that rest which remains for the people of God.

II. Babylon's sin, and their punishment for that sin.

1. The sins they are charged with are idolatry and persecution. (1) They oppressed the people of God; they held them fast, and would not let them go. They opened not the house of his prisoners, Isa. xiv. 17. (2) They wronged God himself, and robbed him, giving that glory to others which is due to him alone; for (v. 38) it is the land of graven images. The word here used for idols properly signifies terrors—Enim, the name given to giants that were formidable, because they made the images of their gods to look frightful, to strike terror upon fools and children. Babylon was the mother of harlots (Rev. xvii. 5), the source of idolatry.

2. The judgments of God upon them for these sins are such as will ruin them.

(1) All that should be their defence and support shall be cut off by the sword. The Chaldeans had long been God's sword, wherewith he had done execution upon the sinful nations round about: but now, they being as bad as any of them, or worse, a sword is brought upon them (v. 35), a sword of war; and in God's hand a sword of justice. It shall be Upon their princes and their wise men. Their philosophers, their statesmen, and privy-counsellors; their learning and policy shall neither secure them nor stand the public in any stead. Their soothsayers and astrologers, here called the liars (v. 36), for they cheated with their prognostications of peace and prosperity, shall talk like fools, and be as men that have lost all their wits. Their mighty men shall be dismayed, and shall be no longer mighty men. The sword shall be upon their horses and chariots; the invaders shall seize their horses and chariots. The troops of other nations that were in their service shall be disheartened: The mingled people shall become as weak and timorous as women. The sword shall be upon her treasures, which are the sinews of war, and they shall be robbed, and made use of by the enemy against them.

(2) The country shall be made desolate (v. 38): The waters shall be dried up, the water that secures the city. Cyrus drew the river Euphrates into so many channels as made it passable for his army, so that they got with ease to the walls of Babylon, which, it was thought, that river had rendered inaccessible. The water likewise that made the country fruitful shall be dried up, v. 39. This was foretold concerning Babylon, Isa. xiii. 19–22.

(3) The king and kingdom shall be put into the utmost confusion and consternation by the enemies' invading them, v. 41–43. Those who have dealt cruelly, and have shown no mercy, may expect to be cruelly dealt with, and to find no mercy.

(4) They shall be as much hurt as frightened, for the invader shall come up like a lion to tear and destroy (v. 44) and shall make them and their habitation desolate (v. 45), and the desolation shall be so astonishing that all the nations about shall be terrified by it, v. 46. These three verses we had before (ch. xlix. 19–21) in the prophecy of the destruction of Edom, which was accomplished by the Chaldeans, and they are here repeated in the prophecy of the destruction of Babylon, which was to be accomplished upon the Chaldeans.

CHAP. LI

This prophet, in this chapter, goes on with the prediction of Babylon's fall, to which other prophets also bore witness. Here is, I. The record of Babylon's doom, with the particulars of many aggravations of her fall, and great encouragements given thence to the Israel of God, that suffered such hard things by her, ver. 1–58. II. The representation and ratification of this by the throwing of a copy of this prophecy into the river Euphrates, ver. 59–64.

Verses 1–58

I. An acknowledgment of the great pomp and power that Babylon had been in and the use that God in his providence had made of it (v. 7): Babylon hath been a golden cup, a rich and glorious empire, a golden city (Isa. xiv. 4), a head of gold (Dan. ii. 38), a golden cup in the Lord's hand; he had made the earth drunk with this cup; some were intoxicated with her pleasures, others intoxicated with her terrors and destroyed by her. In both senses the New Testament Babylon is said to have made the kings of the earth drunk, Rev. xvii. 2; xviii. 3. Babylon had also been God's battle-axe; it was so at this time, when Jeremiah prophesied, v. 20. The forces of Babylon were God's weapons of war, tools in his hand, with which he broke in pieces nations and kingdoms,—horses and chariots, which are so much the strength of kingdoms (v. 21),—man and woman, young and old, with which kingdoms are replenished (v. 22),—the shepherd and his flock, the husbandman and his oxen, with which kingdoms are maintained and supplied, v. 23. Such havoc as this the Chaldeans had made when God employed them as instruments of his wrath for the chastising of the nations; and yet now Babylon itself must fall.

II. A charge drawn up against her by the Israel of God. 1. She is complained of for her incorrigible wickedness (v. 9). The people of God that were captives among the Babylonians endeavoured (Jer. x. 11), to convince them of the folly of their idolatry, but they could not do it. Yet some understand this as spoken by the forces they had hired for their assistance, declaring that they had done their best to save her from ruin, but that it was all to no purpose, and therefore they might as well go home to their respective countries; "for her judgment reaches unto heaven, and it is in vain to withstand it or think to avert it." 2. She is complained of for her inveterate malice against Israel. Other nations had been hardly used by the Chaldeans, but Israel only complains to God of it, and with confidence appeals to him (v. 34, 35). Zion and Jerusalem shall say, "Let the violence done to me and my children, that are my own flesh, and pieces of myself, and all the blood of my people, which they have shed like water, be upon them; let the guilt of it lie upon them, and let it be required at their hands."

III. Judgment given upon this appeal by the righteous Judge of heaven and earth, on behalf of Israel against Babylon. He answers (v. 36): "I will plead thy cause. Leave it with me; I will in due time plead it effectually and take vengeance for thee, and every drop of Jerusalem's blood shall be accounted for with interest." God deals better with Israel than they deserve, and, notwithstanding their iniquities and his severities, Israel is not forsaken. God is his God still, and will act for him as the Lord of hosts, a God of power. The Lord God of recompences, the God to whom vengeance belongs, will surely requite (v. 56), will pay them home; he will render unto Babylon all the evil they have done in Zion (v. 24). Cyrus shall measure to the Chaldeans the same that they measured to the Jews. Zion's children shall triumph (v. 10): The Lord has brought forth our righteousness; he has appeared in our behalf against those that dealt unjustly with us, and has given us redress. Let it therefore be spoken of to his praise: Come and let us declare in Zion the work of the Lord our God, that others may be invited to join with us in praising him.

IV. A declaration of the sovereignty of God who espouses Zion's cause and undertakes to reckon with this proud and potent enemy, v. 14. He will fill Babylon with vast numbers of the enemy's forces, will fill it with men as with caterpillars, that shall overpower it. But who is he that can break so powerful a kingdom as Babylon? The prophet gives an account of him from the description he had formerly given (Jer. x. 12–16), and it is here repeated to show that God will convince those by his judgments who would not be convinced by his word that he is God over all. 1. He is the God that made the world (v. 15). 2. He has the command of all the creatures that he has made (v. 16); his providence is a continued creation. 3. The idols that oppose the accomplishment of his word are a mere sham and their worshippers brutish people, v. 17, 18. But between the God of Israel and these gods of the heathen there is no comparison (v. 19): The portion of Jacob is not like them; the God who speaks this and will do it is the former of all things and the Lord of all hosts, and there is a near relation between him and his people, for he is their portion and they are his.

V. A description of the instruments that are to be employed in this service. God has raised up the spirit of the kings of the Medes (v. 11), Darius and Cyrus, who come against Babylon by a divine instinct; for God's device is against Babylon to destroy it. Those whom God employs against Babylon are compared (v. 1) to a destroying wind, which either by its coldness blasts the fruits of the earth or by its fierceness blows down all before it. This wind is brought out of God's treasuries (v. 16), raised up against those that dwell in the midst of the Chaldeans, those of other nations that are incorporated with them. These enemies are compared to fanners (v. 2), who shall drive them away as chaff is driven away by the fan. The Chaldeans had been fanners to winnow God's people (ch. xv. 7).

VI. An ample commission given them to lay all waste. Let them bend their bow against the archers of the Chaldeans (v. 3). Let all necessary preparations be made. This they are called to, v. 27, 28. Let a standard be set up, under which to enlist soldiers, let a trumpet be blown to call men together to it, let the nations, out of which Cyrus's army is to be raised, prepare their recruits. Let the kingdoms of Ararat, and Minni, and Ashkenaz, of Armenia, both the higher and the lower, and of Ascania, about Phrygia and Bithynia, send in their quota of men for his service; let them lay the country waste, as caterpillars do (Joel i. 4).

VII. The weakness of the Chaldeans, and their inability to make head against this threatening force. They are called upon here to prepare for action, but it is ironical (v. 11): Make bright the arrows, which have grown rusty through disuse; gather the shields, which in a long time of peace and security have been scattered and thrown out of the way (v. 12); set up the standard upon the walls of Babylon. But they shall have no heart to come at the call, v. 29. The mighty men of Babylon have forborne to fight, v. 30. God having taken away their strength and spirit, they have remained in their holds, so that the enemy has, without any resistance, burnt her dwelling-places and broken her bars. It is to the same purport with v. 56–58. When the spoiler comes upon Babylon her mighty men are immediately taken, everyone of their bows is broken. Their politics fail them. Their princes and captains, who sit in council as men intoxicated through stupidity or despair. The walls of their city fail them, v. 58. When the enemy had found ways to ford Euphrates, which was thought impassable, yet surely, think they, the walls are impregnable, they are the broad walls of Babylon. Some say that there was a threefold wall about the inner city and the like about the outer, and yet these shall be utterly broken, and the high gates and towers shall be burnt.

VIII. It is a certain destruction; a divine power is engaged against it, which cannot be resisted (v. 8), though when Jeremiah prophesied this, and many a year after, it was in the height of its power and greatness. It is a righteous destruction. Babylon has made herself meet for it, and therefore cannot fail to meet with it. For (v. 25) Babylon has been a destroying mountain, destroying all the earth, as the stones that are tumbled from high mountains spoil the grounds about them; but now it shall itself be rolled down from its rocks. Again (v. 33), "Babylon is like a threshing-floor, in which the people of God have been long threshed; but now the time has come that she shall herself be threshed. Babylon seems to be well-fenced and fortified against it: She dwells upon many waters (v. 13); the march of an enemy into it is so embarrassed by rivers. Babylon is abundant in treasures; and yet "thy end has come, and neither thy waters nor thy wealth shall secure thee. A rumour will come one year that Cyrus is making vast preparations for war, and after that, in another year, shall come a rumour that his design is upon Babylon"; when he was a great way off they might have sent and desired conditions of peace; but they were too proud, and their hearts were hardened to their destruction. The king of Babylon was himself at such a distance from the place where the attack was made that it was a great while ere he had notice that the city was taken; so that those posted near the place sent one messenger after another, v. 31. They are to tell him that the enemy has seized the passes (v. 32), the forts or blockades upon the river, and that, having got over the river, he has set fire to the reeds on the river side, to alarm and terrify the city, so that all the men surrendered. The messengers come with these tidings, which are immediately confirmed by the enemies' being in the palace and slaying the king himself, Dan. v. 30. That profane feast which they were celebrating at the very time when the city was taken seems here to be referred to (v. 38, 39): They shall roar together like lions, as men in their revels do, when the wine has got into their heads. They have passed their cup round; now the cup of the Lord's right hand shall be turned unto them (Hab. ii. 15, 16); let them be as merry as they can with that bitter cup, for on that night, in the midst of the jollity, was Belshazzar slain. The strength of the enemy is here compared to an inundation of waters (v. 42): The sea has come up upon Babylon, which, when it has once broken through its bounds, there is no fence against, so that she is covered with the multitude of its waves, overpowered by a numerous army; her cities then become a desolation, an uninhabited uncultivated desert, v. 43. It is a destruction that shall reach the gods of Babylon, the idols and images. "In token that the whole land shall be confounded and all her slain shall fall, and that throughout all the country the wounded shall groan, I will do judgment upon her graven images," v. 47 and again v. 53. Though the invaders are themselves idolaters, yet they shall destroy the images and temples of the gods of Babylon. Bel was the principal idol that the Babylonians worshipped, and therefore that is by name here marked for destruction (v. 44): I will punish Bel, that image to which such abundance of sacrifices are offered. His altars shall be forsaken, none shall regard him any more, and so that idol shall fail them. Babylon shall become heaps (v. 37), no use shall be made even of the ruins (v. 26): They shall not take of thee a stone for a corner, nor a stone for foundations.

IX. Here is a call to God's people to go out of Babylon. It is their wisdom, when the ruin is approaching, to quit the city (v. 6): "Flee out of the midst of Babylon, that you may not be cut off in her iniquity." It is their wisdom to get out of the midst of Babylon, lest they be involved, if not in her ruins, yet in her fears (v. 45, 46). Those who have not grace enough to keep their temper in temptation should have wisdom enough to keep out of the way of temptation. They are told, v. 50, 51: "You Israelites, who have escaped the sword of the Chaldeans your oppressors, and of the Persians their destroyers, go away, stand not still; hasten to your own country, for this is not your rest, but Canaan is." The returning captives (v. 51), being reminded of Jerusalem, cry out, "We are confounded; we cannot bear the thought of it; shame covers our faces at the mention of it, for we have heard of the reproach of the sanctuary, that is profaned and ruined by strangers; how can we think of it with any pleasure?" To this he answers (v. 52) that the God of Israel will now triumph over the gods of Babylon, and so that reproach will be for ever rolled away.

X. The diversified feeling excited by Babylon's fall. 1. Some shall lament the destruction of Babylon. There is the sound of a cry from Babylon (v. 54), lamenting this great destruction, v. 55. They shall say in their lamentations (v. 41): "How is Sheshach taken, and how are we mistaken concerning her! How is that city become an astonishment among the nations that was the glory, and admiration of the whole earth!" 2. Yet some shall rejoice in Babylon's fall, not as the misery of their fellow-creatures, but as the manifestation of the righteous judgment of God and as it opens the way for the release of God's captives (v. 48).

Verses 59–64

1. A copy is taken of this prophecy, it should seem by Jeremiah himself, for Baruch his scribe is not mentioned here (v. 60): Jeremiah wrote in a book all these words that are here written against Babylon. 2. It is sent to Babylon, to the captives there, by the hand of Seraiah, who went there attendant on king Zedekiah, in the fourth year of his reign, v. 59. He went with Zedekiah, or (as the margin reads it) on the behalf of Zedekiah, into Babylon. The character given of him is that Seraiah was a quiet prince, a prince of rest. He was in honour, but not hot and heady, heading factions. He was of a calm temper, and studied the things that made for peace. Jeremiah might safely entrust such a man with his errand. It is the real honour of great men to be quiet men. 3. Seraiah is desired to read it to his countrymen that had already gone into captivity: "When thou shalt come to Babylon, and shalt see what a magnificent place it is, how large a city, how rich, and how well fortified, and shalt be tempted to think, Surely, it will stand for ever, then thou shalt read all these words to thyself and thy friends, for their encouragement in captivity: let them with an eye of faith see the end of these threatening powers." 4. He is directed to make a solemn protestation of the divine authority and certainty of that which he had read (v. 63). Though Seraiah sees Babylon flourishing, having read this prophecy he must foresee Babylon falling. When we see what this world is, how glittering its shows are and how flattering its proposals, let us read in the book of the Lord that its fashion passes away, and we shall learn to look upon it with a holy contempt. 5. He must then tie a stone to the book and throw it into the midst of the river Euphrates, as a confirming sign of the things contained in it, saying, "Thus shall Babylon sink, and not rise," v. 53, 64. In the sign it was the stone that sunk the book. But in the thing signified it was rather the book that sunk the stone; it was the divine sentence passed upon Babylon in this prophecy that sunk that city, which seemed as firm as a stone. The last words of the chapter seal up the vision and prophecy of this book: Thus far are the words of Jeremiah. This prophecy was dated in the fourth year of Zedekiah (v. 59), long before he finished his testimony; but it was to be last accomplished of all his prophecies against the Gentiles, ch. xlvi. 1. And the chapter which remains is purely historical, and, as some think, was added by some other hand.

CHAP. LII

History is the best expositor of prophecy; and therefore, for the better understanding of the prophecies which relate to the destruction of Jerusalem and the kingdom of Judah, we are here furnished with an account. It is much the same with the history 2 Kings xxiv and xxv, but the matter is here repeated to give light to the book of the Lamentations. I. The bad reign of Zedekiah, ver. 1–3. II. The besieging and taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, ver. 4–7. III. The severe usage which Zedekiah and the princes met with, ver. 8–11. IV. The destruction of the temple and the city, ver. 12–14. V. The captivity of the people (ver. 15, 16) and the numbers of those that were carried away into captivity, ver. 28–30. VI. The carrying off of the plunder of the temple, ver. 17–23. VII. The slaughter of the priests, and other great men, ver. 24–27. VIII. The better days which king Jehoiachin lived to see in the latter end of his time, after the death of Nebuchadnezzar, ver. 31–34.

Verses 1–11

This narrative begins in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah, though there were two captivities before, one in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, the other in the first of Jeconiah. 1. God's just displeasure against Judah and Jerusalem for their sin, v. 3. He determined to cast them out from his presence. He expelled them from that good land that had such tokens of his presence in providential bounty and that holy city and temple that had such tokens of his presence in covenant-grace and love. 2. Zedekiah's bad conduct and management for which God punished him. Zedekiah had arrived at years of discretion when he came to the throne; he was twenty-one years old (v. 1); he was not the worst of the kings (we never read of his idolatries), yet he did evil in the eyes of the Lord, for he did not do the good he should have done. But that evil deed of his which did hasten this destruction was his rebelling against the king of Babylon, which was both his sin and his folly, and brought ruin upon his people. God was greatly displeased with him for his perfidious dealing with the king of Babylon (Ezek. xvii. 15, &c.). 3. The Chaldeans gained Jerusalem, after eighteen months' siege. In remembrance of two steps towards their ruin, while they were in captivity, they kept a fast in the fourth month, and a fast in the tenth (Zech. viii. 19): that in the fifth month was in remembrance of the burning of the temple, and that in the seventh of the murder of Gedaliah. For a year and a half the city was besieged. Supplies of food were cut off. In spite of constant attacks, the garrison refused to surrender, but soon there was famine in the city (v. 6); no bread for the people of the land, and then no wonder that the city was broken up, v. 7. Walls, in such a case, will not hold out long without men, any more than men without walls; nor will both together stand people in any stead without God and his protection. 4. The king and his mighty men got out of the city by night (v. 7); but the king was overtaken by pursuers in the plains of Jericho, his guards were dispersed, and all his army was scattered from him, v. 8. 5. The doom passed upon Zedekiah by the king of Babylon. He treated him as a rebel, gave judgment upon him, v. 9. His sons were slain before his eyes, and all the princes of Judah (v. 10); then his eyes were put out, and he was bound in chains, carried in triumph to Babylon. He was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, wearing out the remainder of his life (I cannot say his days, for he saw day no more) in darkness and misery. Jeremiah had often told him what it would come to, but he would not take warning when he might have prevented it.

Verses 12–23

An account of the woeful havoc that was made by the Chaldean army, a month after the city was taken, under the command of Nebuzaradan, who was captain of the guard. 1. He laid the temple in ashes, having first plundered it of every thing that was valuable: He burnt the house of the Lord, that holy and beautiful house, where their fathers praised him, Isa. lxiv. 11. 2. He burnt the royal palace, probably that which Solomon built after he had built the temple, which was, ever since, the king's house. 3. He burnt all the houses of Jerusalem. 4. He broke down all the walls of Jerusalem, to be revenged upon them for standing in the way of his army so long. Thus, of a defenced city, it was made a ruin, Isa. xxv. 2. 5. He carried away many into captivity (v. 15); he took away certain of the poor of the people, that is, of the people in the city, for the poor of the land (the poor of the country) he left for vine-dressers and husbandmen. He also carried off the residue of the people that remained in the city, that had escaped the sword and famine, and the deserters. 6. The vessels which were still in the temple were looted. All that were of great value had been carried away before, the vessels of silver and gold, yet some remained, v. 19. But most of the temple-prey that was now seized was of brass, which being of less value, was carried off last. When the walls of the city were demolished, the pillars of the temple were pulled down, too, and both in token that God, who was the strength and stay both of their civil and their ecclesiastical government, had departed from them. No walls can protect those, nor pillars sustain those, from whom God withdraws. These pillars of the temple were for ornament. They were called Jachin—He will establish; and Boaz—In him is strength; so that the breaking of these signified that God would no longer establish his house nor be the strength of it. These pillars are here described (v. 21–23, from 1 Kings vii. 15). All the vessels that belonged to the brazen altar were carried away; for the iniquity of Jerusalem, like that of Eli's house, was not to be purged by sacrifice or offering, 1 Sam. iii. 14. It is said (v. 20), The brass of all these vessels was without weight; so it was in the making of them (1 Kings vii. 47), the weight of the brass was not then found out (2 Chron. iv. 18). Those that made spoil of them did not stand to weigh them, as purchasers do.

Verses 24–30

A very melancholy account, 1. Of the slaughter of some great men, in cold blood, at Riblah, seventy-two in number (according to the number of the elders of Israel, Num. xi. 24, 25), so they are computed, 2 Kings xxv. 18, 19. The account here agrees except that there it is said that there were five, here there were seven near the king. Dr. Lightfoot thinks that he took away seven of those near the king, but two of them were Jeremiah and Ebed-melech, who were both discharged, so that there were only five of them put to death. Seraiah the chief priest is put first. Seraiah the prince was a quiet prince (ch. li. 59), but perhaps Seraiah the priest was turbulent and had made himself obnoxious to the king of Babylon. The leaders of this people had caused them to err, and now they are objects of divine justice. 2. Of the captivity of the rest. Judah was carried away captive out of his own land (v. 27), Lev. xviii. 28. An account, (1) Of two captivities, one in the seventh year of Nebuchadnezzar (the same with that which is said to be in his eighth year, 2 Kings xxiv. 12), another in his eighteenth year, the same with that which is said (v. 12) to be in his nineteenth year. But the numbers here are small, in comparison with what we find expressed concerning the former (2 Kings xxiv. 14, 16), when there were 18,000 carried captive, whereas here they are said to be 3,023. When all the residue of the people were carried away (v. 15), one would think there should be more than 832 souls; therefore Dr. Lightfoot conjectures that, these accounts being joined to the story of the putting to death of the great men at Riblah, all that are here said to be carried away were put to death as rebels. (2) Of a third captivity, not mentioned before, which was in the twenty-third year of Nebuchadnezzar, four years after the destruction of Jerusalem (v. 30): Then Nebuzaradan came, and carried away 745 Jews; it is probable that this was done in revenge of the murder of Gedaliah, which was another rebellion against the king of Babylon, and that those who were now taken were put to death. If this be the sum total of the captives (all the persons were 4,600, v. 30), they were reduced from what they had been, but the Lord made them fruitful in the land of their affliction, and the more they were oppressed the more they multiplied.

Verses 31–34

This story concerning the reviving which king Jehoiachin had in his bondage we had before (2 Kings xxv. 27–30), only there it is said to be done on the twenty-seventh day of the twelfth month, here on the twenty-fifth. It is probable that the orders were given for his release on the twenty-fifth day, but that he was not presented to the king till the twenty-seventh. Nebuchadnezzar had long kept this unhappy prince in prison; and his son, though well-affected to the prisoner, could not procure him any favour; but, when the old man was dead, his son countenanced Jehoiachin and made him a favourite. Jehoiachin fell from a throne into a prison, but here he is advanced again to a throne of state (v. 32), though not to a throne of power. As, before, the robes were changed into prison-garments, so now they were converted into robes again. Though the night of affliction be very long, yet we must not despair. The day may dawn at last. Jehoiachin was thirty-seven years a prisoner, in confinement, in contempt, since he was eighteen years old. Let those whose afflictions have been lengthened out encourage themselves with this instance; the vision will at the end speak comfortably, and therefore wait for it. God can make his people find favour in the eyes of their oppressors, and turn their hearts to pity them (Ps. cvi. 46), He made them to be pitied of all those that carried them captives. It is not in vain to hope and quietly to wait for the salvation of the Lord. And now, comparing the prophecy and the history of this book, we may learn, (1) That it is no new thing for churches and persons highly dignified to degenerate, and become corrupt. (2) That iniquity tends to the ruin of those that harbour it; and, if it be not repented of and forsaken, will certainly end in ruin.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH

I. The title of this book; in the Hebrew it has none, but is called (as the books of Moses are) from the first word Ecah—How; but the Jewish commentators call it, as the Greeks do, and we from them, Kinoth—Lamentations. As we have sacred odes or songs of joy, so have we sacred elegies or songs of lamentation. II. The penman of this book is here Jeremiah the poet, therefore this book is fitly joined to the book of his prophecy, and is as an appendix to it. We have there the predictions of the desolations of Judah and Jerusalem, and then the history of them, to show how the predictions were accomplished, and here we have the expressions of his sorrow upon occasion of them. When he saw these calamities at a distance, he wished that his head were waters and his eyes fountains of tears: and, when they came, he wept and was far from being disaffected to his country. Though his country had been unkind to him, and though the ruin of it was a proof that he was a true prophet, yet he sadly lamented it. III. The occasion of these Lamentations was the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldean army and the dissolution of the Jewish state both civil and ecclesiastical. Some will have these to be the Lamentations which Jeremiah penned upon occasion of the death of Josiah, 2 Chron. xxxv. 25. But, they seem to be penned of those calamities when they had already come, and there is nothing of Josiah in them. No, it is Jerusalem's funeral that this is an elegy upon. IV. The composition of it is not only poetical, but alphabetical, all except the 5th chapter. Each verse begins with a letter in the order of the Hebrew alphabet, the first aleph, the second, beth, &c., but the 3rd chapter is a triple alphabet, the first three beginning with aleph, the next three with beth, &c., which was a help to memory and an elegance in writing. In the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th chapters the letter pe is put before ajin, which in all the Hebrew alphabets follows it. Dr. Lightfoot offers this conjecture, That the letter ajin, which is the numeral letter for LXX, by being displaced, put them in mind of the seventy years at the end of which God would turn again their captivity. V. The use of it to the pious Jews in their sufferings, furnishing them with spiritual language to express their natural grief, helping to preserve the remembrance of Zion among them, when they were in Babylon. They are here taught to mourn for sin and mourn to God.

CHAP. I

The first alphabet of this lamentation, twenty-two stanzas, in which the miseries of Jerusalem are bewailed and her present deplorable condition is aggravated by comparing it with her former prosperous state; sin is acknowledged as the cause of all these miseries; and God is appealed to for justice against their enemies and for compassion towards them. I. A complaint made to God of their calamities, ver. 1–11. II. The same complaint made to their friends, ver. 12–17. III. An appeal to God and his righteousness concerning it (ver. 18–22), in which he is humbly solicited.

Verses 1–11

I. The miseries of Jerusalem.

1. As to their civil state. (1) A city that was populous is now depopulated, v. 1. She was full of her own people that replenished her, and full of the people of other nations that resorted to her, with whom she had profitable commerce, but now her own people are carried into captivity, and she sits solitary. The chief places of the city are not now, as they used to be, places of concourse. How has she become as a widow! Her king that was as a husband to her is gone; her God has departed from her; she is emptied of her children, is solitary and sorrowful as a widow. (2) A city that had dominion is now in subjection. She had been great among the nations, greatly loved by some and greatly feared by others. Some made her presents, and others paid her taxes; so that she was really princess among the provinces. But now she has not only lost her friends and sits solitary, but has lost her freedom and sits tributary; she paid tribute to Egypt first and then to Babylon. Sin brings a people not only into solitude, but into slavery. (3) A city that used to be full of mirth has now become full of grief. Jerusalem had been a joyous city, whither the tribes went to rejoice before the Lord: she was the joy of the whole earth, but now she weeps sorely, she weeps in the night, in silence and solitude; in the night, when others rest, her thoughts are intent upon her troubles. Her head is—as waters, and her eyes fountains of tears, so that she weeps day and night (Jer. ix. 1); her tears are continually on her cheeks. (4) Those that were separated from the heathen now dwell among the heathen; those that were a peculiar people are now a mingled people (v. 3): Judah has gone into captivity, out of her own land into the land of her enemies, among those that are aliens to God and the covenants of promise, with whom she finds no rest. "Her children have gone into captivity before the enemy; those that were to have been the seed of the next generation are carried off; so that the land is likely to be still desolate for want of heirs." Those that dwell among their own people, a free people, and in their own land, would be more thankful for mercies if they would but consider the miseries of those forced into strange countries. (5) Those that used to conquer are now conquered. All her persecutors overlook her between the straits (v. 3); so that her people unavoidably fell into the hand of the enemy, for there was no way to escape (v. 7). Everywhere her adversaries are the chief and her enemies prosper (v. 5). (6) Those that had been a dignified people, on whom God had put honour, and to whom their neighbours had paid respect, are now brought into contempt (v. 8): All that honoured her before despise her. They have vilified themselves by their sins: The enemies magnify themselves against them (v. 9). Sin is the reproach of any people. (7) Those that lived in a fruitful land were ready to perish for want of necessary food (v. 11): All her people sigh in despondency and despair. There was no bread for the people of the land (Jer. lii. 6), and in their captivity they had much ado to get bread, ch. v. 6. They have given their pleasant things for meat to relieve the soul, or (as the margin is) to make the soul come again, when they were ready to faint away.

2. An account of their miseries in their ecclesiastical state. (1) Their religious feasts were no more observed (v. 4): The ways of Zion do mourn; overgrown with weeds. The solemn feasts had been neglected and profaned (Isa. i. 11, 12), and therefore justly is an end now put to them. And, as the ways of Zion mourned, so the gates of Zion, in which the faithful worshippers used to meet, are desolate. (2) Her priests sigh for the desolations of the temple; their songs are turned into sighs. In the day of Zion's prosperity, Ps. lxviii. 25, Among them were the damsels playing with timbrels, and notice is taken of the failing now. Her virgins are afflicted, and therefore she is in bitterness; that is, all the inhabitants of Zion are sorrowful for the solemn assembly, and to them the reproach of it is a burden, Zeph. iii. 18. (3) Their religious places were profaned (v. 10): The heathen entered into her sanctuary, into the temple itself, into which no Israelite was permitted to enter, though ever so reverently and devoutly, but the priests only. The heathen now crowd rudely in, not to worship, but to plunder. (4) All the rich things with which the temple was adorned, and which were made use of in the worship of God, were a prey to the enemy (v. 10): The adversary has spread out his hand upon all her pleasant things. What these pleasant things are we may learn from Isa. lxiv. 11, where, to the complaint of the burning of the temple, it is added, All our pleasant things are laid waste; the ark and the altar, and all the other tokens of God's presence with them, pleasant above any other things, were now broken to pieces and carried away. Thus from the daughter of Zion all her beauty has departed, v. 6. The beauty of holiness was the beauty of the daughter of Zion; when the temple, that holy and beautiful house, was destroyed, her beauty was gone. (5) Their religious days were made a jest of (v. 7): The adversaries saw her, and did mock at her sabbaths. They laughed at them for observing one day in seven as a day of rest. Juvenal ridicules the Jews for losing a seventh part of their time:

> ———cui septima quæque fuit lux
> Ignava et vitæ partem non attigit ullam—
> They keep their sabbaths to their cost,
> For thus one day in sev'n is lost;

whereas sabbaths, if they be sanctified as they ought to be, will turn to a better account than all the days of the week besides. And whereas the Jews professed that they did it in obedience to their God, their adversaries asked them, "What profit have you in keeping the ordinances of your God, who now deserts you in your distress?" (6) Her state at present was just the reverse of what it had been formerly, v. 7. Now, in the days of affliction and misery, when everything was black and dismal, she remembers all her pleasant things that she had in the days of old. God often makes us know the worth of mercies by the want of them.

II. The sins of Jerusalem are the cause of all these calamities. It is the Lord that has afflicted her (v. 5) and he had done it as a righteous Judge, for she has sinned. Are her troubles many? Her sins are many more. See Jer. xxx. 14. They are heinous (v. 8): Jerusalem has grievously sinned, has sinned sin (so the word is), sinned wilfully, deliberately. Jerusalem, that makes such a profession and enjoys such privileges, sinned grievously (v. 8), and therefore (v. 9) she came down wonderfully. They have been oppressive and therefore are justly oppressed (v. 3): Judah has gone into captivity, and it is because of affliction and great servitude, because the rich among them afflicted the poor, and particularly (as the Chaldee paraphrases it) because they had oppressed their Hebrew servants, which is charged upon them, Jer. xxxiv. 11. They all despise her (v. 8), for her filthiness is in her skirts; she has rolled them in the mire of sin.

III. Jerusalem's friends are here complained of as false and unkind: They have all dealt treacherously with her (v. 2), so that, in effect, they have become her enemies. Her princes are like harts, that, upon the first alarm, betake themselves to flight. They are like harts, famished for want of pasture, and therefore are gone without strength before the pursuer. Her neighbours are unneighbourly. There is none to help her (v. 7). She has no comforter, none to sympathize, or alleviate her griefs, v. 7, 9.

IV. Jerusalem's God is here besought, and all is referred to his compassionate consideration (v. 9): "O Lord! behold my affliction," and (v. 11), "See, O Lord! and consider." The only way to make ourselves easy under our burdens is to cast them upon God first, and leave it to him to do with us as seemeth him good.

Verses 12–22

In these verses the prophet, in the name of the lamenting church, does more particularly acknowledge the hand of God in these calamities, and the righteousness of his hand.

I. The church in distress here magnifies her affliction. She appeals to all spectators: See if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, v. 12. This might perhaps be truly said of Jerusalem's griefs; but we are apt to apply it too sensibly to ourselves when we are in trouble. If our troubles were to be thrown into a common stock with those of others, and then an equal dividend made, share and share alike, we should each of us say, "Pray, give me my own again."

II. She here looks beyond the instruments to the author of her troubles: "It is the Lord that has afflicted me, and he has afflicted me because he is angry with me; it is in the day of his fierce anger," v. 12. She is as one in a fever: "He has sent fire into my bones" (v. 13). She is as one in a net, which the more he struggles to get out the more he is entangled. She is as one in a wilderness, whose way is solitary: "He has turned me back, that I cannot go on, has made me desolate, that I have nothing to support me with, but am faint all the day." She is as one in a yoke, not yoked for service, but for penance (v. 14): The yoke of my transgressions is bound by his hand. The yoke of Christ's commands is an easy yoke (Matt. xi. 30), but that of our own transgressions is a heavy one. When conscience, as his deputy, binds us over to his judgment, then the yoke is bound and wreathed by the hand of his justice, and nothing but the hand of his pardoning mercy will unbind it. He it is that has trodden under foot all her mighty men, v. 15. She is as one in a wine-press, and it is God that has thus trodden the virgin, the daughter of Judah. She is in the hand of her enemies, and it is the Lord that has delivered her into their hands (v. 14). He that has many a time commanded deliverances for Jacob (Ps. xliv. 4) now commands an invasion against Jacob, because Jacob has disobeyed the commands of his law.

III. She justly demands a share in the compassion of those that were the spectators of her misery (v. 12): "Is it nothing to you, all you that pass by? Can you look upon me without concern? Is it nothing to you that your neighbour's house is on fire?"

IV. She justifies her own grief (v. 16): "For these things I weep, I weep in the night (v. 2), when none sees; my eye, my eye, runs down with water." Zion spreads forth her hands (v. 17), which is here an expression rather of despair than of desire. Her God has withdrawn from her. It is no marvel that the souls of the saints faint away, when God, who is the only Comforter that can relieve them, keeps at a distance. Her children are removed from her, and are in no capacity to help her: they cannot help themselves, and how should they help her? Both the damsels and the youths, that were her joy and hope; have gone into captivity, v. 18. Her friends failed her, some would not and others could not give her any relief. She spread forth her hands, as begging relief, but there is none to comfort her (v. 17). Her idols were her lovers. Egypt and Assyria were her confidants. But they deceived her. The priests and the elders, that should have appeared at the head of affairs, died for hunger (v. 19); or went begging for bread to keep them alive. Abroad the sword bereaves and slays all that comes in its way, and at home all provisions are cut off by the besiegers, so that there is as death, that is, famine. The enemies, that were the instruments of the calamity, were barbarous, so were those that were the standers by, the Edomites and Ammonites, that bore ill will to Israel: They have heard of my trouble, and are glad that thou hast done it (v. 21). It pleases them to find that God and his Israel have fallen out.

V. She justifies God, acknowledging that her sins had deserved these chastenings. The yoke that lies so heavily, and binds so hard, is the yoke of her transgressions, v. 14. It is with our own rod that we are beaten. She owns the equity of God's actions, by owning the iniquity of her own: I have rebelled against his commandments (v. 18); and again (v. 20), I have grievously rebelled. We cannot speak ill enough of sin, and we must always speak worst of our own sin, must call it rebellion, grievous rebellion. Sorrow for sin must be great sorrow and must affect the soul.

VI. She appeals both to the mercy and to the justice of God in her present case. Behold, O Lord! for I am in distress. She appeals to the justice of God concerning the injuries that her enemies did her (v. 21, 22): "Thou wilt bring the day that thou hast called, the day that is fixed in the counsels of God and published in the prophecies, when my enemies shall be like unto me, when the cup of trembling, now put into my hands, shall be put into theirs." It may be read as a prayer, "Let the day appointed come," and so it goes on, "Let their wickedness come before thee; hasten the time when thou wilt do to them for their transgressions as thou hast done to me for mine." This prayer amounts to a protestation against all thoughts of a coalition with them. Our prayers must agree with God's word; and though we are bound in charity to forgive our enemies, and to pray for them, yet we may in faith pray for the accomplishment of that which God has spoken against his and his church's enemies.

CHAP. II

The second alphabetical elegy is set to the same mournful tune and the substance of it is much the same; it begins with Ecah, as that did, "How sad is our case! Alas for us!" I. Here is the anger of Zion's God as the cause of her calamities, ver. 1–9. II. Here is the sorrow of Zion's children as the effect of her calamities, ver. 10–19. III. The matter referred to his compassionate consideration, ver. 20–22. The hand that wounded must make whole.

Verses 1–9

A very sad representation is here made of the state of God's church, of Jacob and Israel, of Zion and Jerusalem; but the emphasis in these verses seems to be laid all along upon the hand of God. The grief is that God appears angry with them; it is he that chastens them, and chastens them in his displeasure.

I. Time was when God's delight was in his church, and he appeared to her as a friend. But now he is angry with her, and appears against her as an enemy. To those who know how to value God's favour nothing appears more dreadful than his finger; corrections in love are easily borne, but rebukes in love wound deeply. It is God's wrath that burns against Jacob like a flaming fire (v. 3), but it was their sin that kindled this fire. God is such a tender Father to his children that we may be sure he is never angry with them but when they give him cause to be angry. Now he is an enemy to them; at least he is as an enemy, v. 5. He has bent his bow like an enemy, v. 4. He stood with his right hand stretched out against them, and a sword drawn in it as an adversary. God is not really an enemy to his people, no, not when he is angry with them and corrects them in anger. But sometimes he is as an enemy to them, when all his providences concerning them seem in outward appearance to have a tendency to their ruin. But, blessed be God, Christ is our peace, our peacemaker, who has slain the enmity.

II. Time was when God's church appeared very bright, and considerable among the nations; but now the Lord has covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud (v. 1), a dark cloud, through which she cannot see his face; a thick cloud (so the word signifies), a black cloud, not such as that under which God conducted them through the wilderness, or that in which God took possession of the temple and filled it with his glory: no, that side of the cloud is now turned towards them which was turned towards the Egyptians in the Red Sea. He turned back their right hand, so that they were not able to ward off the blow which was given them. What can their right hand do against the enemy when God draws it back, and withers it, as he did Jeroboam's?

III. Time was when Jerusalem and the cities of Judah were strong and well fortified. But now the Lord has in anger swallowed them up. They are so totally ruined that they seem to have been swallowed up. He has swallowed up all her palaces (v. 5), though those were stately, and strong, rich and well guarded. He has destroyed not only their dwelling-places, but their strongholds. Thus has he increased in the daughter of Judah mourning and lamentation, when they saw all their defence departed from them. This is again insisted on, v. 7–9. He has given up into the hand of the enemy the walls of her palaces. The walls of palaces cannot protect them, unless God himself be a wall of fire round about them. Whatever desolations God makes in his church, they are all according to his counsels. But, when it is done, he has stretched out a line, a measuring line, to do it exactly and by measure: hitherto the destruction shall go, and no further.

IV. Time was when their government flourished, and the balance of power was on their side; but now it is otherwise: He has polluted the kingdom and the princes thereof, v. 2. They had first polluted themselves with their idolatries, and then God dealt with them as with polluted things. No marvel that the king and the priest, whose characters were always deemed venerable and inviolable, are despised by everybody, when God has, in the indignation of his anger, despised the king and the priest, v. 6. The crown has fallen from their heads, for her king and her princes are among the Gentiles, prisoners among them (v. 9), and treated as the basest, without any regard to their character. It is just with God to debase those by his judgments who have by sin debased themselves.

V. Time was when the ordinances of God were administered in their purity, and they had those tokens of God's presence with them; but now that part of the beauty of Israel was gone which was indeed their greatest beauty. The ark was God's footstool, under the mercy-seat, between the cherubim; this was of all others the most sacred symbol of God's presence (it is called his footstool, 1 Chron. xxviii. 2; Ps. xcix. 5; cxxxii. 7); there the Shechinah rested, but now he remembered not his footstool. The ark itself was suffered, as it should seem, to fall into the hands of the Chaldeans. Of what little value are the tokens of his presence when his presence is gone! God and his kingdom can stand without that footstool. Those that ministered in holy things had been pleasant to the eye in the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion

(v. 4); they had been purer than snow, whiter than milk (ch. iv. 7). But now these are slain, and their blood is mingled with their sacrifices. The temple was God's tabernacle (as the tabernacle, while that was in being, was called his temple, Ps. xxvii. 4) and this he has violently taken away (v. 6); he has plucked up the stakes of it and cut the cords; it shall be no more a tabernacle, much less his. When men profane God's tabernacle it is just with him to take it from them. He has now abhorred his sanctuary (v. 7); it has been defiled with sin, that only thing which he hates, and for the sake of that he abhors even his sanctuary, which he had delighted in and called his rest for ever, Ps. cxxxii. 14. Some, by the places of the assembly (v. 6), understand not only the temple, but the synagogues, and the schools of the prophets, which the enemy had burnt up, Ps. lxxiv. 8. The solemn feasts and the sabbaths had been carefully remembered, but now the Lord has caused those to be forgotten even in Zion itself. Now that Zion was in ruins no difference was made between sabbath time and other times; every day was a day of mourning, so that all the solenm feasts were forgotten. The altar that had sanctified their gifts is now cast off, for God will no more accept their gifts, nor be honoured by their sacrifices, v. 7. The altar was the table of the Lord, but God will no longer keep house among them; he will neither feast them nor feast with them. They had been blest with prophets and teachers of the law; but now the law is no more (v. 9); it is no more read by the people, no more expounded by the scribes; the tables of the law are gone with the ark; the book of the law is taken from them. Her prophets also find no vision from the Lord. They had persecuted God's prophets, and despised the visions they had from the Lord, and therefore it is just with God to say that they shall have no more prophets, no more visions.

Verses 10–22

Justly are these called Lamentations, the expressions of grief in perfection, like the contents of Ezekiel's roll, Ezek. ii. 10.

I. Copies of lamentations are here presented and they are painted to the life. 1. The judges and magistrates, who used to appear in robes of state, are stripped of them, and put on the habit of mourners (v. 10); the elders now sit no longer in the judgment-seats, the thrones of the house of David, but they sit upon the ground. They keep silence, overwhelmed with grief, and not knowing what to say. They have cast dust upon their heads, and girded themselves with sackcloth. 2. The virgins of Jerusalem hang down their heads to the ground; those know sorrow who were always disposed to be merry. 3. The prophet himself is a pattern to the mourners, v. 11. His eyes do fail with tears; he has wept till he can weep no more; wept himself blind. Jeremiah himself had better treatment than his neighbours, better than he had had before from his own countrymen; their destruction was his deliverance, and yet his private interests are swallowed up in a concern for the public, and he bewails the destruction of the daughter of his people as if he himself had been the greatest sufferer in that common calamity.

II. The heart of the people cried unto the Lord, v. 18. Some fear it was a cry of bitter complaint, but many of them did in sincerity cry unto God for mercy in their distress; and the prophet bids them go on to do so: "O wall of the daughter of Zion! either you that stand upon the wall, you watchmen on the walls (Isa. lxii. 6), or because of the breaking down of the wall (which was not done till about a month after the city was taken), let the daughter of Zion lament still." This was a thing which Nehemiah lamented long after, Neh. i. 3, 4. "Let tears run down like a river day and night, weep without intermission, give thyself no rest from weeping, let not the apple of thy eye cease." The calamities would be continuing, and the causes of grief would recur, and fresh occasion be given them every day and every night to bemoan themselves. They would be apt, by degrees, to grow insensible, and would need to afflict their souls, till their proud and hard hearts were thoroughly humbled and softened.

III. Causes for lamentation are here assigned,

1. Multitudes perish by famine. God had corrected them by scarcity of provisions through want of rain some time before (Jer. xiv. 1), and now by the straitness of the siege God brought it upon them in extremity; for, The children died for hunger in their mothers' arms (v. 11). This is mentioned again (v. 19): They faint for hunger in the top of every street. There were little children that were slain by their mothers' hands and eaten, v. 20. The like was done in the siege of Samaria, 2 Kings vi. 29.

2. Multitudes fall by the sword, which devours one as well as another, especially when it is in the hand of such cruel enemies as the Chaldeans were. They spared no age, not those who, by reason of their tender or their decrepit age, were exempted from taking up the sword; for even they perished by the sword. They spared no sex: My virgins and my young men have fallen by the sword. This was the Lord's doing. But that which follows is very harsh: Thou hast killed, and not pitied; for his soul is grieved for the misery of Israel.

3. Their false prophets cheated them, v. 14. This was a thing which Jeremiah had lamented long before, and had observed with a great concern (Jer. xiv. 13): Ah! Lord God, the prophets say unto them, You shall not see the sword; and here he inserts it among his lamentations. Their visions were all their own fancies, and it is most likely that they themselves knew that the visions they pretended were counterfeit. The people set them up, told them what they should say, so that they were prophets after their hearts. Prophets should tell people of their faults, should show them their sins, that they may bring them to repentance, and so prevent their ruin; but these prophets knew that would lose them the people's affections and contributions. Therefore they have not discovered thy iniquity; though that might have been a means, by taking away their iniquity, to turn away their captivity.

4. Their neighbours laughed at them (v. 15): All that pass by thee clap their hands at thee. Is this the city (said they) that men called the perfection of beauty? (Ps. l. 2). How is it now the perfection of deformity! Where is all its beauty now?

5. Their enemies triumphed over them, v. 16. Those that wished ill to Jerusalem now open their mouths, nay, they widen them; they hiss and gnash their teeth in scorn and indignation. "We have swallowed her up; it is our doing, and it is our gain; it is all our own now. Certainly this is the day that we have long looked for; we have found it; we have seen it; aha! so would we have it."

6. Their God, in all this, appeared against them (v. 17): The Lord has done that which he had devised. What God devises against his people is designed for them, and so it will be found in the issue. When he gave them his law by Moses he told them what judgments he would certainly inflict upon them if they transgressed that law; and now that they had been guilty of the transgression of this law he had executed the sentence of it, according to Lev. xxvi. 16, &c., Deut. xxviii. 15.

IV. Comforts for the cure of these lamentations are here sought for and prescribed. They are sought for, v. 13. The prophet seeks to find out some suitable acceptable words to say to her in this case:

Wherewith shall I comfort thee, O virgin! daughter of Zion? We endeavour to comfort our friends by telling them their case is not singular; there are many whose trouble is greater than theirs; but Jerusalem's case will not admit this argument: "What thing shall I liken to thee, or what shall I equal to thee, that I may comfort thee? What city, what country, is there, whose case is parallel to thine?" Alas! there is none, no sorrow like thine, because there is none whose honour was like thine. We tell them that their case is not desperate, but that it may easily be remedied; but neither will that be admitted here, upon a view of human probabilities; for thy breach is great, like the sea, like the breach which the sea sometimes makes upon the land, which cannot be repaired, but grows wider and wider. Thou art wounded, and who shall heal thee? No wisdom nor power of man can repair such a broken shattered state. It is to no purpose therefore to administer any of these common cordials. The method of cure prescribed is to address themselves to God, and by a penitent prayer to commit their case to him, and to be instant and constant in such prayers (v. 19): "Arise out of thy dust, out of thy despondency, cry out in the night, when others are asleep, be thou upon thy knees, importunate with God for mercy; in the beginning of the watches, of each of the four watches of the night, then pour out thy heart like water before the Lord, be free and full in prayer, be sincere and serious in prayer, open thy mind, spread thy case before the Lord; lift up thy hands towards him in holy desire and expectation; beg for the life of thy young children. These poor lambs, what have they done? Take with you words, take with you these words (v. 20), Behold, O Lord! and consider to whom thou hast done this. Are they not thy own, the seed of Abraham thy friend and of Jacob thy chosen? Lord, take their case into thy compassionate consideration!"

CHAP. III

The scope of this chapter is the same with that of the two foregoing chapters, but the composition is different; that was in long verse, this is in short, another kind of metre; that was in single alphabets, this is in a treble one. I. A sad complaint of God's displeasure and the fruits of it, ver. 1–20. II. Words of comfort to God's people, ver. 21–36. III. Duty prescribed in this afflicted state, ver. 37–41. IV. The complaint renewed, ver. 42–54. V. Encouragement taken to hope in God, ver. 55–66. Some make all this to be spoken by the prophet himself when he was imprisoned and persecuted; but it seems rather to be spoken in the person of the church now in captivity and desolate, and in the desolations of which the prophet did in a particular manner interest himself. But the complaints here are more general than those in the foregoing chapter, and intended for the use of the closet rather than of the solemn assembly. Some think Jeremiah makes these complaints, not only as an intercessor for Israel, but as a type of Christ.

Verses 1–20

The title of the 102nd Psalm might very fitly be prefixed to this chapter—The prayer of the afflicted, when he is overwhelmed, and pours out his complaint before the Lord. The prophet complains, 1. That God is angry. This gives both birth and bitterness to the affliction (v. 1): I am the man that has seen affliction, and has felt it sensibly, by the rod of his wrath. God is sometimes angry with his own people; yet it is not as a sword to cut off, but only as a rod to correct; it is to them the rod of his wrath, though grievous for the present, in the issue advantageous. By this rod we must expect to see affliction, and if we be made to see more than ordinary affliction, we must not quarrel, for we are sure that the anger is just and the affliction mixed with mercy. 2. That he is in the dark. Darkness is put for trouble and perplexity; this was the case of the complainant (v. 2): "He has led me by an unaccountable chain of events, into darkness and not into light, the darkness I feared and not into the light I hoped for." And (v. 6), He has set me in dark places, dark as the grave, like those that are dead of old, that are quite forgotten. 3. That God appears against him as an enemy. "Surely against me is he turned (v. 3), as far as I can discern; for his hand is turned against me all the day. I am chastened every morning," Ps. lxxiii. 14. When God's hand is turned against us, we are tempted to think that his heart is turned against us too. "He was unto me as a bear lying in wait, surprising me with his judgments, and as a lion in secret places; so that which way soever I went I could never think myself safe." He has bent his bow, v. 12. He has set me as a mark for his sorrow, and the arrows of his quiver enter into my veins, give me an inward wound, v. 13. 4. That the Jewish state may be fitly compared to a man wrinkled with age (v. 4): "My flesh and my skin has he made old; they are wasted and withered, and he has broken my bones, v. 15. He has filled me with bitterness, a bitter sense of these calamities." He has mingled gravel with my bread, so that my teeth are broken with it (v. 16). He has covered me with ashes, as mourners used to be, or (as some read it) he has fed me with ashes. 5. That he is not able to discern any way of escape (v. 5): "He has built against me, as forts and batteries are built against a besieged city. Where there was a way open it is now quite made up: He has compassed me on every side with gall and travail; I vex and fret, and tire myself, to find a way of escape, but can find none, v. 7. He has hedged me about, that I cannot get out. I am chained; and as notorious malefactors are double-fettered, so he has made my chain heavy. He has also (v. 9) enclosed my ways with hewn stone, with a stone wall, which cannot be broken through, so that my paths are made crooked; I traverse to and fro, but am still turned back." So (v. 11), "He has turned aside my ways; ruined my projects. He has pulled me in pieces; and made me desolate, has deprived me of all comfort in my own soul." 6. That God turns a deaf ear to his prayers (v. 8): "When I cry and shout, as one in earnest, that would make him hear, yet he shuts out my prayer. Sometimes God seems to be angry even against the prayers of his people (Ps. lxxx. 4), and their case is deplorable indeed when they are denied the comfort of acceptance. 7. That his neighbours make a laughing matter of his troubles (v. 14): I was a derision to all my people, to all the wicked among them, who made one another merry with the public judgments, and particularly the prophet Jeremiah's griefs. 8. That he was ready to despair of deliverance: "Thou hast not only taken peace from me, but hast removed my soul far off from peace (v. 17). I forget prosperity; it is so long since I had it that I have lost the idea of it. I have been so inured to sorrow and servitude that I know not what joy and liberty mean. My strength and my hope have perished from the Lord (v. 18); I can no longer stay myself upon God as my support, even my God inexorable." 9. That grief returned upon every remembrance of his troubles, and his reflections were as melancholy as his prospects, v. 19, 20. My affliction and my transgression (so some read it), my trouble and my sin that brought it upon me; this was the wormwood and the gall in the affliction and the misery. It is sin that makes the cup of affliction a bitter cup. The captives in Babylon had all the miseries of the siege in their mind continually, and wept when they remembered Zion; nay, they could never forget Jerusalem, Ps. cxxxvii. 1, 5.

Verses 21–36

Here the clouds begin to disperse and the sky to clear up. Here the tune is altered and the mourners in Zion begin to look a little pleasant. But for hope, the heart would break. To save the heart from being quite broken, here is something called to mind, which gives ground for hope (v. 21). I make to return to my heart (so the margin words it); what we have had in our hearts is sometimes as if it were forgotten, till God by his grace make it return to our hearts. "I recall it to mind; therefore have I hope, and am kept from downright despair."

I. Bad as things are, it is owing to the mercy of God that they are not worse. We are afflicted by the rod of his wrath, but it is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed, v. 22. 1. The streams of mercy acknowledged: We are not consumed. The church of God is like Moses's bush, burning, yet not consumed. It is persecuted of men, but not forsaken of God, and therefore, though it is cast down, it is not destroyed (2 Cor. iv. 9), corrected, yet not consumed, refined in the furnace as silver, but not consumed as dross. 2. These streams followed up to the fountain: It is of the Lord's mercies. God is an inexhaustible fountain of mercy, the Father of mercies. Had we been dealt with according to our sins, we should have been consumed long ago; but we have been dealt with according to God's mercies.

II. Even in the depth of their affliction they still have experience of the tenderness of the divine pity and the truth of the divine promise. They had several times complained that God had not pitied (ch. ii. 17, 21), but here they correct themselves, and own, 1. That God's compassions fail not; they do not really fail, no, not even when in anger he seems to have shut up his tender mercies. These rivers of mercy run fully and constantly, but never run dry. They are new every morning; every morning we have fresh instances of God's compassion towards us; every morning does he bring his judgment to light, Zeph. iii. 5. When our comforts fail, yet God's compassions do not. 2. That great is his faithfulness. Though Jerusalem be in ruins, the truth of the Lord endures for ever.

III. God is, and ever will be, the all-sufficient happiness of his people, and they depend upon him to be such (v. 24): The Lord is my portion, saith my soul; that is, 1. "When I have lost all I have in the world, liberty, and livelihood, and almost life itself, yet I have not lost my interest in God." 2. "While I have an interest in God, therein I have enough; I have that which is sufficient to counterbalance all my troubles and make up all my losses." 3. "This is that which I depend upon: Therefore will I hope in him. I will stay myself upon him, when all other supports fail me."

IV. Those who deal with God will find it is not in vain to trust in him, v. 25. While we wait for him by faith, we must seek him by prayer. Our seeking will help to keep up our waiting. It is good (it is our duty and will be our unspeakable comfort and satisfaction) to hope and quietly to wait for the salvation of the Lord, to hope that it will come, to wait till it does come, and while we wait to be quiet and silent, not quarrelling with God but acquiescing in the divine disposals. Father, thy will be done.

V. Afflictions are really good for us, and, if we bear them aright, will work for our good. It is not only good to wait for the salvation, but it is good to be under the trouble in the meantime (v. 27): It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth. Many of the young men were carried into captivity. He tells them that it was good for them to bear the yoke of that captivity, and they would find it so if they would labour to answer God's ends in laying that heavy yoke upon them. Here it seems to be meant of the yoke of affliction. Many have found it good to bear this in youth; it has made those humble who otherwise would have been proud and unruly, and as a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke. But when do we bear the yoke so that it is really good for us to bear it in our youth? 1. When we are quiet under our afflictions, when we sit alone and keep silence, that we may converse with God and commune with our own hearts, silencing all discontented distrustful thoughts. 2. When we are humble and patient under our affliction. He gets good by the yoke who puts his mouth in the dust, not only lays his hand upon his mouth, in token of submission to the will of God, but puts it in the dust, in token of sorrow at the remembrance of sin. Those who are truly humbled for sin will be glad to obtain a good hope, through grace, though they put their mouth in the dust for it. 3. When we are meek towards those who are the instruments of our trouble, and are of a forgiving spirit, v. 30. Our Lord Jesus has left us an example of this, for he gave his back to the smiter, Isa. l. 6. He who can bear contempt and reproach, and not render railing for railing and bitterness for bitterness, shall find that it is good to bear the yoke, that it shall turn to his spiritual advantage.

VI. God will graciously return to his people with comforts according to the time that he has afflicted them, v. 31, 32. We may bear ourselves up with this, 1. That, when we are cast down, yet we are not cast off; the father's correcting his son is not a disinheriting of him. 2. That though we may seem to be cast off for a time, yet we are not really cast off. 3. That, whatever sorrow we are in, his hand is in it, and therefore we may be assured it is but for a season, 1. Pet. i. 6. 4. That God has compassions and comforts in store even for those whom he has himself grieved. He has torn, and he will heal us, Hos. vi. 1. 5. That, when God returns to deal graciously with us, it will not be according to our merits, but according to his mercies.

VII. When God does cause grief, it is for wise and holy ends, and he takes not delight in our calamities, v. 33. He does not do it willingly, not from the heart; so the word is. 1. He never afflicts us but when we give him cause to do it. If he show us kindness, it is because so it seems good unto him; but, if he write bitter things against us, it is because we both deserve them and need them. 2. He delights not in the death of sinners, or the disquiet of saints, but punishes with reluctance. He delights not in the misery of any of his creatures, he is so far from it that in all their afflictions he is afflicted and his soul is grieved for the misery of Israel. 3. He retains his kindness for his people even when he afflicts them. If he does not willingly grieve the children of men, much less his own children. They may by faith see love in his heart even when they see frowns in his face and a rod in his hand.

VIII. Though he makes use of men as his hand, or rather instruments in his hand, for the correcting of his people, yet he is far from being pleased with the injustice and the wrong they do them, v. 34–36. Two ways the people of God are oppressed by their enemies, and the prophet here assures us that God does not approve of either of them: 1. If men injure them by force of arms, God does not approve of that. He does not himself crush under his feet the prisoners of the earth, but he regards the cry of the prisoners; nor does he approve of men's doing it. It is barbarous to trample on those that are down. 2. If men injure them in the pretended administration of justice,—if they turn aside the right of a man, so that he cannot discover what his rights are,—if they subvert a man in his cause, and bring in a wrong verdict, or give a false judgment, let them know God sees them. It is before the face of the Most High (v. 35). God does not approve of them. More is implied than is expressed. The perverting of justice, and the subverting of the just, are a great affront to God; he will sooner or later severely reckon with those that do thus.

Verses 37–41

I. We must not quarrel with God for any affliction that he lays upon us at any time (v. 39): Wherefore does a living man complain? From the doctrine of God's sovereign and universal providence he draws this inference, Wherefore does a living man complain? The sufferers in the captivity must submit to the will of God in all their sufferings. Shall a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins? We are sinful men, and that which we complain of is the just punishment of our sins; it is far less than our iniquities have deserved. Then let us not complain; instead of repining, we must be repenting; and, as an evidence that God is reconciled to us, we must be endeavouring to reconcile ourselves to his holy will.

II. We must set ourselves to answer God's intention in afflicting us, which is to bring sin to our remembrance, and to bring us home to himself, v. 40. Let us search and try our ways. Let conscience be employed both to search and to try. Let us try our ways, that by them we may try ourselves, for we are to judge of our state not by our faint wishes, but by our step, not by one particular step, but by our ways, the ends we aim at, the rules we go by, and the tenor of our lives to those ends and those rules. When we are in affliction it is seasonable to consider our ways (Hag. i. 5), that what is amiss may be repented of and amended for the future, and so we may answer the intention of the affliction. We are apt, in times of public calamity, to reflect upon other people's ways, and lay blame upon them; whereas our business is to search and try our own ways. "Let us turn again to the Lord. We have been with him, and it has never been well with us since we forsook him; let us therefore now turn again to him." Our hearts must go along with our prayers. We must lift up our hearts with our hands, as we must pour out our souls with our words. Praying is lifting up the soul to God (Ps. xxv. 1) as to our Father in heaven; and the soul that hopes to be with God in heaven for ever will, by frequent acts of devotion, be still learning the way thither and pressing forward in that way.

Verses 42–54

The prophet had owned that a living man should not complain, yet here the clouds return.

I. They confess the righteousness of God in afflicting them (v. 42): We have transgressed and have rebelled. Call sin a transgression, call it a rebellion, and you do not miscall it.

II. They complain of the afflictions they are under, not without some reflections upon God.

1. They complain of the tokens of his displeasure (v. 42), Thou hast not pardoned. Thou hast not pitied, v. 43. They complain that there was a wall of partition between them and God. "Thou hast covered us up as men that are buried are covered up and forgotten." It hindered their prayers from coming up unto God (v. 44): Thou hast covered thyself with a cloud so thick that our prayers seem as if they were lost in it."

2. They complain of the contempt of their neighbours (v. 45): "Thou hast made us as the off-scouring." If they had not made themselves vile, their enemies could not have made them so.

3. They complain of the destruction that their enemies made of them (v. 37): The destruction of the daughter of my people (v. 48), of all the daughters of my city, v. 51. Their enemies chased them till they had quite prevailed over them (v. 53): They have cut off my life in the dungeon. They are as it were thrown into the dungeon or grave and a stone cast upon them, such as used to be rolled to the door of the sepulchres. They look upon the Jewish nation as dead and buried. Their destruction is compared to the sinking of a living man into the water, v. 54.

4. They complain of their own excessive grief and fear (v. 48, 49). It is added (v. 51), "My eye affects my heart. The more I look upon the desolations of the city and country the more I am grieved."

5. In the midst of these sad complaints here is one word of comfort, v. 50. We continue weeping till the Lord look down and behold from heaven. Bad as the case is, one favourable look from heaven will set all to rights. While they continued weeping they continued waiting; nothing shall wipe tears from their eyes till he look down.

Verses 55–65

A struggle in the prophet's breast between faith, fear and hope. But faith gets the last word and comes off conqueror. In three things the prophet and his friends had found God good: 1. He had heard their prayers; though they had been ready to fear that the cloud of wrath was such as their prayers could not pass through (v. 44). When they were in the low dungeon, as free among the dead, they called upon God's name (v. 55). Thou didst not hide thy ear at my breathing, at my cry. Observe how he calls prayer his breathing; for in prayer we breathe towards God, we breathe after him. Prayer is the breath of the new man, sucking in the air of mercy in petitions and returning it in praises; it is both the evidence and the maintenance of the spiritual life. 2. He had silenced their fears (v. 57): "Thou drewest near in the day that I called upon thee." When we draw nigh to God in a way of duty we may by faith see him drawing nigh to us in a way of mercy. Thou saidst, Fear not. 3. He had already begun to appear for them (v. 58): "O Lord! thou hast pleaded the causes of my soul" (that is, as it follows), "thou hast redeemed my life." He comforts himself with an appeal to God's justice, and to his omniscience. "O Lord! thou hast seen my wrong, that I have done no wrong at all, but suffer a great deal." Thou hast seen all their imaginations against me (v. 60). They make themselves and one another merry with my miseries, as the Philistines made sport with Samson. Let them be dealt with as they have dealt with us; let thy hand be against them as their hand has been against us.

CHAP. IV

This chapter is another single alphabet of Lamentations for the destruction of Jerusalem, like those in the first two chapters. I. The prophet here laments the indignities done to those to whom respect used to be shown, ver. 1, 2. II. He laments the effects of the famine, ver. 3–10. III. He laments the sacking of Jerusalem, ver. 11, 12. IV. He acknowledges that the sins of their leaders were the cause of all these calamities, ver. 13–16. V. He gives up all as doomed to ruin, ver. 17–20. VI. He foretells the destruction of the Edomites who triumphed in Jerusalem's fall, ver. 21. VII. He foretells the return of the captivity of Zion at last, ver. 22.

Verses 1–12

The elegy in this chapter begins with a lamentation of the sad change in Jerusalem. The city that was formerly as the most fine gold has lost its lustre; it has become dross.

I. The temple was laid waste, which was the glory of Jerusalem and its protection. And some understand the gold (v. 1) to be the gold of the temple, the find gold with which it was overlaid (1 Kings vi. 22); when the temple was burned the gold was sullied. The stones of the sanctuary were brought down by the fire, and thrown about in the top of every street; they lay mingled among the common ruins.

II. The princes and priests, who were in a special manner the sons of Zion, were abused, v. 2. Israel was more rich in them than in treasures of gold and silver. But now they are broken as earthen pitchers. They have grown poor, are brought into captivity, and rendered mean and despicable.

III. Little children were starved for want of bread and water, v. 3, 4.

IV. Persons of rank were reduced to poverty, v. 5. Those who were well-born and well bred, being stripped of all by the war, are desolate in the streets, have not a bed to lie on. As sometimes the needy are raised out of the dunghill (Ps. cxiii. 7), so there are instances of the wealthy being brought to the dunghill.

V. Persons who were eminent for dignity, perhaps for sanctity, shared with others in the common calamity, v. 7, 8. Her Nazarites are changed. These Nazarites, by reason of their temperate diet, especially the pleasure they had in devoting themselves to God, which made their faces to shine as Moses's, were purer than snow and whiter than milk; drinking no wine nor strong drink, they had a healthful complexion and cheerful countenance. But now their visage is marred (as is said of Christ, Isa. lii. 14); it is blacker than a coal; they look miserably, partly through hunger and partly through grief and perplexity. They are not known in the streets; those who respected them now take no notice of them.

VI. Jerusalem died a lingering death; for the famine contributed more to her destruction than any other judgment. Jerusalem dies by inches, dies so as to feel herself die. The iniquity of Jerusalem is more aggravated than that of Sodom, no wonder that the punishment of it is so. Sodom never had the means of grace that Jerusalem had. The hands of the pitiful women have slain and then sodden their own children. The case was sad enough that they had not wherewithal to feed their children and make meat for them (v. 4), but much worse that they could find in their hearts to feed upon their children and make meat of them. The destruction of Jerusalem is a complete destruction (v. 11), an amazing destruction, v. 12. It was a surprise to the kings of the earth, and to all the inhabitants of the world who knew Jerusalem. They knew that it was the city of the great King, and therefore they thought that it was so much under the divine protection that it would be in vain for any of its enemies to make an attack upon it.

Verses 13–20

I. The sins for which God brought this destruction upon them served to justify God in it (v. 13, 14): It is for the sins of her prophets, and the iniquities of her priests. The particular sin charged upon them is persecution; the false prophets and corrupt priests joined to shed the blood of the just in the midst of her. They not only shed the blood of their innocent children, whom they sacrificed to Moloch, but the blood of the righteous men among them, whom they sacrificed to that more cruel idol of enmity to the truth and true religion. There is nothing that will make prophets and priests to be abhorred so much as a spirit of persecution.

II. The testimony of their neighbours to convict them of sin and to show the equity of God's proceedings against them. They upbraided them with their pretended purity, while they lived in iniquity. They cried to them, Depart you; it is unclean. They all cried out shame on them, and could easily foresee that God would not long suffer so provoking a people to continue in so good a land. The land would spew them out, as it had done their predecessors, and, when they saw the dispersed of Jacob fleeing and wandering, they told them of it. They said, Now the anger of the Lord has divided them. They said, when they saw them expelled, God will no more regard them, and how then can they help themselves? Herein they were mistaken. God has not cast them off, for all this.

III. Their despair under their calamities. "As for us, we look upon our case to be in a manner helpless. Our end is near (v. 18), the end both of our church and of our state." The refuges they fled to disappointed them. They looked for help from this and the other powerful ally, but to no purpose. Looking for that which never came (v. 17); they watched in watching; for a nation that frustrated their expectations. The persecutors overcame them (v. 18): They hunt our steps, that we cannot go in our streets. When the Chaldeans besieged the city they raised their batteries so high above the walls that they could shoot at people as they went along the streets. They hunted them with the arrows from place to place. Their persecutors were swifter than the eagles of heaven, v. 19.

Verses 21–22

David's psalms of lamentation commonly conclude with some word of comfort, which is as life from the dead and light shining out of darkness; so does this lamentation in this chapter. It is here foretold, for the encouragement of God's people,

I. That an end shall be put to Zion's troubles (v. 22). The troubles of God's people shall be continued no longer than till they have done their work for which they were sent.

II. That an end shall be put to Edom's triumphs. It is spoken ironically (v. 21): Rejoice and be glad, O daughter of Edom! The cup of trembling, which it is now Jerusalem's turn to drink deeply of, shall pass through unto thee. The destruction of the Edomites was foretold by this prophet (Jer. xlix. 7, &c.). "The cup that shall pass unto thee shall intoxicate thee. Thou shalt be drunken, and at thy wits' end, shalt stagger and stumble, and then, as Noah when he was drunk, thou shalt make thyself naked and expose thyself to contempt."

CHAP. V

This chapter, though it has the same number of verses with the 1st, 2nd, and 4th, is not alphabetical. I. A representation of the present calamitous state of God's people in their captivity, ver. 1–16. II. A protestation of their concern for God's sanctuary, ver. 17, 18. III. A humble supplication to God for the returns of mercy (ver. 19–22). Some ancient versions call this chapter, "The Prayer of Jeremiah."

Verses 1–16

The people of God, overwhelmed with grief, give vent to their sorrows at the throne of grace. Remember what is past, consider and behold what is present, and let not all the trouble we are in seem little to thee, and not worth taking notice of," Neh. ix. 32. The one word in which all their grievances are summed up is reproach: Consider, and behold, our reproach. As it was a reproach, it reflected upon the name and honour of that God who had owned them for his people.

I. They acknowledge the reproach of sin, the reproach of their youth, of the early days of their nation. It is a penitent confession of the sins of their ancestors, which they themselves had persisted in, for which they now justly suffered.

II. They represent the reproach they bear, in divers particulars, which tend to their disgrace.

1. They are robbed of that good land which God gave them, v. 2. "It is turned to strangers; they dwell in the houses that we built, and this is our reproach."

2. Their state and nation are like widows and orphans (v. 3): "We are fatherless (that is, helpless). Our king, who is the father of the country, is cut off; nay, God our Father seems to have forsaken us; our mothers, our cities, are now as widows, exposed to wrong and injury, and this is our reproach."

3. They are put hard to it to provide necessaries. Water used to be free but now (v. 4), We have drunk our water for money. Formerly they had fuel for the fetching; but now, "Our wood is sold to us, and we pay dearly for every faggot." But what must they do for bread? Some of them sold their liberty for it

(v. 6): "We have given the hand to the Egyptians and to the Assyrians, have made the best bargain we could, that we might be satisfied with bread. We got our bread with the peril of our lives." They stole out of the city to fetch in some supply; they were in danger of being put to the sword, the sword of the wilderness it is called.

4. They are brought into slavery, and this is as much as anything their reproach (v. 5): Our necks are under the grievous yoke of persecution. The poor captives in Babylon laboured and had no rest, no night's rest, no sabbath-rest. They would not be ruled by their God, and by his servants the prophets, whose rule was gentle and gracious, and therefore justly are they ruled with rigour by their enemies and their servants.

5. Those who used to be feasted are now famished (v. 10): Our skin was black like an oven, dried and parched too, because of the terrible famine, the storms of famine (so the word is).

6. All sorts of people were abused and dishonoured. The women were ravished, even the women in Zion, that holy mountain, v. 11.

7. An end was put to all their gladness (v. 14): The young men, who used to be disposed to mirth, have ceased from their music. It was so with the body of the people (v. 15): The joy of their heart ceased. Our dance is turned into mourning. This may refer to the joy of their solemn feasts, and the dancing used in them (Judges xxi. 21), which was not only modest, but sacred dancing.

8. An end was put to all their glory. The public administration of justice was their glory, but that was gone (v. 14). The royal dignity was their glory, but that also was gone: The crown has fallen from our head, not only the king himself fallen into disgrace, but the crown; he has no successor. Earthly crowns are fading falling things; but, blessed be God, there is a crown of glory that fades not away, that never falls, a kingdom that cannot be moved.

Verses 17–22

I. The people of God express the deep concern they had for the ruins of the temple, more than for any other of their calamities (v. 17, 18). "The people have polluted the mountain of Zion with their sins, and God has justly made it desolate; the foxes walk upon it as freely and commonly as they do in the woods."

II. They comfort themselves with the doctrine of God's eternity (v. 19): But thou, O Lord! remainest for ever. What shakes the world gives no disturbance to him who made it; whatever revolutions there are on earth there is no change in the Eternal Mind; God is still the same, and remains for ever infinitely wise and holy, just and good.

III. They humbly expostulate with God concerning the frowns of heaven they were now under (v. 20): "Wherefore dost thou forget us for ever, as if we were quite cast out of mind? Thou art the same, and, though the throne of thy sanctuary is demolished, wilt thou not be the same to us?" Though we may not quarrel with God, yet we may plead with him (Jer. xii. 1).

IV. They earnestly pray to God for mercy and grace; "Lord, do not reject us for ever, but turn thou us unto thee; renew our days," v. 21. Though these words are not put last, yet the Rabbin, because they would not have the book to conclude with those melancholy words (v. 22), repeat this prayer again, and so make these the last words both in writing and reading this chapter. This agrees with that repeated prayer (Ps. lxxx. 3, 7, 19), Turn us again, and then cause thy face to shine. Turn us from our idols to thyself, by a sincere repentance and reformation, and then we shall be turned. If God by his grace renew our hearts, he will by his favour renew our days.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE BOOK OF THE PROPHET EZEKIEL

The writings of the prophets, which speak of the things that should be hereafter, seem to utter the same call that St. John had (Rev. iv. 1), Come up hither; but the prophecy of this book is as if the voice said, Come up higher; as we go forward in time (for Ezekiel prophesied in the captivity, as Jeremiah prophesied just before it), so we soar upward in discoveries yet more sublime of the divine glory. These waters of the sanctuary still grow deeper; so far are they from being fordable that in some places they are scarcely fathomable; yet, deep as they are, out of them flow streams which make glad the city of our God. I. The writer was Ezekiel; his name signifies, The strength of God, or one girt or strengthened of God. He girded up the loins of his mind to the service, and God put strength into him. I have made thy face strong against their faces. If we give credit to the tradition of the Jews, he was put to death by the captives in Babylon, for his boldness in reproving them; it is stated that his brains were dashed out. An Arabic historian says that he was put to death and was buried in the sepulchre of Shem the son of Noah. II. Concerning the date, the place, and the time. The scene is laid in Babylon, when it was a house of bondage to the Israel of God; there the prophecies of this book were written, when the prophet himself, and the people to whom he prophesied, were captives there. Ezekiel prophesied in the beginning of the captivity. It was an indication of God's goodwill and his gracious designs in their affliction, that he raised up prophets to convince them when, in the beginning of their troubles they were unhumbled, which was Ezekiel's business, and to comfort them when they were dejected and discouraged. III. Concerning the matter and scope of it. 1. There is much that is mysterious, dark, and hard to be understood, especially in the beginning and the latter end of it, therefore the Jews forbade the reading of it to their young men, till they came to be thirty years of age, lest by the difficulties they met they should be prejudiced against the scriptures; but if we read these difficult parts with humility and reverence, and search them diligently, though we may not be able to untie all the knots, any more than we can solve all the phenomena in the book of nature, yet we may from them, as from the book of nature, gather a great deal for the confirming of our faith and the encouraging of our hope in God. 2. Though the visions here be intricate, such as an elephant may swim in, yet the sermons are mostly plain, such as a lamb may wade in; and the chief design is to show God's people their transgressions, that in their captivity they might be repenting and not repining. As it was of great use to the oppressed captives themselves to have a prophet with them, so it was a testimony to their religion against their oppressors who ridiculed it and them. 3. Though the reproofs and the threatenings here are sharp and bold, yet towards the close of the book very comfortable assurances are given of great mercy God had in store for them; and there one finds some reference to gospel times, and its accomplishment in the kingdom of the Messiah. By opening the terrors of the Lord he prepares Christ's way. The visions were the prophet's credentials. In ch. i–iii, the reproofs and threatenings; ch. iv–xxiv, the comforts in the latter part of the book, and in between are messages sent to the nations that bordered upon the land of Israel, whose destruction is foretold (ch. xxv–xxxv), to make way for the restoration of God's Israel and the re-establishment of their city and temple, which are foretold, ch. xxxvi to the end.

CHAP. I

I. The circumstances of the prophecy now to be delivered, the time when it was delivered (ver. 1), the place where (ver. 2), and the person by whom, ver. 3. II. The introduction to it by a vision of the glory of God, 1. In the upper world, where his throne is surrounded with angels, here called "living creatures", ver. 4–14. 2. In his providences concerning the lower world, represented by the wheels and their motions, ver. 15–25. 3. In the face of Jesus Christ sitting upon the throne, ver. 26–28. And the more we are acquainted, and the more intimately we converse, with the glory of God in these three branches of it, the more commanding influence will divine revelation have upon us.

Verses 1–3

The circumstances of the vision which Ezekiel saw, and in which he received his commission, are here particularly set down, that the narrative may appear to be authentic. It may be of use to keep an account when and where God has been pleased to manifest himself to our souls in a peculiar manner.

I. The time when Ezekiel had this vision was in the thirtieth year, v. 1. Some make it the thirtieth year of the prophet's age; being a priest, he was at that age to enter upon the full execution of the priestly office. Others make it to be the thirtieth year from the beginning of the reign of Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar. But the Chaldee paraphrase fixes upon another era, and says that this was the thirtieth year after Hilkiah the priest found the book of the law in the house of the sanctuary, at midnight, after the setting of the moon, in the days of Josiah the king. It was in the fourth month, answering to our June, and in the fifth day of the month, that Ezekiel had this vision, v. 2. It is probable that it was on the sabbath day, because we read (ch. iii. 16) that at the end of seven days, the next sabbath, the word of the Lord came to him again.

II. The melancholy circumstances he was in when God honoured him. He was among the captives, by the river of Chebar, and it was in the fifth year of king Jehoiachin's captivity.

1. The people of God were now, some of them, captives in the land of the Chaldeans. The body of the Jewish nation yet remained in their own land, but these were the first-fruits of the captivity, and they were some of the best. The word of instruction and the rod of correction may be of great service to us, in concert and concurrence with each other, the word to explain the rod and the rod to enforce the word: both together give wisdom. In their captivity they were destitute of ordinary helps for their souls, and therefore God raised them up these extraordinary ones; for God's children, if they be hindered in their education one way, shall have it made up another way. The Jews that remained in their own land had Jeremiah with them, those that had gone into captivity had Ezekiel with them; for wherever the children of God are scattered abroad he will find out tutors for them.

2. The prophet was himself among the captives by the river Chebar. Interpreters agree not what river this of Chebar was. The best men, and those that are dearest to God, often share in the public and national judgments that are inflicted for sin; those feel the smart who contributed nothing to the guilt. The captives will be best instructed by one who is a captive among them and experimentally knows their sorrows. Wherever we are we may keep up our communion with God. When St. Paul was a prisoner the gospel had a free course. When St. John was banished into the Isle of Patmos Christ visited him there.

III. The discovery which God was pleased to make of himself to the prophet. He here tells us what he saw, what he heard, and what he felt. 1. He saw visions of God, v. 1. No man can see God and live; but many have seen visions of God, displays of the divine glory as have instructed them. Ezekiel was employed in turning the hearts of the people to the Lord their God, and therefore he must himself see the visions of God. It concerns those to be well acquainted with God themselves, and much affected with what they know of him, whose business it is to bring others to the knowledge and love of him. That he might see the visions of God the heavens were opened; the darkness and distance which hindered his visions were conquered. 2. He heard the voice of God (v. 3): The word of the Lord came expressly to him, and what he saw was designed to prepare him for what he was to hear. The essential Word (so we may take it), the Word who is, who is what he is, came to Ezekiel, to send him on his errand. 3. He felt the power of God opening his eyes to see the visions, opening his ear to hear the voice, and opening his heart to receive both.

Verses 4–14

The scope and intention of these visions, 1. To possess the prophet's mind with high, and honourable thoughts of God by whom he was commissioned. It is the likeness of the glory of the Lord that he sees (v. 28). So great a God as this must be served with reverence and godly fear. 2. To strike a terror upon the sinners who remained in Zion, and those who had already come to Babylon, who bade defiance to the threatenings of Jerusalem's ruin. That this vision had a reference to the destruction of Jerusalem seems plain from ch. xliii. 3. 3. To speak comfort to those that feared God, and humbled themselves under his mighty hand. "Let them know that, though they are captives in Babylon, yet they have God nigh unto them; though they have not the place of the sanctuary they have the God of the sanctuary. Now that the church is to be planted for a long time in another country, the Lord shows a glory in the midst of them, as he had done at their first constituting into a church in the wilderness." The first part of the vision represents God as attended and served by an innumerable company of angels, who are all his ministers, doing his commandments and hearkening to the voice of his word.

I. The introduction to this vision of the angels is magnificent and awakening, v. 4. The prophet, observing the heavens to open, looked, looked up. To clear the way, behold, a whirlwind came out of the north, which would drive away the interposing mists. God can by a whirlwind clear the sky and air, and produce that serenity of mind which is necessary to our communion with Heaven. This whirlwind came to Ezekiel (as that to Elijah, 1 Kings xix. 11), to prepare the way of the Lord.

II. The vision itself. God's pavilion in which he rests, his chariot in which he rides, is darkness and thick clouds, Ps. xviii. 11; civ. 3. The cloud is accompanied with a fire, as upon Mount Sinai, where God resided in a thick cloud; but the sight of his glory was like devouring fire (Exod. xxiv. 16, 17), and his first appearance to Moses was in a flame of fire in the bush; for our God is a consuming fire. The fire is surrounded with a glory: A brightness was about it. Though we cannot see into the fire, cannot by searching find out God to perfection, yet we see the brightness that is round about it. Moses might see God's back parts, but not his face. Nothing is more easy than to determine that God is, nothing more difficult than to describe what he is. The living creatures which he saw coming out of the midst of the fire were seraphim—burners—not the living creatures themselves (angels are spirits, and cannot be seen), but the likeness of them, such as God saw fit to use for the leading of the prophet. The likeness of these living creatures came out of the midst of the fire. The prophet himself explains this vision (ch. x. 20): I knew that the living creatures were the cherubim. They are living creatures; the creatures of God, the work of his hands. The sun (say some) is a flame of fire enfolding itself, but it is not a living creature. The prophet sees four of these living creatures to intimate that they are sent towards the four winds of heaven, Matt. xxiv. 31. Zechariah saw them as four chariots going forth east, west, north and south, Zech. vi. 1. God has messengers to send every way. They had the likeness of a man; they are reasonable, intelligent beings, who have that spirit of a man which is the candle of the Lord. The angels of God appear in the likeness of man because in the fulness of time the Son of God was not only to appear in that likeness, but to assume that nature. They all four had the face of a man, v. 5, but, besides that, they had the face of a lion, an ox, and an eagle, each masterly in its kind, the lion among wild beasts, the ox among tame ones, and the eagle among fowls, v. 10. The scattered perfections of the living creatures on earth meet in the angels of heaven. They have the understanding of a man, and such as far exceeds it; they also resemble man in tenderness and humanity. But a lion excels man in strength, and boldness, therefore the angels, who in this resemble them, put on the face of a lion. An ox excels man in diligence, and patience, in the work he has to do; therefore the angels, employed in the service of God and the church, put on the face of an ox. An eagle excels man in quickness and piercing sight, and in soaring high; and therefore the angels, who seek things above, and see far into divine mysteries, put on the face of a flying eagle. Every one had four wings, v. 6. Faith and hope are the soul's wings, upon which it soars upward; pious and devout affections are its wings on which it is carried forward. Their wings were joined (v. 9–11) in token of their perfect unity and unanimity. Two of their wings were made use of in covering their bodies, the spiritual bodies they assumed. Their feet were straight feet (v. 7); they stood straight, and firm, and steady. Their feet were winged (so the LXX); they went so swiftly that it was as if they flew. They had not only wings for motion, but hands for action (v. 8). They are the hands of a man, which are wonderfully made and fitted for service, guided by reason and understanding. Calves' feet denote the swiftness of their motion. The living creatures are active beings. Whatever service they went about they went everyone straight forward (v. 9, 12). If thus our eye be single, our whole body will be full of light. The singleness of the eye is the sincerity of the heart. They went straight forward, everyone about his own work; they did not thwart one another. They turned not when they went, v. 9, 12. They minded no diversions; as they turned not back, so they turned not aside. They went whither the Spirit was to go (v. 12). Whithersoever the Spirit of God would have them go, thither they went. The prophet saw these living creatures (v. 13), by their own light, for their appearance was like burning coals of fire. He saw them by the light of lamps, which went up and down among them, the shining whereof was very bright. The angels of light are in the light, but we see them and their works only by candle-light, by the dim light of lamps that go up and down among them; when the day breaks, and the shadows flee away, we shall see them clearly.

Verses 15–25

I. The vision of the wheels, v. 15–21. The glory of God appears not only in the splendour of the upper world, but in the steadiness of his government here in this lower world. As he beheld the living creatures, and was contemplating the glory this other vision presented itself to his view. 1. The dispensations of Providence are compared to wheels, the wheels of a chariot. Wheels, though they move not of themselves, as the living creatures do, are yet made movable. The wheel is said to be by the living creatures. Such a close connexion is there between the living creatures and the wheels that they moved and rested together. When the living creatures went, the wheels went by them; when God has work to do by the ministry of angels second causes are all found, or made, ready to concur in it. If the living creatures were lifted up from the earth, were elevated to any service above the common course of nature, the wheels move in concert with them, and are lifted up over against them, v. 19–21. The reason is because the spirit of the living creatures was in the wheels; the same wisdom, power, and holiness of God, that guides and governs the angels, orders all the motions of the ceatures in this lower world. God is the soul of the world, and animates the whole, both that above and that beneath, so that they move in perfect harmony, as the upper and lower parts of the natural body do, so that whithersoever the Spirit is to go (whatever God wills and purposes to be done) thither their spirit is to go. The wheel is said to have four faces, looking four several ways (v. 15), denoting that the providence of God exerts itself east, west, north, and south, and extends itself to the remotest corners. At first Ezekiel saw it as one wheel (v. 15), one sphere; but afterwards he saw it was four, but they four had one likeness (v. 16). Various events answer the same intention. Their appearance and their work are said to be like the colour of a beryl (v. 16), the colour of Tarshish (so the word is), that is, of the sea. The nature of things in this world is like that of the sea, in continual flux and yet there is a constant coherence. The sea ebbs and flows, so does Providence in its disposals. The sea looks blue, as the air does, because of the shortness of our sight, which can see but a little way of either. We cannot find out that which God does from the beginning to the end, Eccles. iii. 11. We see but parts of his ways (Job. xxvi. 14), and all beyond looks blue. It is far above out of our sight. Their appearance and their work are as it were a wheel in the middle of a wheel. We pretend not to give a mathematical description of it. The disposals of Providence seem to us intricate, perplexed, and unaccountable, and yet they will appear in the issue to have been all wisely ordered. The motion of these wheels was steady and constant: They returned not when they went (v. 17), because they never went amiss. God takes his work before him, and he will have it forward; and it is going on even when it seems to us to be going backward. They went as the Spirit directed them, and therefore returned not. We should not have occasion to return back as we have, and to undo that by repentance which we have done amiss, and to do it over again, if we were but led by the Spirit and followed his direction. The Spirit of life (so some read it) was in the wheels, which carried them on with ease and evenness. They were full of eyes round about, plainly denoting that the motions of Providence are all directed by infinite wisdom. The issues of things are not determined by a blind fortune, but by those eyes of the Lord which run to and fro through the earth, and are in every place, beholding the evil and the good.

II. The notice he took of the firmament above over the heads of the living creatures. What is done on earth is done under the heaven, under its inspection and influence. He saw: The firmament was as the colour of the terrible crystal; the vastness and brightness of it struck him with an awful reverence. God is on high, above the firmament; the angels are under the firmament, which denotes their subjection to God's dominion. He heard the noise of the angels' wings, v. 24—to awaken the attention of the prophet to that which God was about to say to him from the firmament, v. 25. He heard a voice from the firmament, from him that sits upon the throne, v. 25. When the angels had roused a careless world, they stood still, and let down their wings, that there might be a profound silence, and so God's voice might be the better heard. The voice of Providence is designed to open men's ears to the voice of the word.

Verses 26–28

The other parts of this vision were but a preface. God in them had made himself known as Lord of angels and supreme director of all the affairs of this lower world. But now that a divine revelation is to be given to a prophet, we must look higher than the living creatures or the wheels, and must expect that from the eternal Word. Ezekiel, hearing a voice from the firmament, looked up, as John did, to see the voice that spoke with him, and he saw one like unto the Son of man, Rev. i. 12, 13. This glory of Christ that the prophet saw was above the firmament that was over the heads of the living creatures, v. 26. This dignity and dominion of the Redeemer before his incarnation magnify his condescension in his incarnation. The first thing he observed was a throne; for divine revelation comes backed with a royal authority. We must have an eye of faith to God and Christ as upon a throne. The first thing that John discovered in his visions was a throne set in heaven (Rev. iv. 2). It is a throne of glory, a throne of grace, a throne of triumph, a throne of government, a throne of judgment. On the throne he saw the appearance of a man. This is good news to the children of men, that the throne above the firmament is filled with one that is not ashamed to appear, even there, in the likeness of man. He saw him as a prince and judge upon this throne, in more than human glory, v. 27, for God dwells in light, and covers himself with light as with a garment. There was the appearance of fire, round about within the amber; it was inward and involved. That below was outward. Some make the former to signify Christ's divine nature, hidden within the colour of amber; it is what no man has seen nor can see. The latter they suppose to be his human nature, the glory of which there were those who saw; the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth, John i. 14. The throne is surrounded with a rainbow, v. 28. It is so in St. John's vision, Rev. iv. 3. As it is a display of majesty, so it is a pledge of mercy, for it is a confirmation of the gracious promise God has made. Now that the fire of God's wrath was breaking out against Jerusalem, he would look upon the bow and remember the covenant, as he promised in such a case, Lev. xxvi. 42. The conclusion of this vision. This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord. Here, as all along, the prophet is careful to guard against all gross corporeal thoughts of God. He does not say, This was the Lord (for he is invisible), but, This was the glory of the Lord, in which he was pleased to manifest himself a glorious being; yet it is not the glory of the Lord, but the likeness of that glory, some faint resemblance of it; nor is it any adequate likeness of that glory, but only the appearance of that likeness, a shadow of it, and not the very image of the thing, Heb. x. 1. When I saw it, I fell upon my face. He was overpowered by it. He fell upon his face in token of that holy awe and reverence with which his mind was possessed and filled. All he saw was only to prepare him for that which he was to hear; for faith comes by hearing. God delights to teach the humble.

CHAP. II

What our Lord Jesus said to St. Paul (Acts xxvi. 16) may fitly be applied to the prophet Ezekiel, "Rise and stand upon thy feet, for I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister." We have here Ezekiel's ordination to his office. I. He is commissioned to go as a prophet to the house of Israel, now captive in Babylon, ver. 1–5. II. He is cautioned not to be afraid of them, ver. 6. III. He is instructed what to say to them, signified by the vision of a roll (ver. 7–10).

Verses 1–5

God calls him, Son of man (v. 1, 3), Son of Adam, Son of the earth. We may take it, 1. As a humble diminishing title. Lest Ezekiel should be lifted up with the abundance of the revelations, he is put in mind of this, that still he is a son of man. Or, 2. We may take it as an honourable title; for it is one of the titles of the Messiah in the Old Testament (Dan. vii. 13, I saw one like the Son of man come with the clouds of heaven).

I. Ezekiel is made to stand, that he might receive his commission, v. 1, 2.

1. By a divine command: Son of man, stand upon thy feet. His lying prostrate was a posture of greater reverence, but his standing up would be a posture of greater readiness.

2. By a divine power going along with that command, v. 2. God made him stand up; but, because he had not strength of his own to recover his feet nor courage to face the vision, the Spirit entered into him and set him upon his feet. The Spirit set him upon his feet, made him willing to do as he was bidden, and then he heard him that spoke to him.

II. Ezekiel is sent with a message to the children of Israel (v. 3): I send thee to the children of Israel. They were now sent into captivity, for abusing God's messengers, and yet even there God sends this prophet among them.

1. The rebellion of the people to whom this ambassador is sent. They are called children of Israel; they retain the name of their pious ancestors, but they have degenerated, they have become Goim—nations, the word commonly used for the Gentiles. They had been all along a rebellious generation and had persisted in their rebellion: They and their fathers have transgressed against me. They were now hardened, impudent children, brazen-faced, self-willed.

2. "I do send thee unto them, and therefore thou shalt say thus and thus unto them," v. 4. All he said to them must be spoken in God's name, enforced by his authority, and delivered as from him. The writings of the prophets are the word of God, and so are to be regarded. When men's hearts are made to burn under the word, and their wills to bow to it, then they know and bear the witness in themselves that it is not the word of men, but of God. If they turn a deaf ear to the word they shall be made to know that he whom they slighted was indeed a prophet, by the reproaches of their own consciences and the just judgments of God upon them for refusing him.

Verses 6–10

The prophet, having received his commission, here receives a charge. It is here required of him,

I. That he be bold. Son of man, be not afraid of them, v. 6. Those to whom he sent him are briers and thorns, vexing a man, which way soever he turns. Wicked men are as briers and thorns, which hinder God's husbandry. They are scorpions, venomous and malignant. The sting of a scorpion is a thousand times more hurtful than the scratch of a brier. Ezekiel had been in vision, conversing with angels, but when he comes down from this mount he finds he dwells with scorpions. They would hector him and threaten him, that they might drive him off from being a prophet, or at least from threatening them with the judgments of God.

II. It is required that he be faithful, v. 7. 1. He must be faithful to Christ who sent him. 2. He must be faithful to the souls of those to whom he was sent. "It is true they are most rebellious; but, speak my words to them, whether they are pleasing or unpleasing."

III. It is required that he be observant of,

1. The instructions that were given him in the book which was spread before him, v. 10. The roll was written within and without, on the inside and on the outside. One side contained their sins; the other side contained the judgments of God coming upon them for those sins. He was sent on a sad errand; the matter contained in the book was, lamentations, and mourning, and woe. What could be more lamentable, more mournful, more woeful, than to see a holy happy people sunk into such sin and misery!

2. An express charge is given to the prophet both in receiving his message and delivering it. He is to attend diligently to it: Son of man, hear what I say unto thee, v. 8. If ministers connive at sin and indulge sinners for fear of displeasing them, they hereby make themselves partakers of their guilt. "Do not only hear what I say unto thee, but open thy mouth, and eat that which I give thee. Eat it willingly and with an appetite." He that brought it to the prophet spread it before him, that he might fully understand the contents of it, and then receive it and make it his own.

CHAP. III

The further preparation of the prophet for the work to which God called him. I. His eating the roll that was presented to him, ver. 1–3. II. Further instructions and encouragements, ver. 4–11. III. The mighty impulse he was under, with which he was carried to those that were to be his hearers, ver. 12–15. IV. His office and business as a prophet, under the similitude of a watchman, ver. 16–21. V. The restraining and restoring of the prophet's liberty of speech, ver. 22–27.

Verses 1–15

These verses are fitly joined by some translators to the foregoing chapter, as being a continuation of the same vision.

I. How he must receive divine revelation himself, v. 1. "Son of man, eat this roll, imprint it in thy mind, let thy soul be nourished and strengthened by it; be full of it, as thou art of the meat thou hast eaten." Whatever we find to be the word of God, whatever is brought to us by him who is the Word of God, we must receive it without disputing. If he that opens the roll, and by his Spirit, spreads it before us, did not also open our understanding, and by his Spirit, give us the knowledge of it and cause us to eat it, we should be for ever strangers to it. Though the roll was filled with lamentations, and mourning, and woe, yet it was to the prophet as honey for sweetness.

II. He must deliver that divine revelation to others which he himself had received (v. 1): Eat this roll, and then go, speak to the house of Israel. He is not sent to the Chaldeans to reprove them for their sins, but to the house of Israel to reprove them for theirs; for the father corrects his own child if he do amiss, not the child of a stranger. He must remember that they are the house of Israel whom he is sent to speak to, God's house and his own. They were such as he had an intimate acquaintance with, being not only their countryman, but their companion in tribulation. He must remember what God had already told him of the character of those to whom he was sent, that, if he met with discouragement and disappointment he might not be offended. They are impudent and hard-hearted (v. 7), no convictions of sin would make them blush, no denunciations would make them tremble. They were obstinate against God himself: "They will not hearken unto thee, and no marvel, for they will not hearken unto me." They are prejudiced against the law of God, and for that reason turn a deaf ear to his prophets, whose business it is to enforce his law. God will enable him to put a good face on it: "I have made thy face strong against their faces, endued thee with all firmness and boldness." The more impudent wicked people are in their opposition to religion the more openly and resolutely should God's people appear in the practice and defence of it. When vice is daring let not virtue be sneaking. He is therefore commanded to have a good heart and to go on in his work, not valuing either the censures or the threats of his enemies. Let not the angry countenance that drives away a backbiting tongue give any check to a reproving tongue. He must tell them not only what the Lord said, but that the Lord said it: Thus saith the Lord God; tell them so, whether they will hear or whether they will forbear. Not that it may be indifferent to us what success our ministry has, but, whatever it be, we must go on with our work and leave the issue to God. He heard a voice of a great rushing (v. 12), as if the angels thronged and crowded to see the inauguration of a prophet. He heard the noise of their wings that touched, and the noise of the wheels of Providence moving over against the angels and in concert with them. But all this noise ended in the voice of praise. He heard them saying, Blessed be the glory of the Lord from his place. With reluctance of his own spirit, and yet with a mighty efficacy of the Spirit of God, the prophet was brought to the execution of his office. The Spirit led him with a strong hand. God bade him go, but he stirred not till the Spirit took hım up (v. 14), lifted him up, and took him away to his work. Ezekiel would willingly have kept all he heard and saw to himself, but he was carried on by the prophetical impulse, so that he could not but speak the things which he had heard and seen, as the apostles, Acts iv. 20. He followed with a sad heart: The Spirit took me away, says he, and then I went, but it was in bitterness, in the heat of my spirit. He had perhaps seen what a hard task Jeremiah had at Jerusalem, what ill treatment he met with, and all to no purpose. "I went, not disobedient to the heavenly vision, or shrinking from the work, as Jonah, but I went in bitterness, not at all pleased with it." He went in the heat of his spirit, because of the discouragements he foresaw, but the hand of the Lord was strong upon him, to fit him and animate him against the difficulties he would meet and, when he found it so, he was reconciled to his business and applied himself to it: Then he came to those of the captivity (v. 15), and sat where they sat, and continued among them seven days to hear what they said and observe what they did; and all that time he was waiting for the word of the Lord to come to him. He was there astonished, overwhelmed with grief for the sins and miseries of his people and overpowered by the vision he had seen.

These further instructions God gave to the prophet at the end of seven days, that is, on the seventh day after the vision he had; and it is probable that both that and this were on the sabbath day. The word of the Lord then and there came to him. He that had been musing and meditating on the things of God all the week, was fit to speak to the people in God's name on the sabbath day, and to hear God speak to him. He is plainly, and by a similitude, told his duty, which he is to communicate to the people.

I. The office to which the prophet is called: Son of man, I have made thee a watchman to the house of Israel, v. 17. He is a watchman, appointed to be as a watchman in the city, as a watchman over the flock, as a watchman in the camp, in an invaded country or a besieged town, to watch the motions of the enemy, and to sound an alarm upon the approach of danger. This supposes the house of Israel to be in a military state, and exposed to enemies, who are subtle. Watchmen are in peril of death from the enemy, who gain their point if they kill the sentinel; and yet they dare not quit their post upon pain of death from their general. Such a dilemma are the church's watchmen in; men will curse them if they be faithful, and God will curse them if they be false.

II. The work of a watchman is to take notice and to give notice.

1. The prophet, as a watchman, must take notice of what God said concerning this people. He must not, as other watchmen, look round to spy danger and gain intelligence, but he must look up to God, and further he need not look: Hear the word at my mouth, v. 17.

2. He must give notice of what he heard, not in his own name, or as from himself, but in God's name, and from him. God has said, and does say, to every wicked man, that if he go on still in his trespasses he shall surely die. His iniquity shall undoubtedly be his ruin. If a wicked man turn from his wickedness, and from his wicked way, he shall live, and the ruin he is threatened with shall be prevented; and, that he may do so, he is warned of the danger he is in. It is the duty of ministers both to warn sinners of the danger of sin and to assure them of the benefit of repentance. Those that are faithful shall have their reward, though they be not successful. Some of those Ezekiel had to deal with were righteous, and he must warn them not to turn away from their righteousness, v. 20, 21. One good means to keep us from falling is to keep up a holy fear of falling, Heb. iv. 1. When men turn from their righteousness they soon learn to commit iniquity. When they grow careless and remiss in the duties of God's worship, they become an easy prey to the tempter. The righteousness which men relinquish will stand them in no stead because not continued. We must not only not flatter the wicked, but not flatter even the righteous as if they were perfectly safe anywhere on this side heaven. Nothing is more beautiful than a wise reprover upon an obedient ear; the one shall live because he is warned and the other has delivered his soul.

Verses 22–27

After all this discovery which God had made of himself to the prophet, and the full instructions he had given him, his work, at first, seems not in proportion to his call. To encourage him against the difficulties he foresaw, God favours him with another vision of his glory. God calls him out to the plain (v. 22) to talk with him. See the condescension of God in conversing thus familiarly with a poor captive, nay, with a sinful man, who went in bitterness of spirit, and was at this time out of humour with his work. It is very comfortable to be alone with God, withdrawn from the world for converse with him, to speak to him; and a good man will say that he is never less alone than when thus alone. Ezekiel went forth into the plain more willingly than he went among those of the captivity (v. 15). He went out into the plain, and there saw the same vision that he had seen by the river of Chebar. God called him out to talk with him, but did more than that: he showed him his glory, v. 23. We are not now to expect such visions, but we must own that we have a favour done us if we so by faith behold the glory of the Lord as to be changed into the same image, by the Spirit of the Lord. One would have expected now that God would send him directly to the chief place of concourse, and make him and his message acceptable, that he would have a wider door of opportunity opened to him, but what is here said to him is the reverse of all this. Instead of sending him to a public assembly, he orders him to confine himself to his own lodgings: Go, shut thyself within thy house, v. 24. He was not willing to appear in public, and, when he did, the people did not regard him, and as a just rebuke both to him and them, to him for his shyness and to them for their coldness, God forbids him to appear in public. He must shut himself within his house, that he might receive further discoveries of the mind of God. The elders of Judah visited him and sat before him in his house (ch. viii. 1), to be witnesses of his ecstasies; but it was not till ch. xi. 25 that he spoke to those of the captivity all the things that the Lord had shown him. Instead of securing him the esteem and affections of those to whom he sent him God tells him that they shall put bands upon him and bind him (v. 25) in order to further punish him as a disturber of the peace. Though they were themselves sent into bondage in Babylon for persecuting the prophets, yet there they continue to persecute them. They would bind him, under pretence of his being mad. Instead of opening his lips that his mouth might show forth God's praise, God silenced him, so that he was dumb for a considerable time, v. 26. He that can speak best is forbidden to speak at all; and the reason given is because they are a rebellious house to whom he is sent, and they are not worthy to have him for a reprover. But when God speaks with him, and designs to speak by him, he will open his mouth, v. 27. Instead of giving him assurance of success when he should at any time speak to the people, he here leaves the matter doubtful, and Ezekiel must not perplex and disquiet himself about it, but let it be as it will.

CHAP. IV

The captives in Babylon had Jerusalem still upon their hearts; the pious looked towards it with an eye of faith, the presumptuous looked towards it with an eye of pride, and flattered themselves with a conceit that they should shortly return. Those that remained corresponded with the captives, and buoyed them up with hopes that all would be well yet, as long as Jerusalem was standing in its strength. God gives the prophet, in this chapter, a very clear and affecting foresight of the besieging of Jerusalem by the Chaldean army and the calamities which would attend that siege. I. The fortifications that should be raised against the city (ver. 1–8). II. The famine that should rage within the city; signified by his eating coarse fare, ver. 9–17.

Verses 1–8

The prophet is here ordered to represent by signs the siege of Jerusalem; and this amounted to a prediction.

I. He was ordered to engrave a draught of Jerusalem upon a tile, v. 1. It was Jerusalem's honour that God had graven her upon the palms of his hands (Isa. xlix. 16), and the names of the tribes were engraven in precious stones on the breastplate of the high priest; but, now that the faithful city has become a harlot, a worthless brittle tile or brick is thought good enough to portray it upon.

II. He was ordered to build little forts against this portraiture of the city, resembling the batteries raised by the besiegers, v. 2. Between the city and the besieger he was to set up an iron pan, as an iron wall, v. 3. This represented the inflexible resolution of both sides; the Chaldeans resolved they would never quit till they had conquered; the Jews resolved never to capitulate.

III. He was ordered to lie upon his side before it, as it were to surround it, representing the Chaldean army lying before it to block it up. He was to lie on his left side 390 days (v. 5); the siege of Jerusalem is to last eighteen months (Jer. lii. 4–6), but if we deduct from that five months' interval, when the besiegers withdrew upon the approach of Pharaoh's army (Jer. xxxvii. 5–8), the number of the days of the close siege will be 390. Yet that also had another signification. The 390 days signified 390 years; and, when the prophet lies so many days on his side, he bears the guilt of that iniquity which the house of Israel, the ten tribes, had borne 390 years, reckoning from their first apostasy under Jeroboam to the destruction of Jerusalem, which completed the ruin of those small remains of them that had incorporated with Judah. He is then to lie forty days upon his right side, and so long to bear the iniquity of the house of Judah, the kingdom of the two tribes, because their sins were those which they were guilty of during the last forty years before their captivity. Judah, that had Josiah and Jeremiah, fills the measure of its iniquity in less time than Israel does. The prophet lay every day at a certain time of the day. When he received visits he was found lying 390 days on his left side and forty days on his right side before his portraiture of Jerusalem, which all might understand to mean the besieging of that city.

IV. He was ordered to prosecute the siege with vigour (v. 7): Thou shalt set thy face towards the siege of Jerusalem, as wholly intent upon it; so the Chaldeans would be. Nebuchadnezzar's indignation at Zedekiah's treachery in breaking his league with him made him very furious in pushing on this siege, that he might chastise that faithless prince and people. They exerted themselves to the utmost in all the operations of the siege, which the prophet was to represent by the uncovering of his arm, the stretching out of his arm, as it were to deal blows. He is said to make bare his arm, Isa. lii. 10. In short, The Chaldeans will go about their business, and go on in it, as men in earnest, who resolve to go through with it. Now, 1. This is intended to be a sign to the house of Israel (v. 3), to those in Babylon, and to those who remained in their own land. The prophet was dumb and could not speak (ch. iii. 26); but God left not himself without witness, but ordered him to make signs, to make known his mind (that is, the mind of God) to the people, who through their stupidity and dullness must be taught as children are, by pictures. Or the prophet made use of signs for the same reason that Christ made use of parables. Thus the prophet prophesies against Jerusalem (v. 7); and there were those who were the more affected with it by its being so represented, for images to the eye make deeper impressions upon the mind than words can, and for this reason sacraments are instituted to represent divine things. The power of imagination, if it be rightly used, and kept under the direction and correction of reason and faith, may be of good use to kindle devout affections. Fancy is like fire, a good servant, but a bad master. This whole transaction seemed childish and tiresome, but our ease must be sacrificed to our duty, and we must never call God's service a hard service. It could not but be against the grain to appear thus against Jerusalem, the city of God; but he is a prophet, and must follow his instructions, not his affections, and must plainly preach the ruin of a sinful place, though its welfare is what he passionately desires. All this that the prophet sets before the children of his people concerning the destruction of Jerusalem is designed to bring them to repentance. But observe, It is a day of punishment for a year of sin: I have appointed thee each day for a year. The siege is a calamity of 390 days.

Verses 9–17

The best exposition of this part of Ezekiel's prediction of Jerusalem's desolation is Jeremiah's lamentation of it, Lam. iv. 3, 4, &c., and v. 10.

I. The prophet here, to affect the people with the foresight of it, must confine himself for 390 days to coarse fare and short commons, ill-dressed, for they should want both food and fuel.

1. His food was to be of the worst bread, made of but little wheat and barley, and the rest of beans, and lentiles, and millet, and fitches, such as we feed horses or hogs, mixed as that in the beggar's bag, that has a dish full of one sort of corn at one house and of another at another house, v. 9. The prophet must eat but twenty shekels' weight of bread a day (v. 10), that was about ten ounces; and he must drink but the sixth part of a bin of water, that was half a pint, about eight ounces, v. 11. The prophet in Babylon had bread enough and to spare, yet, that he might confirm his prediction and be a sign to the children of Israel, God obliges him to live thus sparingly. Nature is content with a little, grace with less, but lust with nothing. It is good to stint ourselves of choice, that we may the better bear it if ever we should come to be stinted by necessity. He must bake it with man's dung (v. 12); that must serve for fuel to heat his oven. The coarse bread, thus baked, he must eat as barley-cakes. This nauseous piece of cookery he must exercise publicly in their sight, that they might be the more affected with the calamity approaching. In the extremity of the famine they should not only have nothing that was dainty, but nothing that was cleanly, about them. This circumstance of the sign, the baking of his bread with man's dung, the prophet humbly desired might be dispensed with (v. 14); it seemed a ceremonial pollution, for there was a law that man's dung should be covered with earth, that God might see no unclean thing in their camp, Deut. xxiii. 13, 14. And must he go and gather a thing so offensive, and use it in the dressing of his meat in the sight of the people? "Ah! Lord God," says he, "behold, my soul has not been polluted, and I am afraid lest by this it be polluted." The pollution of the soul by sin is what good people dread, and yet sometimes tender consciences fear it without cause, with scruples about lawful things, as the prophet here, who had not yet learned that it is not that which goes into the mouth that defiles the man, Matt. xv. 11. Now, because Ezekiel with a manifest tenderness of conscience made this scruple, God dispensed with him in this matter. God allowed Ezekiel to use cow's dung instead of man's dung, v. 15.

II. This sign signified,

1. That those who remained in Jerusalem should be brought to extreme misery for want of necessary food. All supplies being cut off by the besiegers, the staff of bread would be broken in Jerusalem, v. 16. Multitudes of them shall die of famine, they shall die so as to feel themselves die. And it is sin that brings all this misery upon them: They shall consume away in their iniquity (so it may be read). It is a righteous thing with God to deprive us of those enjoyments which we have made the food and fuel of our lusts.

2. It signified that those who were carried into captivity should be forced to eat their defiled bread among the Gentiles (v. 13), to eat meat made up by Gentile hands otherwise than according to the law of the Jewish church, which they were always taught to call defiled. Or they should be forced to eat putrid meat, such as their oppressors would allow them in their slavery, and such as formerly they would have scorned to touch.

CHAP. V

A further, and no less terrible, denunciation of the judgments of God, which were coming upon the Jewish nation. This destruction of Judah and Jerusalem is here, I. Represented by a sign the cutting, and burning, and scattering of hair, ver. 1–4. II. That sign is expounded, and applied to Jerusalem. 1. Sin is charged upon Jerusalem as the cause—contempt of God's law (ver. 5–7) and profanation of his sanctuary, ver. 11. 2. Wrath is threatened (ver. 8–10), a variety of miseries (ver. 12, 16, 17), such as should be their reproach and ruin, ver. 13–15.

Verses 1–4

The sign by which the utter destruction of Jerusalem is set forth; as before, the prophet is himself the sign, that the people might see how much he affected himself with the case of Jerusalem, and how near it lay to his heart.

I. He must shave off the hair of his head and beard (v. 1), which signified God's utter rejecting that people, as a worthless generation, such as could well be spared. Jerusalem had been the head, but, having degenerated, had become as the hair, which, when it grows thick and long, is but a burden. Ezekiel must not cut off that hair only which was superfluous but cut it all off, denoting the end that God would make of Jerusalem.

II. He must weigh the hair and divide it into three parts. Some make the shaving of the hair to denote the loss of their liberty and of their honour: it was looked upon as a mark of ignominy, as in the disgrace of Hanun put on David's ambassadors. It denotes also the loss of their joy, for they shaved their heads upon occasion of great mourning.

III. He must dispose of the hair so that it might all be destroyed, v. 2. 1. One third part must be burnt in the midst of the city, denoting the multitudes that should perish by famine and pestilence, and perhaps in the conflagration of the city, when the days of the siege were fulfilled. 2. Another third part was to be cut in pieces with a knife, representing the many who, during the siege, were slain by the sword. 3. Another third part was to be scattered in the wind, denoting the carrying away of some into the land of the conqueror and the flight of others into the neighbouring countries for shelter.

IV. He must preserve a small quantity of the third sort that were to be scattered in the wind, and bind them in his skirts, v. 3. This signified perhaps that little handful of people which were left under the government of Gedaliah, who, it was hoped, would keep possession of the land when the body of the people was carried into captivity. Thus God would have done well for them if they would have done well for themselves.

Verses 5–17

The explanation of the foregoing similitude: This is Jerusalem. The prophet's head, which was to be shaved, signified Jerusalem, which by the judgments of God was now to be stripped of its ornaments, to be emptied of its inhabitants, and to be set naked and bare, to be shaved with a razor that is hired, Isa. vii. 20. The head of one that was a priest, a prophet, a holy person, was fittest to represent Jerusalem, the holy city.

I. The privileges Jerusalem was honoured with (v. 5): I have set it in the midst of the nations and countries that are round about her. Jerusalem was situated in the midst of kingdoms that were populous, civilized, famed for learning, arts, and sciences. It was set in the midst of them as excelling them all—set in the midst of them as a candle upon a candlestick to spread the light of divine revelation to all the dark corners of the neighbouring nations, even to the ends of the earth. Jerusalem was to be as the heart in the body, to invigorate this dead world with a divine life. Had they preserved this reputation (1 Kings iv. 34), what a blessing would Jerusalem have been to all the nations about! But, failing to be so, the accomplishment of this intention was reserved for its latter days, when out of Zion went forth the gospel law and the word of the Lord Jesus from Jerusalem.

II. Jerusalem was guilty. A charge is here drawn up and proved beyond contradiction. 1. She had not walked in God's statutes, nor kept his judgments (v. 7); nay, the inhabitants of Jerusalem had refused his judgments and his statutes (v. 6). The people had not only broken God's laws, but had so perverted and abused them that they had made them the excuse and colour of their wickedness. They introduced the abominable customs and usages of the heathen, instead of God's institutions. She has changed my judgments, by idolatries and false worship, more than the nations (v. 6), and she has multiplied idols and altars, gods and temples, more than the nations that were round about. Israel's God is one, his name one, his altar one; but they multiplied their gods. They corrupted revealed religion more than the Gentiles had corrupted natural religion. Jerusalem profaned the holy things, which she had been both entrusted and honoured with (v. 11).

III. The punishments that Jerusalem should fall under.

1. God will take this work of punishing Jerusalem into his own hands. "You think it is only the Chaldean army that is against you, but they are God's hand, or rather the staff in his hand; it is I, even I, that am against thee, to speak against thee by prophets, to act against thee by providence." Those who will not observe the judgments of God's mouth shall not escape the judgments of his hand.

2. These punishments shall come from his displeasure. As to the body of the people, it shall not be a correction in love, but in furious rebukes (v. 15), strange expressions to come from a God who has said, Fury is not in me, and who has declared himself gracious, and merciful, and slow to anger. But they are designed to show the malignity of sin. As, when God is dishonoured by the sins of men, he is said to be grieved (Ps. xcv. 10), so when he is honoured by their destruction he is said to be comforted.

3. Punishments shall be public and open: I will execute these judgments in the sight of the nations (v. 8). Public sins call for public reproofs, so, if those prevail not, they call for public judgments. The nations will fear before the God of Israel, when they see how severely he punishes sin even in those that are nearest to him. It shall be an instruction to the nations, v. 15. Jerusalem should have taught her neighbours the fear of God by her piety and virtue, but, she not doing that, God will teach it to them by her ruin.

4. These punishments shall be such as have no precedent (v. 9): "I will do in thee that which I have not done in thee before, though thou hast long since deserved it." This is a rhetorical expression of the most grievous judgments, like that character of Hezekiah, that there was none like him, before or after him. The strongest bonds of natural affection will be broken which will be a just punishment for their wilfully breaking the bonds of duty to God (v. 10): The fathers shall eat the sons, and the sons shall eat the fathers, through the famine, or shall be compelled to do it by their barbarous conquerors. Some shall be taken away by the plague (v. 12); the pestilence shall pass through thee (v. 17), others shall be consumed with famine (v. 12). Others shall fall by the sword round about Jerusalem, v. 17. Others are devoured by evil beasts, which will make a prey of those that fly for shelter to the deserts and mountains. And, lastly, those who escape shall be scattered into all parts of the world, into all the winds (so it is expressed, v. 10, 12).

5. These punishments will prove their ruin by degrees. They shall be diminished (v. 11); bereaved (v. 17), emptied of all that which was their joy and confidence. We may well suppose that it looks further, to the final destruction of that great city by the Romans.

6. All this is ratified by the divine authority and veracity, v. 17. And they shall know that I the Lord have spoken it, v. 13. There were those who thought it was only the prophet that spoke it in his delirium; but God's word will prove itself.

CHAP. VI

I. A threatening of the destruction of Israel for their idolatry, and the destruction of their idols with them, ver. 1–7. II. A promise of the gracious return of a remnant of them to God, by true repentance and reformation, ver. 8–10. III. Directions given to the prophet, to lament the iniquities and the calamities of Israel, ver. 11–14.

Verses 1–7

I. The prophecy is directed to the mountains of Israel (v. 1, 2); the prophet must set his face towards them. If he could see so far as the land of Israel, the mountains would be first seen; towards them therefore he must look, steadfastly, as the judge looks at the prisoner, when he passes sentence upon him. Though the mountains of Israel be ever so strong, he must set his face against them, as having judgments to denounce that should shake their foundation. The mountains of Israel had been holy mountains, but now that they had polluted them with their high places God set his face against them and therefore the prophet must. But from the mountains the word of the Lord echoes to the hills, to the rivers, and to the valleys; for to them also the Lord God speaks.

II. That which is threatened is the utter destruction of the idols and the idolaters. God himself says, Behold, I, even I, will bring a sword upon you (v. 3); the sword of the Chaldeans is at God's command. The high places, which were on the tops of mountains (v. 3), shall be levelled and made desolate (v. 6). The altars, on which they offered sacrifice to strange gods, shall be broken to pieces and laid waste; the images and idols shall be defaced, shall be broken and cease, v. 4, 6. As all their high places shall be laid waste, so shall all their dwelling-places too, even all their cities, v. 6. It is added as a remarkable circumstance that they shall fall before their idols (v. 4), that their dead carcases should be laid, and their bones scattered, about their altars, v. 5. Thus the idols were upbraided with their inability to help their worshippers, and idolaters were upbraided with the folly of trusting in them.

Verses 8–10

Judgment had hitherto triumphed, but in these verses mercy rejoices against judgment. The ruin seems to be universal, and yet will I leave a remnant, a little remnant, and it is God that leaves them.

I. It is a preserved remnant, saved from the ruin (v. 8). None of those who were to fall by the sword about Jerusalem shall escape; for they trust to Jerusalem's walls for security. But some of them shall escape the sword among the nations, where, being deprived of all other steps, they stay themselves upon God only. They shall be the seed of another generation, out of which Jerusalem shall flourish again.

II. It is a penitent remnant (v. 9): Those who escape of you shall remember me. Where God designs grace to repent he allows space to repent; yet many who have the space want the grace, many who escape the sword do not forsake the sin.

1. The occasion of their repentance is a mixture of judgment and mercy—they were carried captives, but they escaped the sword in the land of their captivity. True repentance shall be accepted of God, though we are brought to it by our troubles; nay, sanctified afflictions often prove means of conversion.

2. The root and principle of their repentance: They shall remember me among the nations. The prodigal son never bethought himself of his father's house till he was ready to perish for hunger in the far country. Their remembering God was the first step they took in returning to him. They departed from God, from his word, which they should have made their rule, from his work, which they should have made their business. Their hearts departed from him. Their eyes also go after their idols. The malignity of this sin is that it is spiritual whoredom; it is a whorish heart that departs from God. They remember what a grief this was to him and how he resented it. In the day of their repentance it shall humble them more than anything, not so much that their peace was broken, and their country broken, as that God was broken by their sin.

3. The evidence of their repentance: They shall loathe themselves for the evils which they have committed in all their abominations. True penitents see sin to be an abominable thing, that abominable thing which the Lord hates and which makes sinners, and even their services, odious to him, Jer. xliv. 4; Isa. i. 11. It defiles the sinner's own conscience, and makes him, unless he be past feeling, an abomination to himself.

4. The glory that will redound to God by their repentance (v. 10): "They shall know that I am the Lord; finding that what I have said is made good, and made to work for good, and to answer a good intention."

Verses 11–14

The same threatenings are repeated, with a direction to the prophet to lament them.

I. He must by his gestures in preaching express the sense he had of the iniquities and the calamities of the house of Israel (v. 11): Smite with thy hand and stamp with thy foot. Two things the prophet must thus lament: 1. National sins. Alas! for all the evil abominations of the house of Israel. The sins of sinners are the sorrows of God's faithful servants. 2. National judgments. It is our duty to be affected not only with our own sins and sufferings, but with the sins and sufferings of others; and to look with compassion upon the miseries that wicked people bring upon themselves; as Christ beheld Jerusalem and wept over it.

II. He must inculcate what he had said before concerning the destruction that was coming upon them. 1. They shall be run down and ruined by a variety of judgments which shall find them out and follow them wherever they are (v. 12). 2. They shall read their sin in their punishment, v. 5–7. Where they had prostrated themselves in honour of their idols, God will lay them dead, to their own reproach and the reproach of their idols. 3. The country shall be all laid waste, as, before, the cities (v. 6): I will make the land desolate.

CHAP. VII

The prophet must tell them, I. That it will be a complete destruction, which will make a miserable end, ver. 1–6. II. That it is just at the door, ver. 7–10. III. That it is unavoidable, ver. 10–15. IV. That their strength and wealth should be no fence against it, ver. 16–19. V. That the temple shall itself be ruined, ver. 20–22. VI. That it shall be universal, the sin that brought it having been universal, ver. 23–27.

Verses 1–15

The prophet here proclaims, An end! an end! it has come, it has come. He that hath ears to hear let him hear.

I. The end which all the foregoing judgments had been working towards, as means to bring it about, was long in coming, but now it has come. This perhaps looks further, to the last destruction of that nation by the Romans. The end of all things is at hand; and Jerusalem's last end was a type of the end of the world, Matt. xxiv. 3.

II. An evil, an only evil, behold, has come, v. 5. Sin is an evil, an only evil, an evil that has no good in it; it is the worst of evils. But this is spoken of the evil of trouble. It is an evil without precedent or parallel, an evil that stands alone; you cannot produce such another instance. The wicked have the dregs of that cup to drink which to the righteous is full of mixtures of mercy, Ps. lxxv. 8.

III. The time has come, the set time, for to all God's purposes there is a time, a proper time. Though threatened judgments may be long deferred, yet they shall not be dropped. Though God's patience may put them off, nothing but man's sincere repentance and reformation will put them by.

IV. The whole body of the nation has become a vessel of wrath, fitted for destruction. Those shall have judgment without mercy who made light of mercy when it was offered them.

V. All this is the just punishment of their sins, and it is what they have by their own folly brought upon themselves. Two sins are particularly specified as provoking God to bring these judgments upon them—pride and oppression. 1. God will humble them by his judgments, for they have magnified themselves. The rod of affliction has blossomed, but it was pride that budded, v. 10. 2. Their enemies shall deal hardly with them, for they have dealt hardly with one another (v. 11).

VI. There is no escape from these judgments. Men shall be safe nowhere; for he that is in the field shall die by the sword (every field shall be to them a field of battle) and he that is in the city, though it be a holy city, yet it shall not be his protection, but famine and pestilence shall devour him. Sin had abounded both in city and country. Those that fall shall not be lamented (v. 11): There shall be no wailing for them, for there shall be none left to bewail them. None ever hardened his heart against God and prospered. Those that strengthen themselves in their wickedness will be found not only to weaken, but to ruin, themselves, Ps. lii. 7. The multitude cannot resist the torrent of these judgments, nor make head against them (v. 14): They have blown the trumpet, to call their soldiers, but all in vain. "Let not the buyer rejoice that he is increasing his estate and has become a purchaser; nor let the seller mourn that he is lessening his estate and has become a bankrupt," v. 12. See the vanity of the things of this world, and how worthless they are—in a time of trouble. It is added (v. 13), "The seller shall not return, at the year of jubilee, to that which is sold, according to the law, though he should escape the sword, and live till that year comes; for no inheritances shall be enjoyed here till the seventy years be accomplished, and then men shall return to their possessions, shall claim and have their own again."

Verses 16–22

Some of them shall escape (v. 16), but what the better? As good die once as, in a miserable life, die a thousand deaths, and escape only like Cain to be fugitives and vagabonds, and afraid of being slain by everyone they meet; so shall these be.

I. They shall have no comforter or satisfaction in their own minds, for, wherever they go, they carry about with them guilty consciences, which make them a burden to themselves. They shall be always solitary, alone upon the mountains, ashamed of the low circumstances to which they are reduced. They shall be always sorrowful. Those that once thought themselves as lions, now become as the doves of the valleys, so timid, and so dispirited, ready to flee when none pursues and to tremble at the shaking of a leaf. Sooner or later sin will have sorrow of one kind or other; and those that will not repent of their iniquity may justly be left to pine away in it. They shall be deprived of all their strength of body and mind (v. 17). They shall be deprived of all their hopes (v. 18).

II. They shall have no benefit from their wealth and riches, v. 19. They thought their wealth would be their strong city, that with it they could bribe enemies and buy friends, that it would be the ransom of their lives. It was no relief to them now in the day of their adversity; for gold and silver could not protect them from the judgments of God. Their gold and silver could not satisfy their hunger, nor serve to make one meal's meat for them. We could better be without mines of gold than fields of corn. Much less could they satisfy their souls, or yield them any inward comfort. Their gold and silver shall be thrown into the streets, because it would be an incumbrance to them and retard their flight, or because it would expose them and be a temptation to the enemy to cut their throats for their money.

III. God's temple shall stand them in no stead, v. 20–22. But here is the great dishonour they had done to God in profaning his sanctuary; they made the images of their counterfeit deities, and these they set up in God's temple, than which a greater affront could not be put upon him. And therefore, they shall be deprived of the temple, and it shall be no succour to them. Let the soldiers do as they will; let them enter into the secret place, into the holy of holies; its defence has departed.

Verses 23–27

I. The prisoner arraigned: Make a chain, in which to drag the criminal to the bar. The chain signified the siege of Jerusalem, or the slavery of those that were carried into captivity, or that they were all bound by the righteous judgment of God.

II. The indictment drawn up against the prisoner: The land is full of bloody crimes, full of the judgments of blood (so the word is). It is full of such crimes as by the law were to be punished with death, the judgment of blood. Idolatry, blasphemy, witchcraft, sodomy, and the like, were bloody crimes.

III. Judgment given upon this indictment. God will reckon with them not only for the profaning of his sanctuary, but for the perverting of justice between man and man. Since they had walked in the way of the heathen, and done worse than they, God would bring the worst of the heathen upon them to destroy them. Since they had filled their house with goods unjustly gotten, and used their power for oppressing the weak, God would give their houses to be possessed by strangers, and make the pomp of the strong to cease. Since they had set up the images of other gods in the temple, God would remove thence the tokens of the presence of their own God. Since they had followed one sin with another, God would pursue them with one judgment upon another—mischief upon mischief, and rumour upon rumour to frighten you, like the waves in a storm. They shall not have the direction in the trouble that they expect (v. 26): They shall seek a vision of the prophet to be assured of a happy issue. They did not desire a vision to reprove them for sin, nor to warn them of danger, but to promise them deliverance. They would not hear what God had to say to them by way of conviction, and therefore he has nothing to say to them by way of encouragement. Counsel shall perish from the ancients; the elders of the people, that should advise them what to do in this difficult juncture, shall be at their wits' end. None of the men of might shall find their hands.

CHAP. VIII

God, having given the prophet a clear foresight of the people's miseries that were hastening on, here gives him a clear insight into the people's wickedness. Here God, in vision, brings him to Jerusalem, to show him the sins that were committed there (ver. 1–4), and there he sees, I. The image of jealousy set up at the gate of the altar, ver. 5, 6. II. The elders of Israel worshipping all manner of images in a secret chamber, ver. 7–12. III. The women weeping for Tammuz, ver. 13, 14. IV. The men worshipping the sun, ver. 15, 16. God then appeals to him whether such a provoking people should have any pity shown them, ver. 17, 18.

Verses 1–6

Ezekiel was now in Babylon; but the messages of wrath he had delivered in the foregoing chapters related to Jerusalem. Here he has a vision of what was done at Jerusalem, and this vision is continued to the close of the 11th chapter.

I. The date of this vision. The first vision he had was in the fifth year of the captivity, in the fourth month and the fifth day of the month, ch. i. 1, 2. This was just fourteen months after. Perhaps it was after he had lain 390 days on his left side, to bear the iniquity of Israel, and before he began the forty days on his right side, to bear the iniquity of Judah; for now he was sitting in the house, not lying.

II. The prophet was himself sitting in his house deep perhaps in contemplation. The elders of Judah, that were now in captivity with him, sat before him. Some think it was on some extraordinary occasion that they attended him, to enquire of the Lord, and sat down at his feet to hear his word. Now that the elders of Judah were in captivity they paid more respect to God's prophets, and his word in their mouth. A minister's house should be a church for all his neighbours. Paul preached in his own hired house at Rome, and God owned him there, and no man forbad him.

III. The divine influence that the prophet was now under: The hand of the Lord fell there upon me.

IV. The vision that the prophet saw, v. 2. He beheld a likeness, all brightness above and all fire below, fire and flame. This agreed with the description we had before, ch. i. 27.

V. The prophet's vision of Jerusalem. He was lifted up between heaven and earth, and then perhaps in a trance or ecstasy, he had the following visions, whether in the body or out of the body, we may suppose, he could not tell, any more than Paul in a like case, much less can we. Those are best prepared for communion with God and the communications of divine light that by divine grace are raised up above the earth and the things of it. He was carried in vision to Jerusalem, and to God's sanctuary there.

VI. The discoveries made to him.

1. He saw the glory of God (v. 4), the same appearance that he had seen, ch. i. Ezekiel has this repeated vision of the glory of God. But it seems to have a further intention here. The more glorious we see God to be, the more odious we shall see sin to be, especially idolatry.

2. There he saw the reproach of Israel—the image of jealousy, set northward, at the gate of the altar, v. 3, 5. This was probably an image of Baal, which Manasseh made and set in the temple (2 Kings xxi. 7, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 3), which Josiah removed, but his successors, it seems, replaced there, as probably they did the chariots of the sun which he found at the entering in of the house of the Lord (2 Kings xxiii. 11), here said to be in the entry. But the prophet tells us that it was the image of jealousy, to convince our consciences that, whatever image it was, it was in the highest degree offensive to God and provoked him to jealousy. And now God appeals to him whether this was not sufficient ground for God to cast off this people. He will no more dignify and protect his sanctuary, but will give it up to reproach. But turn thyself yet again. Where there is one abomination it will be found that there are many more. Sins do not go alone.

Verses 7–12

A further discovery of the abominations committed at Jerusalem within the confines of the temple.

I. How this discovery is made. God, in vision, brought Ezekiel to the door of the court, the outer court, along the sides of which the priests' lodgings were. But, behold, a hole in the wall (v. 7), a spy-hole. This hole in the wall Ezekiel made wider, and behold a door, v. 8. This door he goes in by into the treasury, or some of the apartments of the priests, and sees the wicked abominations that they do there, v. 9.

II. What the discovery is. He sees a chamber set round with idolatrous pictures (v. 10). This was a sort of pantheon, a collection of all the idols together. Though the second commandment, in the letter of it, forbids any graven images, yet painted ones are as bad and as dangerous. He sees this chamber filled with idolatrous worshippers (v. 11): There were seventy men of the elders of Israel offering incense to these painted idols. They had every man his censer in his hand. They would all be their own priests. They think themselves out of God's sight: They say, The Lord seeth us not.

Verses 13–18

I. More abominations discovered to the prophet, v. 13–15. Women weeping for Tammuz, v. 14. Some think it was for Adonis, an idol among the Greeks, others for Osiris, an idol of the Egyptians, that they shed these tears. The image, they say, was made to weep, and then the worshippers wept with it. They bewailed the death of this Tammuz, and anon rejoiced in its returning to life again. These mourning women sat at the door of the gate of the Lord's house, and there shed their idolatrous tears, and some think, prostrating themselves also to corporeal whoredom. Men worshipping the sun, v. 16. And this was practised in the inner court of the Lord's house at the door of the temple of the Lord, between the porch and the altar. They turned their backs towards the temple of the Lord, and turned their faces towards the east, and worshipped the sun, the rising sun.

II. The inference drawn from these discoveries (v. 17): "Hast thou seen this, O son of man! and couldst thou have thought ever to see such things done in the temple of the Lord?" He appeals to the prophet himself. Is it an excusable thing in those that have God's oracles and ordinances that they commit the abominations which they commit here? Do not those deserve to suffer that thus sin? "They return to provoke me (they repeat the provocation, do it, and do it again), and lo, they put the branch to their nose"—a proverbial expression denoting perhaps their scoffing at God. Dr. Lightfoot says, They put the branch to their wrath, or to his wrath, as the Masorites read it; that is, they are still bringing more fuel to the fire of divine wrath, which they have already kindled. Though they cry in my ears with a loud voice, yet will I not hear them; for still their sins cry more loudly for vengeance than their prayers cry for mercy.

CHAP. IX

I. Preparation made of instruments that were to be employed in the destruction of the city, ver. 1, 2. II. The removal of the Shechinah from the cherubim to the threshold of the temple, ver. 3. III. Orders given for the marking of a remnant to be preserved from the common destruction, ver. 3, 4. IV. The warrant signed and the execution begun, ver. 5–7. V. The prophet's intercession for the mitigation of the sentence, ver. 8–10. VI. The report made by him that was to mark the pious remnant of what he had done in that matter, ver. 11.

Verses 1–4

I. The summons given to Jerusalem's destroyers. God's angels have received a charge now to lay that city waste, which they had long had a charge to protect and watch over. They are at hand, as destroying angels, as ministers of wrath, for every man has his destroying weapon in his hand, as the angel that kept the way of the tree of life with a flaming sword.

II. Their appearance, upon this summons, is recorded. Immediately six men came (v. 2), one for each of the principal gates of Jerusalem. The nations of which the king of Babylon's army was composed, which some reckon to be six, and the commanders of his army (of whom six are named as principal, Jer. xxxix. 3), may be called the slaughter-weapons in the hands of the angels. They came—from the way of the higher gate, which lies towards the north (v. 2), either because the Chaldeans came from the north (Jer. i. 14), or because the image of jealousy was set up at the door of the inner gate that looks towards the north, ch. viii. 3, 5.

III. The notice taken of one among the destroying angels. It should seem he was not one of the six, but among them, to see that mercy was mixed with judgment, v. 2. This man was clothed with linen, as the priests were, and he had a writer's inkhorn hanging at his side, as anciently attorneys had, which he was to make use of, as the other six were to make use of their destroying weapons. Here the honours of the pen exceeded those of the sword, for it is generally agreed that he represented Christ as Mediator saving those that are his from the flaming sword of divine justice. As high priest he wears fine linen, Rev. xix. 8. As a prophet he wears the writer's inkhorn. The book of life is the Lamb's book. The great things of the law and gospel which God has written to us are of his writing, and the Bible is the revelation of Jesus Christ. In the midst of the destroyers and the destructions that are abroad, there is a Mediator, a great high priest.

IV. The removal of the appearance of the divine glory from over the cherubim. Some think it was that display of the divine glory which the prophet now saw over the cherubim in vision. Ezekiel immediately observed that the glory of the God of Israel had gone up from the cherub: and what is a vision of angels if God be gone?

V. The charge given to the man clothed in linen to secure the pious remnant from the general desolation. We do not read that this Saviour was summoned and sent for, as the destroyers were; for he is always ready, appearing in the presence of God for us. This remnant that is to be saved are such as sigh and cry, sigh in themselves, as men in distress, cry to God in prayer. These pious few had witnessed against those abominations and had done what they could to suppress them. Orders are given to find those all out that are of such a pious public spirit: "Go through the midst of the city in quest of them, discover them, and set a mark upon their foreheads." A work of grace in the soul is to God a mark upon the forehead, which he will acknowledge as his mark, and by which he knows those that are his. God will set a mark upon his mourners, will book their sighs and bottle their tears.

Verses 5–11

I. A command given to the destroyers to do execution according to their commission.

1. They are ordered to destroy all. This was fulfilled in the death of multitudes by famine and pestilence, especially by the sword of the Chaldeans, as far as the military execution went. But what an evil thing is sin, then, which provokes the God of infinite mercy to such severity! Let not your eye spare, neither have you pity (v. 5). Those that live in sin, and hate to be reformed, will perish in sin; they might easily have prevented the ruin, and would not.

2. They are warned not to do the least hurt to those that were marked for salvation: "Come not near any man upon whom is the mark; do not so much as threaten or frighten any of them." God had promised that it should go well with his remnant and they should be well treated (Jer. xv. 11); and we have reason to think that none of the mourning praying remnant fell by the sword of the Chaldeans. In the last destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans the Christians were all secured in a city called Pella, and none of them perished.

3. They are directed to begin at the sanctuary (v. 6). They must begin there because there the wickedness began which provoked God to send these judgments. God's temple is a sanctuary, a refuge and protection for penitent sinners, but not for any that go on still in their trespasses.

4. They are appointed to go forth into the city, v. 6, 7. Though judgment begins at the house of God, yet it shall not end there.

II. They observed their orders. They began at the elders, the ancient men that were before the house, either those seventy ancients who worshipped idols in their chambers (ch. viii. 12) or those twenty-five who worshipped the sun between the porch and the altar. They proceeded to the common people.

III. Here is the prophet's intercession for a mitigation of the judgment (v. 8): While they were slaying them, and I was left, I fell upon my face. He speaks as one that narrowly escaped the destruction, attributing it to God's goodness, not his own deserts. We must look upon it that we are spared, that we may do good in our places, may do good by our prayers.

IV. Here is God's denial of the prophet's request for a mitigation of the judgment, v. 9, 10. God was as willing to show mercy as the prophet could desire; he always is so. But here the case will not admit of it; it is such that mercy cannot be granted without wrong to justice. The sinners justify themselves with the same atheistical profane principle with which they flattered themselves in their idolatry, ch. viii. 12. "The Lord has forsaken the earth, and left it to us to do what we will in it; he will not intermeddle in the affairs of it; and, whatever wrong we do, he sees not." Now how can those expect benefit by the mercy of God who thus bid defiance to his justice?

V. The writ of protection for the securing of those that mourned in Zion (v. 11): The man clothed with linen reported the matter, gave an account of what he had done: He had found out all that mourned in secret for the sins of the land, and cried out against them, and had marked them all in the forehead. Lord, I have done as thou hast commanded me.

CHAP. X

Again the prophet sees the vision of the glory of God as he saw it by the river Chebar. I. The scattering of the coals of fire upon the city, taken from between the cherubim, ver. 1–7. II. The removal of the glory of God from the temple, ver. 8–22.

Verses 1–7

I. The glorious appearance of divine majesty. Something of the invisible world is here made visible, faint representations of its brightness and beauty, shadows, but such as are no more to be compared with the truth and substance than a picture with the life. He is here in the firmament above the head of the cherubim, v. 1. It is the firmament of his power and of his prospect too; for thence he beholds all the children of men. He is here upon the throne. God's glory and government infinitely transcend all the brightest ideas our minds can either form or receive. The appearance of his glory is veiled with a cloud, and yet out of that cloud darts forth a dazzling lustre; in the house and inner court there was a cloud and darkness, which filled them, and yet the outer court was full of the brightness of the Lord's glory, v. 3, 4. Thus (Hab. iii. 4) he had rays coming out of his hand, and yet there was the hiding of his power. Nothing is more clear than that God is, nothing more dark than what he is. God covers himself with light, and yet makes darkness his pavilion. (See also, comments on Ezekiel ch. i.)

II. Further orders are to be given for the destruction of Jerusalem. Here we have a command to lay the city in ashes, by scattering coals of fire upon it, which in the vision were fetched from between the cherubim. The glory of the Lord was lifted up from the cherub and stood upon the threshold of the house, in imitation of the courts of judgment, which they kept in the gates of their cities. He that sits on the throne calls to the man clothed in linen to go in between the wheels, and fill his hand with coals of fire from between the cherubim, and scatter them over the city. This intimates the burning of the city and temple by the Chaldeans. The fire on God's altar, where atonement was made, had been slighted. The prophet, when he first saw this vision, observed that there were burning coals of fire, and lamps, that went up and down among the living creatures (ch. i. 13); thence this fire was taken, v. 7. The spirit of burning, the refiner's fire, by which Christ purifies his church, is of a divine original.

Verses 8–22

A further account of the vision of God's glory which Ezekiel saw, here intended to introduce the departure of that glory from them.

I. Ezekiel sees the glory of God shining in the sanctuary, as he had seen it by the river of Chebar. Ezekiel here sees the operations of divine Providence in the government of the lower world. The agency of the angels in directing the affairs of this world is represented by the close communication that was between the living creatures and the wheels, the wheels being guided by them in all their motions, as the chariot is by him that drives it. But the same Spirit being both in the living creatures and in the wheels denotes that infinite wisdom which serves its own purposes by the ministration of angels and all the occurrences of this lower world. The prophet observes that this was the same vision with that he saw by the river of Chebar (v. 15, 22). This world is subject to changes and revolutions. The course of affairs in it is represented by wheels (v. 9). Their appearance is as if there were a wheel in the midst of a wheel (v. 10), which intimates the references of providences to each other, their dependence on each other, and the tendency of all to one common end, while their motions are intricate and seemingly contrary. There is an admirable harmony and uniformity in the various occurrences of providence (v. 13): As for the wheels, though they moved several ways, yet it was cried to them, O wheel! they were all as one, being guided by one Spirit to one end. The motions of Providence are steady and regular, and whatever the Lord pleases that he does. The wheels turned not as they went (v. 11), and the living creatures went everyone straight forward, v. 22. The Spirit of God directs all the creatures, both upper and lower, so as to make them serve the divine purpose. Events are not determined by the wheel of fortune, which is blind, but by the wheels of Providence, which are full of eyes.

II. Ezekiel sees the glory of God removing out of the sanctuary, the place where God's honour had long dwelt, and this sight is sad. The glory of the Lord stood over the threshold, v. 4. But now it departed from off the threshold, and it stood over the cherubim, those that Ezekiel now saw in vision, v. 18. And immediately the cherubim lifted up their wings (v. 19), mounted up from the earth, and, when they went out, the wheels of this chariot were not drawn, but went beside them, by which it appeared that the Spirit of the living creatures was in the wheels. In the courts of the temple the people of Israel had dishonoured their God. The cherubim, and the glory of God above them, stood at the door of the east gate of the Lord's house, ready to depart and leave the house, v. 19. But with many stops and pauses God departs, as loth to go as if to see if there be any that will intercede with him to return. God removes by degrees from a provoking people; and, when he is ready to depart in displeasure, would return to them in mercy if they were but a repenting praying people.

CHAP. XI

This chapter concludes the vision which Ezekiel saw. I. A message of wrath against those who continued still at Jerusalem, ver. 1–13. II. A message of comfort to those who were carried captives into Babylon and were there in the depth of despondency. And, as the former are assured that God has judgments in store for them, so the latter are assured that God has mercy in store for them notwithstanding their present distress, ver. 14–21. And so the glory of God removes further, ver. 22, 23. The vision disappears (ver. 24), and Ezekiel faithfully gives his hearers an account of it, ver. 25.

Verses 1–13

I. The security of the princes of Jerusalem. The prophet was brought, in vision, to the gate of the temple where these princes sat in council. The Spirit lifted me up, and brought me to the east gate of the Lord's house, and behold twenty-five men were there. They are charged, not with corruptions in worship, but with mal-administration in the government; two of them are named, Pelatiah and Jaazaniah, the son of Azur. Some tell us that Jerusalem was divided into twenty-four wards, and that these were the aldermen of those wards, with their mayor or president. "These are the men that devise mischief; under pretence of public safety they harden people in their sins, and take off their fear of God's judgments threatened by the prophets; they give wicked counsel in this city, counselling them to silence the prophets, to rebel against the king of Babylon, and to resolve upon holding out to the last extremity." They are indicted for words spoken at their council-board (v. 3); they said to this effect, "It is not near; the destruction of our city, so often threatened by the prophets." Where Satan cannot persuade men to look upon the judgment to come as a thing doubtful and uncertain, yet he gains his point by persuading them to look upon it as a thing at a distance. If the destruction is not near, they conclude, Let us build houses; let us count upon a continuance, for this city is the cauldron and we are the flesh. This seems to be a proverbial expression, signifying, "We are as safe in this city as flesh in a boiling pot; the walls of the city shall be to us as walls of brass, and shall receive no more damage from the besiegers about it than the cauldron does from the fire under it." Perhaps it has reference to the flesh of the peace-offerings, which it was so great an offence for the priests themselves to take out of the cauldron while it was in seething (as we find 1 Sam. ii. 13, 14), and then it intimates that they were the more secure because Jerusalem was the holy city, and they thought themselves a holy people in it, not to be meddled with.

II. The method taken to awaken them out of their security. To help them to understand, the word of God is sent to them to give them warning (v. 4): Therefore prophesy against them, and try to undeceive them; prophesy, O son of man! upon these dead and dry bones. The Spirit of the Lord fell upon him, to make him full of power and courage, and said unto him, Speak. Let them know that God takes notice (v. 5): "I know the things which come into your minds every one of them, what secret reasons you have for these resolutions, putting so good a face upon a matter you know to be bad." God knows not only the things that come out of our mouths, but the things that come into our minds, not only all we say, but all we think. Thus you, with your stubborn humour, have filled the streets of Jerusalem with the slain, v. 6. Now these slain are the only flesh that shall be left in this cauldron, v. 7. They had provoked God to forsake the city, and thought they should do well enough by their own policy and strength when he was gone; but God will make them know that there is no peace to those that have left their God. Let them know that all this is the due punishment of their sin, and the revelation of the righteous judgment of God against them: You shall know that I am the Lord, v. 10 and again v. 12.

III. This awakening word is here immediately followed by an awakening providence, v. 13. It came to pass, when I prophesied, that Pelatiah the son of Benaiah died. It should seem, this was done in vision now, but it was an assurance that when this prophecy should be published it should be done in fact. The death of Pelatiah was an earnest of the complete accomplishment of this prophecy. Though the sudden death of Pelatiah was a confirmation of Ezekiel's prophecy, he was in deep concern about it, and laid it to heart as if he had been his relation or friend: He fell on his face and cried with a loud voice, "Ah! Lord God, wilt thou make a full end of the remnant of Israel? Shall the remnant which have escaped the sword die thus by the immediate hand of heaven?"

Verses 14–21

The prophet Ezekiel, having received instructions for the awakening of those that were at ease in Zion, is in these verses furnished with comfortable words for those that mourned in Babylon when they remembered Zion.

I. The pious captives were trampled upon and insulted by those who continued in Jerusalem, v. 15. They are thy brethren (says God to the prophet), they are the men of thy kindred. They are the whole house of Israel; God so accounts of them because they only have retained their integrity. They were not only of the same family and nation with Ezekiel, but of the same spirit. Those that were at ease scorned their brethren that were humbled. They cut them off from being members of their church. Because they had in compliance with the will of God surrendered themselves to the king of Babylon, they excommunicated them, and said, "Get you far from the Lord; we will have nothing to do with you. Unto us is this land given in possession, and you have forfeited your estates by surrendering to the king of Babylon, and we have thereby become entitled to them."

II. The gracious promises which God made to them. Those that hated them and cast them out said, Let the Lord be glorified; but he shall appear to their joy, Isa. lxvi. 5. God owns that his hand had gone out against them (v. 16): "It is true I have cast them far off among the heathen and scattered them among the countries; they look as if they were an abandoned people, but I have mercy in store for them." He will make up to them the want of the temple (v. 16): I will be to them as a little sanctuary, in the countries where they shall come. Those at Jerusalem have the temple, but without God; those in Babylon have God, though without the temple. God would in due time put an end to their afflictions, bring them out of the land of their captivity, and settle them again, them or their children, in their own land (v. 17). "You shall have the title as the patriarchs had, and those that come after shall have the possession." Their captivity shall effectually cure them of their idolatry. God will plant good principles in them; he will make the tree good, v. 19. This is a gospel promise, and is made good to all those whom God designs for the heavenly Canaan. All that are sanctified have a new spirit; they act from new principles, walk by new rules, and aim at new ends. A new name, or a new face, will not serve without a new spirit. This is God's work, his gift by promise. Their practices shall be consonant to those principles: That they may walk in my statutes in their whole conversation and keep my ordinances in all acts of religious worship, v. 20. But, as for those that have no grace, what have they to do with peace? Their heart walks after the heart of their detestable things. They have a heart after the heart of their idols.

Verses 22–25

The departure of God's presence from the city and temple. When the message was committed to the prophet, and he was fully apprized of it, then the cherubim lifted up their wings and the wheels beside them (v. 22) as before, ch. x. 19. The glory of the Lord removed to the mountain which is on the east side of the city (v. 23); that was the mount of Olives. On this mountain they had set up their idols, to confront God in his temple (1 Kings xi. 7). From that mountain there was a full prospect of the city; thither God removed, to make good what he had said (Deut. xxxii. 20), I will hide my face from them, I will see what their end shall be. It was from this mountain that Christ beheld the city and wept over it, in the foresight of its last destruction by the Romans. The glory of the Lord removed thither, to be as it were yet within call, if in this their day, they would have understood the things that belonged to their peace. The departure of this vision from the prophet: it went up from him (v. 24); he saw it mount upwards, till it went out of sight, a confirmation to his faith that it was a heavenly vision. The same spirit that had carried him in a trance or ecstasy to Jerusalem brought him back to Chaldea; for that is the place of his service. He delivered his message very honestly: he spoke all that, and that only, which God had shown him. It is better to be in Babylon under the favour of God than in Jerusalem under his wrath and curse.

CHAP. XII

Though the vision of God's glory had gone up from the prophet, yet his word comes to him still. I. The prophet, by removing his stuff, and quitting his lodgings, must be a sign to set forth Zedekiah's flight out of Jerusalem in the utmost confusion when the Chaldeans took the city, ver. 1–16. II. The prophet, by eating his meat with trembling, must be a sign to set forth the famine in the city during the siege, ver. 17–20. III. A message is sent from God to the people, to assure them that all these predictions should have their accomplishment very shortly, ver. 21–28.

Verses 1–16

Perhaps Ezekiel reflected upon the vision he had had of the glory of God, that often he was wishing it might come down to him again, but we do not find that he ever saw it any more, and yet the word of the Lord comes to him. We may keep up our communion with God without raptures and ecstasies. In these verses the prophet is directed,

I. By what signs and actions to express the approaching captivity of Zedekiah king of Judah; that was the thing to be foretold, and it is foretold to those that are already in captivity, because as long as Zedekiah was upon the throne they flattered themselves with hopes that he would rescue them shortly. It was therefore necessary to convince them that Zedekiah, instead of being their deliverer, should very shortly be their fellow-sufferer. To prepare them he must first give them a sign, must speak to their eyes first and then to their ears. He must speak to them by signs, as deaf people are taught. He must furnish himself with all necessaries for removing (v. 3), provide for a journey clothes and money; he must remove from one place to another, as one unsettled and forced to shift; this he must do by day, in the sight of the people; he must bring out all his household goods, to be packed up and sent away (v. 4); and, because all the doors and gates were either locked up or guarded he must dig through the wall, and convey his goods away clandestinely through that breach in the wall, v. 5. He must carry his goods away himself upon his own shoulders, in the twilight, that he might not be discovered; must himself steal away at evening in their sight, with fear and trembling, and must go as those that go forth into captivity (v. 4); he must cover his face (v. 6) in token of very great sorrow and must go away as a poor broken man, who quits his country. Thus Ezekiel must be himself a sign to them. God says (v. 3) "It may be they will consider, and will by it be taken off from their vain confidences, though they be a rebellious house." Ezekiel's ready obedience to the orders God gave him (v. 7): I did so as I was commanded.

II. He is directed by what words to explain those signs and actions. The prophet must do a strange uncouth thing, that they might enquire what it meant. The prophet is to tell them (v. 10), This burden concerns the prince in Jerusalem. "But tell them," says God, "that in what thou hast done they may read the doom of their friends at Jerusalem. Say, I am your sign," v. 11. The people shall be led away into captivity (v. 11): As I have done, so shall it be done unto them; they shall be forced away from their own houses, no more to return to them. The prince shall in vain attempt to make his escape; for he also shall go into captivity. Ezekiel here foretells it to those who promised themselves relief through him. He shall himself carry away his own goods. God can turn a prince into a porter. He that was wont to have the regalia carried before him, shall now himself carry his goods on his back and steal away out of the city in the twilight. All the avenues to the palace being carefully watched by the enemy, they shall dig through the wall to carry out thereby. He shall attempt to escape in a disguise, with a mask which shall cover his face, so that he shall not see the ground with his eyes. He shall be made a prisoner and carried captive into Babylon (v. 13). Jeremiah had said that king Zedekiah should see the king of Babylon and that he should go to Babylon; Ezekiel says, He shall be brought to Babylon, yet he shall not see it, though he shall die there. One said, He shall see the king of Babylon, the other said, He shall not see Babylon; and yet both proved true: he did see the king of Babylon at Riblah, where he passed sentence upon him for his rebellion, but there he had his eyes put out, so that he did not see Babylon when he was brought thither. Little joy could they have in seeing him when he could not see them. All his guards should be dispersed (v. 14): I will scatter all that are about him to help him, so that he shall be left helpless; and disperse them in the countries (v. 15). Yet of Zedekiah's scattered troops some shall escape (v. 16): That they may declare all their abominations among the heathen whither they come; and then they will acknowledge the justice of God and will make confession of their sins; and by this it shall appear that they were spared in mercy.

Here again the prophet is made a sign to them of the desolations that were coming on Judah and

Jerusalem. He must himself eat and drink in care and fear, especially when he was in company, v. 17, 18, that he might express the calamitous condition of those that should be in Jerusalem during the siege. He must tell them that the inhabitants of Jerusalem should in like manner eat and drink with care and fear, v. 19, 20, either because they are afraid it will not hold out, or because they are continually expecting the alarms of the enemy. The decay of virtue in a nation brings on a decay of everything else; and when neighbours devour one another it is just with God to bring enemies upon them to devour them all.

Verses 21–28

Various methods had been used to awaken this secure and careless people, that they might be stirred up, by repentance and reformation. The prophecies of their ruin were confirmed by visions, and illustrated by signs, but here we are told how they evaded the conviction, by telling themselves, and one another, that though these judgments threatened should come at last yet they would not come for a long time.

I. One saying they had, which had become proverbial in the land of Israel, v. 22. They said, "The days are prolonged; because the destruction has not come yet it will never come; we will never trust a prophet again, for we have been more frightened than hurt." And another saying was, "The vision is for a great while to come; it refers to events at a vast distance, so that we need not trouble our heads about them" (v. 27). That forbearance of God which should have led them to repentance hardened them in sin.

II. They are assured that they do but deceive themselves: Tell them, therefore, The days are at hand (v. 23), and again, There shall none of my words be prolonged any more, v. 28. God will certainly silence the lying proverbs, and the lying prophecies, with which they buoyed up their vain hopes: There shall be no more any vain vision, v. 24. God will certainly, and very shortly, accomplish every word that he has spoken. With what majesty does he say it (v. 25): I am the LORD! I am Jehovah! Those that see the visions of the Almighty do not see vain visions; God confirms the word of his servants by performing it. The days are at hand when you shall see the effect of every vision, v. 23.

CHAP. XIII

God's faithful prophets are nowhere so sharp upon any sort of sinners as upon the false prophets, not because they were the most spiteful enemies to them, but because they put the highest affront upon God and did the greatest mischief to his people. The prophet here shows the sin and punishment, I. Of the false prophets, ver. 1–16. II. Of the false prophetesses, ver. 17–23. Both agreed to sooth men in their sins, and to flatter them with hopes that they should yet have peace; but the prophets shall be proved liars, their prophecies shams, and the expectations of the people illusions.

Verses 1–9

The false prophets were some of them at Jerusalem (Jer. xxiii. 14): I have seen in the prophets at Jerusalem a horrible thing; some of them among the captives in Babylon, for to them Jeremiah writes (Jer. xxix. 8), Let not your diviners, that be in the midst of you, deceive you. Ezekiel must prophesy against them, in hopes that the people might be cautioned not to hearken unto them.

Ezekiel had express orders to prophesy against the prophets of Israel; so they called themselves, as if none but they had been worthy of the name of Israel's prophets, who were indeed Israel's deceivers. Ezekiel is directed

I. To discover their sin to them. They are here called foolish prophets (v. 3). They thrust themselves into the prophetic office, without warrant from him who is the Lord God of the holy prophets, which was a foolish thing; for how could they expect that God should own them in a work to which he never called them? They are prophets out of their own hearts (so the margin reads it, v. 2), prophets of their own making, v. 6. They put a reproach upon divine revelation, lessen its credit, and weaken its credibility. When these pretenders are found to be deceivers, atheists and infidels will thence infer, They are all so. The Lord has not sent them. They followed their own spirit (v. 3); they delivered that as a message from God which was the product either of their subtle invention, or of their own crazed and heated imagination. For they have seen nothing, they have not really had any heavenly vision. You have spoken vanity and seen lies; what they saw and what they said was all alike, a mere sham. Again (v. 9), They see vanity and divine lies; they pretended to have had visions, as the true prophets had, but either it was the creature of their own fancy that was seeing vanity, or it was a fiction of their own politics, and they knew they had none, and then they saw lies, and divined lies. They are like the foxes in the deserts, seeming to be in a great hurry, but it was to get away and shift for their own safety, not to do any good. They should have made intercession to turn away the wrath of God; but they were not praying prophets. They should have made it their business by preaching and advice to bring people to repentance and reformation, and so have made up the hedge, but they contrived how to please people, not how to profit them.

II. He is directed to declare the judgments of God against them for these sins, from which their pretending to the character of prophets would not exempt them. They are sentenced to be excluded from all the privileges of the commonwealth of Israel, for they are adjudged to have forfeited them all (v. 9). They shall not be in the secret of my people; their folly shall be so clearly manifested that they shall never be consulted, nor their advice asked; they shall not be in the assembly of God's people for religious worship. They shall die in their captivity, and shall die childless.

Verses 10–16

I. How the people are deceived by the false prophets. Those flatterers seduce them, saying, Peace, and there was no peace, v. 10. They told the idolaters and other sinners that there was neither harm nor danger in the way they were in. Thus they seduced God's people. Now this is compared to the building of a slight rotten wall, or, according to our Saviour's similitude (Matt. vii. 26), the building of a house upon the sand, which seems to be a shelter and protection for a while, but will fall when a storm comes. One false prophet built the wall, set up the notion that God was not at all displeased with Jerusalem, but that the city should be victorious over the powers that now threatened it. This notion was very pleasing, and he that started it made himself very acceptable by it. They made the matter look yet more plausible and promising; they daubed the wall, which the first had built, but it was with untempered mortar. And the wall thus built, when it comes to any stress, much more to any distress, will bulge and totter, and come down by degrees.

II. How they will be soon undeceived by the judgment of God, which, we are sure, is according to truth. The descent which the Chaldean army shall make upon Judah, and the siege which they shall lay to Jerusalem, will be as an overflowing shower. The fury of Nebuchadnezzar and his princes, who highly resented Zedekiah's treachery, made the invasion very formidable, but that was nothing in comparison with God's displeasure. This storm shall overturn the wall: it shall fall, and the wind shall rend it (v. 11), the hailstones shall consume it (v. 13); I will break it down (v. 14) and bring it to the ground, so that the foundation thereof shall be discovered; it will appear how false, how rotten it was, to the prophetical reproach of the builders. Men's anger cannot shake that which God has built, but God's anger will overthrow that which men have built in opposition to him. The builders of the wall, and those that daubed it, will themselves be buried in the ruins of it: It shall fall, and you shall be consumed in the midst thereof, v. 14. Both the deceivers and the deceived, when they thus perish together, will justly be ridiculed (v. 12): When the wall has fallen shall it not be said unto you, by those that gave credit to the true prophets, and feared the word of the Lord, "Now where is the daubing wherewith you have daubed the wall? What has become of all the fair promises wherewith you flattered and all the assurances you gave that the troubles of the nation should soon be at an end?" They will say unto you (v. 15), "The wall is no more, neither he that daubed it; your hopes have vanished, and those that supported them, even the prophets of Israel," v. 16.

Verses 17–23

As God has promised that when he pours out his Spirit upon his people both their sons and their daughters shall prophesy, so the devil, when he acts as a spirit of lies and falsehood, is so in the mouth not only of false prophets, but of false prophetesses too. Son of man, set thy face against the daughters of thy people, v. 17. The women pretend to a spirit of prophecy, and are in the same song with the men. They prophesy out of their own heart too; they say what comes uppermost. The prophet must set his face against them.

I. The sin of these false prophetesses is described. They told deliberate lies to those who consulted them, and came to them to be advised, and to be told their fortune: You do mischief by your lying to my people that hear your lies (v. 19). You pollute my name among my people, and make use of that for the patronising of your lies. Yet this they did for handfuls of barley and pieces of bread. They would sell you a false prophecy that should please you for the beggar's dole, a piece of bread or a handful of barley; and yet that was more than it was worth. They kept people in awe, and terrified them with their pretensions: You hunt the souls of my people (v. 18), hunt them to make them flee (v. 20). Thus they beguiled unstable souls that had a concern about salvation. They discouraged those that were honest and good, and encouraged those that were wicked and profane, v. 19. "You have promised sinners life in their sinful ways, have told them that they shall have peace though they go on, by which their hands have been strengthened and their hearts hardened." They mimicked the true prophets, by giving signs illustrating their false predictions (as Hananiah did, Jer. xxviii. 10), signs agreeable to their sex; they sewed little pillows to the people's arm-holes, to signify that they might repose themselves, and not be disquieted with apprehensions of trouble. And they made kerchiefs upon the head of every stature, of persons of every age, young and old, distinguishable by their stature, v. 18. These kerchiefs were badges of liberty or triumph, intimating that they should be delivered from the Chaldeans. Some think these were superstitious rites which they used with those to whom they delivered their divinations, preparing them by putting enchanted pillows under their arms and handkerchiefs on their heads.

II. God declares himself against the methods they took to delude and deceive, v. 20. They shall be confounded in their attempts (v. 23). God's people shall be delivered out of their hands. The pillows shall be torn from their arms, and the kerchiefs from their heads; the fallacies shall be discovered, their frauds detected, and the people of God shall no more be in their hand, to be hunted as they had been.

CHAP. XIV

I. The elders of Israel come to hear the word, and enquire of the prophet, but, because they are not duly qualified, they meet with a rebuke instead of acceptance (ver. 1–5) and are called upon to repent of their sins and reform their lives, ver. 6–11. II. Noah, Daniel, and Job, are supposed to pray for this people, and yet their prayers shall not be answered, ver. 12–21. And yet it is promised, in the close, that a remnant shall escape, ver. 22, 23.

Verses 1–11

I. The address which some of the elders of Israel made to the prophet, as an oracle, to enquire of the Lord by him. They came, and sat before him, v. 1. By the severe answer given them one would suspect they had a design to ensnare the prophet.

II. God gives him their real character (v. 3); they were idolaters, and did only consult Ezekiel as they would any oracle of a pretended deity, to gratify their curiosity, and therefore God says: "Should I be enquired of at all by them? They have set up their idols in their heart." It may be understood of spiritual idolatry; those whose affections are placed upon the wealth of the world and the pleasures of sense, whose god is their money, whose god is their belly, they set up their idols in their heart. It intimates that they are resolved to go on in sin, whatever comes of it. I have loved strangers, and after them I will go; that is the language of their hearts. Can those expect an answer of peace from God who thus continue their acts of hostility against him?

III. The answer which God orders Ezekiel to give them, v. 4. Let them know that it is a rule for every man of the house of Israel, that if he continue in love and league with his idols, and come to enquire of God, God will answer him according to his real iniquity, not according to his pretended piety. I the Lord, who speak and it is done, I will answer him that cometh, according to the multitude of his idols. He will give them up to their own hearts' lust, and leave them to themselves to be as bad as they have a mind to be, till they have filled up the measure of their iniquity. If God discover them, if he bind them over to his judgment, it is all by their own hearts. O Israel! thou hast destroyed thyself.

IV. This answer was for all the house of Israel, v. 7, 8. It concerns not only everyone of the house of Israel (as before, v. 4), but the stranger that sojourns in Israel. Even proselytes shall not be countenanced if they be not sincere. Hypocrites separate themselves from God by their fellowship with idols; they cut themselves off from their relation to God. He shall have his answer, not by the words of the prophet, but by the judgments of God. And I will set my face against that man. God will make him an example; for thus shall it be done to the man that separates himself from God, and yet pretends to enquire concerning him. The hypocrite thought to pass for one of God's people, but God will cut him off from the midst of his people.

V. The doom of those pretenders to prophecy who give countenance to these pretenders to piety, v. 9, 10. These hypocritical enquirers, though Ezekiel will not give them a comfortable answer, yet hope to meet with some other prophets that will; and if they do, as perhaps they may, let them know that God permits those lying prophets to deceive them in punishment. I will stretch out my hand upon him and will destroy him.

VI. The counsel that is given them for the preventing of this fearful doom (v. 6): "Therefore repent, and turn yourselves from your idols. Turn from them as from abominations that you are sick of; and then you will be welcome to enquire of the Lord."

VII. The pretending prophets, and the pretending saints, shall perish together, that, some being made examples, the body of the people may be reformed, that the house of Israel may go no more astray from me, v. 11.

Verses 12–23

I. National sins bring national judgments. When the land sins against me, when vice and wickedness become epidemical, when gross impieties and immoralities universally prevail, then I will stretch forth my hand upon it, for the punishment of it.

II. God has a variety of judgments wherewith to punish sinful nations. Four sore judgments are here specified: 1. Famine, v. 13. The denying and withholding of common mercies is itself judgment enough; he cuts off man and beast by cutting off the provisions which nature makes for both in the annual products of the earth. 2. Hurtful beasts, noisome and noxious. God can make these to pass through the land (v. 15), so that no man may pass through because of the beasts. When men revolt from their allegiance to God it is just that the inferior creatures should rise up in arms against man, Lev. xxvi. 22. 3. War. God often chastises sinful nations by bringing a sword upon them (v. 17): He says, Sword, go through the land. 4. Pestilence (v. 19), a dreadful disease, which has sometimes depopulated cities.

III. When God's professing people rebel against him, they may justly expect a complication of judgments to fall upon them.

IV. There commonly are some few very good men, even in those places that by sin are ripened for ruin. Even in a land that has trespassed grievously, there may be three such men as Noah, Daniel, and Job. Daniel was carried away into captivity, Dan. i. 6. Some of the better sort of people in Jerusalem might perhaps think that, if Daniel (of whose fame in the king of Babylon's court they had heard much) had but continued in Jerusalem, it would have been spared for his sake. "No," says God, "though you had him, who was as eminently good in bad times and places as Noah in the old world and Job in the land of Uz, yet a reprieve should not be obtained."

V. God often spares very wicked places for the sake of a few godly people in them. This is implied here as the expectation of Jerusalem's friends: "Surely God will stay his controversy with us; for are there not some among us that are emptying the measure of national guilt by their prayers, as others are filling it by their sins? And, rather than God will destroy the righteous with the wicked, he will preserve the wicked with the righteous."

VI. Such men as Noah, Daniel, and Job, will prevail, if any can, to turn away the wrath of God from a sinful people. Noah kept his integrity, and, for his sake, his family, though one of them was wicked (Ham), was saved in the ark. Job was mighty in prayer for his children, for his friends; and God turned his captivity when he prayed. Daniel, their neighbour, and companion in tribulation, being a man of great humility, instant and constant in prayer, had as good an interest in heaven as Noah or Job. Why may not God raise up as great and good men now as he did formerly, and do as much for them?

VII. When the sin of a people has come to its height, and the decree has gone forth for their ruin, the piety and prayers of the best men shall not prevail to finish the controversy. Though these three men were in Jerusalem at this time, yet they should deliver neither son nor daughter.

VIII. Though pious praying men may not prevail to deliver others, yet they shall deliver their own souls by their righteousness, so that, though they may suffer in the common calamity, yet it is not to them what it is to the wicked; it is sanctified, and does them good. If their bodies be not delivered, yet their souls are.

IX. Even when God makes the greatest desolations by his judgments, he reserves some to be monuments of his mercy, v. 22, 23. In Jerusalem itself, though marked for utter ruin, yet there shall be left a remnant, who shall be carried into captivity, both sons and daughters, the seed of a new generation. The young ones shall be brought forth by the victorious enemy, and behold they shall come forth to you that are in captivity, and shall come the more willingly to Babylon because so many of their friends have gone thither before them. And, when they come, you shall see their ways and their doings; you shall hear them make a free confession of sins and a humble profession of repentance with promises of reformation; and you shall see instances of their reformation, shall see what good their affliction has done them. They shall comfort you when you see their ways. "You shall be comforted concerning all the evil that I have brought upon Jerusalem when you better understand. You shall know that I have not done without cause, not without a just provocation, and yet not without a gracious design, all that I have done in it."

CHAP. XV

Ezekiel has again and again, in God's name, foretold the utter ruin of Jerusalem; but, it should seem, he finds it hard to reconcile himself to it. Here, in this short chapter, God shows him that it was as requisite Jerusalem should be destroyed as that the dead and withered branches of a vine should be cut off and thrown into the fire. I. The similitude is very elegant (ver. 1–5), but, II. The explanation of the similitude is very dreadful, ver. 6–8.

Verses 1–8

The prophet, we may suppose, was thinking what a glorious city Jerusalem was, and therefore what a pity it was that it should be destroyed. God here returns an answer to them by comparing Jerusalem to a vine. It is true, if a vine be fruitful, it is a most valuable tree. So Jerusalem was planted a choice and noble vine, wholly a right seed (Jer. ii. 21); and, if it had brought forth fruit suitable to its character as a holy city, it would have been the glory both of God and Israel. But, if it be not fruitful, it is as worthless as thorns and briers are. What is the vine more than any tree if the branch of it be as the trees of the forest; that is, if it bear no fruit, as forest-trees seldom do, being designed for timber-trees, not fruit-trees? Now there are some fruit-trees which, if they do not bear, are nevertheless of good use, as the wood of them may be made to turn to a good account; but the vine is not of this sort: if that do not answer its end as a fruit-tree, it is worth nothing as a timber-tree.

I. How this similitude is expressed here. The wild vine or the empty vine (which Israel is compared to, Hos. x. 1), is good for nothing. The wood of it is not taken to do any work; one cannot so much as make a pin of it to hang a vessel upon, v. 3. Among the plants, the roots of some, the seed or fruits of others, the leaves of others, and of some the stalks, are most serviceable to us; so, among trees, some are strong and not fruitful, as the oaks and cedars; others are weak but very fruitful, as the vine. The unfruitful tree is not meet for any work, it is cast into the fire, v. 4. When it is good for nothing else it is useful this way.

II. This similitude is applied to Jerusalem. 1. That holy city had become unprofitable and good for nothing. It had been as the vine-tree among the trees of the vineyard, abounding in the fruits of righteousness to the glory of God. When the pure worship of God was kept up, many a joyful vintage was gathered from it; and, while it continued so, God made a hedge about it, it was his pleasant plant (Isa. v. 7); he watered it every moment and kept it night and day (Isa. xxvii. 3); but it had now become the degenerate plant of a strange vine, a vine-tree among the trees of the forest, which, being wild, brings forth wild grapes (Isa. v. 4), nauseous and noxious (Deut. xxxii. 32), their grapes are grapes of gall, and their clusters are bitter. It is explained (v. 8): "They have trespassed a trespass, treacherously prevaricated with God." The Jewish nation, being famous as a holy people, when they became wicked, were thenceforth good for nothing; they lost all their usefulness, and became the most base and despicable people under the sun, trodden under foot of the Gentiles. Those who are not fruitful to the glory of God's grace will be fuel to the fire of his wrath (v. 6). The inhabitants of Jerusalem were like a vinebranch, rotten and awkward; and therefore (v. 7), I will set my face against them, as they set their faces against God, to defeat all his designs. I will make the land quite desolate, and therefore, when they go out from one fire, another fire shall devour them (v. 7); they shall go from misery in their own country to misery in Babylon.

CHAP. XVI

God shows the prophet, and orders him to show the people, that he did but punish them as their sins deserved. In the foregoing chapter he had compared Jerusalem to an unfruitful vine; in this chapter he compares it to an adulteress, that, in justice, ought to be abandoned. I. The despicable and deplorable beginnings of that church and nation, ver. 3–5. II. The many honours and favours God had bestowed upon them, ver. 6–14. III. Their ungrateful departures from him to the services of idols, ver. 15–34. IV. A threatening of judgments, which God would bring upon them for this sin, ver. 35–43. V. A comparison with Sodom and Samaria, ver. 44–59. VI. A promise of mercy which God would show to a penitent remnant, ver. 60–68.

Verses 1–5

Ezekiel is now among the captives in Babylon; but, as Jeremiah at Jerusalem wrote for the use of the captives (ch. xxix), so Ezekiel wrote for the use of Jerusalem. Jeremiah wrote to the captives for their consolation, Ezekiel is directed to write to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for their conviction and humiliation.

I. This is his commission (v. 2): "Cause Jerusalem to know her abominations (that is, her sins); set them in order before her." We should know our sins, that we may confess them.

II. That Jerusalem may be made to know her abominations, it was requisite that she should be put in mind of the great things God had done for her. She is in these verses made to know from what poor beginnings God raised her, and how unworthy she was of his favour. Jerusalem is here put for the Jewish church and nation, which is here compared to an outcast child, base-born and abandoned. 1. The extraction of the Jewish nation was mean: "Thy birth is of the land of Canaan (v. 3); thou hadst from the very first the spirit and disposition of a Canaanite." The patriarchs dwelt in Canaan, and they were there but strangers and sojourners, had not one foot of ground of their own but a burying-place. Abraham and Sarah were indeed their father and mother, but they were only inmates with the Amorites and Hittites, who, having the dominion, seemed to be as parents to the seed of Abraham (Gen. xxiii. 4, 8); the dependence they had upon their neighbours the Canaanites, and the fear they were in of them, Gen. xiii. 7; xxxiv. 30. The patriarchs, at their first coming to Canaan, went from one nation to another (Ps. cv. 13), as tenants from one farm to another. Their fathers had served other gods in Ur of the Chaldees (Joshua xxiv. 2); even in Jacob's family there were strange gods, Gen. xxxv. 2. The children of Israel, when they began to increase into a people were thrown out from the country intended for them; a famine drove them thence. Egypt was the open field into which they were cast; there they were ruled with rigour, and their lives embittered. The nation of Israel was doomed to destruction, like an infant newborn, not clothed, not swaddled, because not pitied, v. 4, 5. This infant is said to be cast out, to the loathing of her person. The Israelites were an abomination to the Egyptians, as we find Gen. xliii. 32; xlvi. 34. Moses tells them (v. 24), You have been rebellious against the Lord from the day that I knew you. They were not suppled, nor washed, nor swaddled; they were not at all tractable or manageable, nor cast into any good shape. God took them to be his people, not because he saw anything in them inviting or promising, but so it seemed good in his sight.

Verses 6–14

An account of the great things which God did for the Jewish nation in raising them up by degrees to be very considerable. 1. God saved them from the ruin they were upon the brink of in Egypt (v. 6). Those shall live to whom God commands life. God looked upon the world of mankind, designing it life, and that more abundantly. By converting grace, he says to the soul, Live. 2. He looked upon them with kindness and a tender affection, set his love upon them, though there was nothing lovely in them; but I looked upon thee, and, behold, thy time was the time of love, v. 8. It was the kindness and love of God our Saviour that sent Christ to redeem us, that sends the Spirit to sanctify us, that brought us out of a state of nature into a state of grace. 3. He took them under his protection. God took them into his care, as an eagle bears her young ones upon her wings, Deut. xxxii. 11, 12. When God sent Moses to Egypt to deliver them, then he spread his skirt over them. 4. He cleared them from the reproachful character which their bondage in Egypt laid them under (v. 9). All the disgrace of their slavery was rolled away when they were brought, with a high hand and a stretched-out arm, into the glorious liberty of the children of God. 5. He multiplied them and built them up into a people. This is here mentioned (v. 7) before his spreading his skirt over them, because their numbers increased exceedingly while they were yet bond-slaves in Egypt. 6. He admitted them into covenant with himself. This was done at Mount Sinai; "when the covenant between God and Israel was sealed and ratified then thou becamest mine." God called them his people, and himself the God of Israel. 7. He beautified and adorned them. This maid cannot forget her ornaments, and she is gratified with abundance of them, v. 10–13. We need not be particular in the application of these. Her wardrobe was well furnished with rich apparel. It may be taken figuratively for all those blessings of heaven which adorned both their church and state. In a little time they came to excellent ornaments, v. 7. The laws and ordinances which God gave them were to them as ornaments of grace to the head and chains about the neck, Prov. i. 9. God's sanctuary, which he set up among them, was a beautiful crown upon their head; it was the beauty of holiness. 8. He fed them with abundance, with plenty, with dainty. In Canaan they did eat bread to the full, the finest of the wheat, Deut. xxxii. 13, 14. 9. He gave them great reputation among their neighbours, and made them considerable. Thou didst prosper into a kingdom (v. 13), and, Thy renown went forth among the heathen for thy beauty, v. 14. Solomon's wisdom, and Solomon's temple, were very much the renown of that nation; and, if we put all the privileges of the Jewish church and kingdom together, we must own that it was the most accomplished beauty of all the nations of the earth.

We may apply this spiritually. Sanctified souls are truly beautiful; they are so in God's sight and they themselves may take the comfort of it.

Verses 15–34

An account of the great wickedness of the people of Israel, notwithstanding the great favours that God had conferred upon them. This wickedness of theirs is here represented by the lewd and scandalous conversation of that beautiful maid which was rescued from ruin. Their idolatry was the great provoking sin that they were guilty of; it began in the latter end of Solomon's time, and thenceforward continued till the captivity; and, though it now and then met with some check from the reforming kings, yet it was never totally suppressed.

This is that which is here represented under the similitude of whoredom and adultery, 1. Because it is the violation of a marriage-covenant with God. 2. Because it is the corrupting and defiling of the mind, and the enslaving of the spiritual part of the man. 3. Because it debauches the conscience.

I. The causes of this sin. 1. They grew proud (v. 15): "Thou trustedst to thy beauty, and didst expect that that should make thee an interest, and didst play the harlot because of thy renown." Solomon admitted idolatry, to gratify his wives and their relations. 2. They forgot their beginning (v. 22). 3. They were weak in understanding and in resolution (v. 30). The strength of men's lusts is an evidence of the weakness of their hearts.

II. The particulars of it. 1. They worshipped all the idols that came in their way, all that they were ever courted to the worship of; they were at the beck of all their neighbours (v. 15). 2. They adorned their idol-temples, and groves, and high places, with the fine rich clothing that God had given them (v. 16, 18). 3. They made images for worship of the jewels which God had given them (v. 17): The jewels of my gold and my silver which I had given thee. It is God that gives us our gold and silver. It is his still, so that we ought to serve and honour him with it, and are accountable to him for the disposal of it. Every penny has God's image upon it as well as Cæsar's. 4. They served their idols with the good things which God gave them (v. 18): "Thou hast set my oil and my incense before them, upon their altars; my meat, and fine flour, and oil, and that honey which Canaan flowed with, and wherewith I fed thee, thou hast regaled their hungry priests with, hast made an offering of it to them for a sweet savour. He that knows all things knows it." 5. They had sacrificed their children to their idols. Thou hast taken thy sons and thy daughters, and not only made them to pass through the fire, in token of their being dedicated to Moloch, but thou hast sacrificed them to be devoured, v. 20. It was an irreparable wrong to God himself. They are my children (v. 21), the sons and daughters which thou hast borne unto me, v. 20. He is the Father of spirits, and rational souls are in a particular manner his; and therefore the taking away of life, human life, unjustly, is a high affront to the God of life. How absurd was this, that the children which were born to God should be sacrificed to devils! The children of parents that are members of the visible church are to be looked upon as born unto God, and his children; as such, we are to love them, and pray for them, bring them up for him, and, if he calls for them, cheerfully part with them to him; for may he not do what he will with his own? 6. They built temples in honour of their idols. "After all thy wickedness of this kind committed in private, thou hast at length arrived at such a pitch of impudence as to proclaim it; now thou canst not blush," v. 23–25. Thou hast built there an eminent place, a brothel-house (so the margin reads it), and such their idol temples were. Thou hast made thy beauty to be abhorred. The Jewish nation, by leaving their own God, and doting on the gods of the nations round about them, had made themselves despicable in the eyes even of their heathen neighbours.

III. The aggravations of this sin.

1. They were fond of the idols of those nations which had been their oppressors and persecutors. As, (1) The Egyptians, (2) The Assyrians.

2. They had been under the rebukes of Providence, and yet persisted (v. 27): I have stretched out my hand over thee, to threaten and frighten thee. So God did before he laid his hand upon them to destroy them; and that is his method, to try to bring men to repentance first by less judgments.

3. They were insatiable in their spiritual whoredom: Thou couldst not be satisfied, v. 28 and again v. 29.

4. They were at great expense with their idolatry, and laid out a great deal of wealth in images and altars, and hiring priests to attend upon them from other countries. This is much insisted on, v. 31–34.

And now is not Jerusalem in all this made to know her abominations? Here we see with wonder and horror what the corrupt nature of men is when God leaves them to themselves, yea, though they have the greatest advantages to be better and do better.

Verses 35–43

This notorious adulteress, being found guilty, has sentence passed upon her. It is ushered in with solemnity, v. 53. An apostate church is a harlot. Jerusalem is so if she become idolatrous. How has the faithful city become a harlot!

I. The crime is stated and the articles of the charge are summed up (v. 36 and 43). 1. The violation of the first two commandments of the first table by idolatry, her whoredoms with her lovers, that is, with all the idols of her abominations. 2. The violation of the first two commandments of the second table by the murder of their own innocent infants: The blood of thy children which thou didst give unto them. Their base ingratitude is another aggravation of their sins: "Thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth, and the kindness that was done thee then, when otherwise thou wouldst have perished," v. 43. "Thou hast fretted me in all these things, not only angered me, but grieved me."

II. The sentence is passed in general: I will judge thee as women that break wedlock and shed blood are judged (v. 38), and those two crimes were punished with an ignominious death. This criminal must be exposed to public shame, v. 37. The calamities of Jerusalem will be the grief of her friends and the joy of her foes. Those whom they have suffered to strip them of their virtue shall see them stripped. And they shall stone thee with stones, and thrust thee through with their swords. When the walls of Jerusalem were battered down with stones shot against them, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem were put to the sword, then this sentence was executed in the letter of it. They shall throw down thy eminent place, and (v. 41) they shall burn thy houses, as the habitations of bad women are destroyed. It was the complaint, in the best reigns of the kings of Judah, that the high places were not taken away; but now the army of the Chaldeans shall break them down. The captivity in Babylon made the people of Israel to cease for ever from playing the harlot; it effectually cured them of their inclination to idolatry. Then (v. 42) my jealousy shall depart. I will be quiet, and no more angry.

Verses 44–59

Now God by the prophet shows Jerusalem,

I. That she was as bad as her mother, that is, as the accursed Canaanites that were the possessors of this land before her. As is the mother, so is her daughter, v. 44. The character of the mother was that she loathed her husband and her children, she had all the marks of an adulteress; and that is the character of the daughter. When God brought Israel into Canaan he particularly warned them not to do according to the abominations of the men of that land, who went before them (for which it had spewed them out, Lev. xviii. 27, 28), but they learned their way, and trod in their steps. It might truly be said that their mother was a Hittite and their father an Amorite (v. 45), for they resembled them more than Abraham and Sarah.

II. That she was worse than her sisters Sodom and Samaria, that were adulteresses too, that were weary of the gods of their fathers, and were for introducing new gods, and new fashions in religion.

1. Jerusalem's sisters, v. 45. Samaria is called the elder sister, or rather the greater, because it was much larger, and more nearly allied to Israel. This city of Samaria, and its villages, had been lately destroyed for their spiritual whoredom. Sodom, and the adjacent towns and villages was her less sister, less than Jerusalem, less than Samaria, and these were of old destroyed for their corporeal whoredom, Jude 7.

2. Jerusalem's sins resembled her sisters', particularly Sodom's (v. 49): This was the iniquity of Sodom, pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness. Their going after strange flesh, which was Sodom's most flagrant wickedness, is not mentioned, but those sins which opened the door to these more enormous crimes by their unnatural filthiness. Pride was the first sin that turned angels into devils, and the garden of the Lord into a hell upon earth. Gluttony is here called fulness of bread. Idleness, abundance of idleness was a dread of labour and a love of ease. Idleness is an inlet to much sin. The standing waters gather filth, and the sitting bird is the fowler's mark. Neither did she strengthen the hands of the poor and needy; probably it is implied that she weakened their hands and broke their arms.

3. The sins of Jerusalem exceeded those of Sodom and Samaria. The wickedness of the holy city, that was so dear to God, was more provoking to him than the wickedness of Sodom and Samaria, that had not Jerusalem's privileges and means of grace, v. 48. Samaria has not committed half thy sins (v. 51), has not worshipped half so many idols, nor slain half so many prophets. By this they justified Sodom and Samaria, v. 51. They pretended, in their haughtiness to judge them, and in the days of old, when they retained their integrity, they did judge them, v. 52. It will look like some extenuation of their sins that, bad as they were, Jerusalem was worse. For this they ought themselves to be greatly ashamed: "Thou who hast judged thy sisters, and cried out shame on them, now bear thy own shame, for thy sins which thou hast committed are more abominable than theirs," v. 52. There is nothing in sin which we have more reason to be ashamed of than that by our sin we have encouraged others in sin. They had looked with so much disdain upon their neighbours: Thy sister Sodom was not mentioned by thee in the day of thy pride, v. 56. If the Jews had but talked more frequently and seriously to one another, and to their children, concerning the wrath of God revealed from heaven against Sodom's ungodliness and unrighteousness, it might have prevented their treading in their steps.

4. What desolations God had brought and was bringing upon Jerusalem for these wickednesses, wherein they had exceeded Sodom and Samaria. (1) She has already long ago been disgraced, and has fallen into contempt, among her neighbours (v. 57). (2) She is now in captivity, or hastening into captivity, not only for her lewdness (v. 58), but for her perfidiousness and covenant-breaking (v. 59). Those that will not adhere to God as their God have no reason to expect that he should continue to own them as his people. (3) The captivity of the wicked Jews, and their ruin, shall be as irrevocable as that of Sodom and Samaria. In this sense, as a threatening, most interpreters take v. 53, 55. Sodom and Samaria were never brought back, nor ever returned to their former estate, and therefore let not Jerusalem expect it, that is, those who now remained there, whom God would deliver to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth for their hurt, Jer. xxiv. 9, 10.

In the close of the chapter, after a most shameful conviction of sin and most dreadful judgments, mercy is remembered, for those who shall come after. As was when God swore in his wrath concerning those who came out of Egypt that they should not enter Canaan, "Yet" (says God) "your little ones shall"; so here. And some think that what is said of the return of Sodom and Samaria (v. 53, 55), and of Jerusalem with them, is a promise; it may be understood so, if by Sodom we understand the Moabites and Ammonites, the posterity of Lot, who once dwelt in Sodom (Jer. xlviii. 47; xlix. 6). But these closing verses are, without doubt, a precious promise, which was in part fulfilled at the return of the penitent and reformed Jews out of Babylon, but was to have its full accomplishment in gospel-times, and in that repentance and that remission of sins preached to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem.

I. This mercy should take rise—from God himself, and his remembering his covenant with them (v. 60): "Nevertheless, I will remember my covenant with thee, that covenant which I made with thee in the days of thy youth, and will revive it again. Though thou hast broken the covenant (v. 59), I will remember it, and it shall flourish again."

II. They should be prepared and qualified for this mercy (v. 61): "Thou shalt remember thy ways, thy evil ways; God will put thee in mind of them, will set them in order before thee, that thou mayest be ashamed of them."

III. The mercy that God has in reserve for them. 1. He will take them into covenant with himself (v. 60): I will establish unto thee an everlasting covenant; and again (v. 62), I will establish, re-establish, and establish more firmly than ever, my covenant with thee. 2. He will bring the Gentiles into church-communion with them (v. 61): "Thou shalt receive thy sisters, the Gentile nations that are round about thee, thy elder and thy younger, ancient nations and modern, and I will give them unto thee for daughters; they shall be nursed and educated, by that gospel which shall go forth from Zion and from Jerusalem; so that all the neighbours shall call Jerusalem mother. They shall be thy daughters, but not by thy covenant, not as being proselytes to the Jewish religion, but as being converts with thee to the Christian religion." Or not by thy covenant may mean, "not upon such terms as thou shalt think fit to impose upon them as conquered nations, to whom thou mayest give law at pleasure; they shall be thy daughters by my covenant, the covenant of grace made with thee and them. I will be a Father both to Jews and Gentiles, and so they shall become sisters to one another."

IV. What the fruit and effect of this will be. 1. God will hereby be glorified (v. 62): "Thou shalt know that I am the Lord. It shall hereby be known that the God of Israel is a God of power, faithful to his covenant." You shall know it to your comfort. 2. They shall hereby be more humbled for sin (v. 63): "That thou mayest be the more confounded at the remembrance of all that thou hast done amiss, and mayest never open thy mouth any more in contradiction to God, but mayest be for ever submissive because of thy shame."

CHAP. XVII

God is reckoning with the king of Judah for his treachery in breaking covenant with the king of Babylon. Zedekiah was with the king of Egypt in a treacherous project he had formed to shake off the yoke of the king of Babylon, and violate the homage and fealty he had sworn to him. For this God by the prophet, I. Threatens the ruin of him and his kingdom, by a parable of two eagles and a vine (ver. 1–10), and the explanation of that parable, ver. 11–21. But, in the close, II. He promises hereafter to raise the royal family of Judah again, the house of David, in the Messiah and his kingdom, ver. 22–24.

Verses 1–21

1. The prophet is appointed to put forth a riddle to the house of Israel (v. 2), not to puzzle them for he is immediately to tell them the meaning of it. But he must deliver this message in a riddle or parable that they might the better remember it and tell it to others. Ministers should try various methods to do good; and should both bring that which is familiar into their preaching and their preaching too into their familiar discourse. 2. He is appointed to expound this riddle to the rebellious house, v. 12.

I. Nebuchadnezzar had some time ago carried off Jehoiachin, the same that was called Jeconiah, when he was but eighteen years of age and had reigned in Jerusalem but three months, him and his great men, and had brought them captives to Babylon, 2 Kings xxiv. 12. This in the parable is represented by an eagle's cropping the top and tender branch of a cedar, and carrying it into a land of traffic, a city of merchants (v. 3, 4), which is explained, v. 12. The king of Babylon took the king of Jerusalem, who was no more able to resist him than a young twig of a tree is to contend with the strongest bird of prey, that easily crops it off, perhaps towards the making of her nest. Nebuchadnezzar, in this parable, is the king of birds, a great eagle, that lives upon spoil. His dominion extends itself far and wide, like the great and long wings of an eagle; the people are numerous, for it is full of feathers; the court is splendid, for it has divers colours, which look like embroidering, as the word is. Jerusalem is Lebanon, a forest of houses. The royal family is the cedar; Jehoiachin is the top branch, the top of the young twigs. Babylon is the land of traffic and city of merchants where it is set.

II. When he carried him to Babylon he made his uncle Zedekiah king in his room, v. 5, 6. His name was Mattaniah—the gift of the Lord, which Nebuchadnezzar changed into Zedekiah—the justice of the Lord, to remind him to be just like the God he called his. This was one of the seed of the land, a native, not one of his Babylonian princes; he was planted in a fruitful field, for so Jerusalem as yet was; he placed it by great waters, like a willow-tree, which grows quickly, and grows best in moist ground, but is never expected to be a stately tree. He set it with care and circumspection (so some read it); that it might grow, but that it might not grow too big. He took of the king's seed (so it is explained, v. 13) and made a covenant with him that he should have the kingdom, and enjoy regal power, provided he held it as his vassal. He took an oath of him, made him swear allegiance by his own God, the God of Israel, that he would be a faithful tributary to him, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 13. He also took away the mighty of the land, the chief of the men of war, as hostages for the performance of the covenant, and that the king might be the less in temptation, to break his league. What he designed we are told (v. 14): That the kingdom might be base, might neither be a rival with its powerful neighbours, nor a terror to its feeble ones, that it might not lift up itself to vie with the kingdom of Babylon. But yet he designed that by the keeping of this covenant it might stand, and continue a kingdom. How sad a change sin made with the royal family of Judah. Time was when all the nations about were tributaries.

III. Zedekiah, while he continued faithful to the king of Babylon, did very well, and, if he would but have reformed his kingdom, and returned to God and his duty, he might soon have recovered his former dignity, v. 6. This plant grew, and though it was set as a willow-tree, and little account was made of it, yet it became a spreading vine of low stature, a blessing to his own country, and his fruits made glad their hearts; and it is better to be a spreading vine of low stature than a lofty cedar of no use. Nebuchadnezzar was pleased, for the branches turned towards him, and rested on him as the vine on the wall, and he had his share of the fruits of this vine; the roots thereof too were under him, and at his disposal. The Jews had reason to be pleased, for they sat under their own vine, which brought forth branches, and shot forth sprigs. See how gradually the judgments of God came upon this provoking people, and so gave them space to repent. He made their kingdom base, to try if that would humble them.

IV. Zedekiah knew not when he was well off, but grew impatient of being a tributary to the king of Babylon, and entered into a private league with the king of Egypt. If he had dealt faithfully, he might have been a goodly vine. But there was another great eagle that he had an affection for, and put a confidence in, and that was the king of Egypt, v. 7. Those two great potentates, the kings of Babylon and Egypt, were two great eagles, birds of prey. This great eagle of Egypt is said to have great wings, but not to be long-winged as the king of Babylon, because it was not of such a vast extent as that of Babylon was. The great eagle is said to have many feathers, much wealth and many soldiers, but which really were no more than so many feathers. Zedekiah, promising himself liberty, made himself a vassal to the king of Egypt. Now this vine did secretly and under-hand bend her roots towards the king of Egypt, and after awhile did openly shoot forth her branches towards him, give him an intimation how much she coveted an alliance with him, that he might water it by the furrows of her plantation, whereas it was planted by great waters, and did not need any assistance from him. This is expounded, v. 15. Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon in sending his ambassadors into Egypt, that they might give him horses and much people, to enable him to contend with the king of Babylon.

V. God here threatens Zedekiah with the utter destruction of him and his kingdom, for his treacherous revolt from the king of Babylon. This is represented in the parable (v. 9, 19) by the plucking up of this vine by the roots, the cutting off of the fruit, and the withering of the leaves. The project shall be blasted; it shall utterly wither. Shall he break the covenant, and be delivered from that vengeance which is the just punishment of his treachery?

1. His doom is ratified by the oath of God (v. 16): As I live, saith the Lord God, he shall die for it.

2. It is justified by the heinousness of the crime he had been guilty of. He had been very ungrateful to his benefactor, who had made him king, and had made him a prince when he might as easily have made him a prisoner. He had been very false. He despised the oath and broke it, v. 15, 16, 18, 19. The oath by which he had bound himself to the king of Babylon was a solemn oath. An emphasis is laid upon this (v. 18): When, lo, he had given his hand, as a confederate with the king of Babylon, as his friend, the joining of hands being a token of the joining of hearts. God says (v. 19): It is my oath that he has despised and my covenant that he has broken. The oath of allegiance to a prince is particularly called the oath of God (Eccles. viii. 2). Now

Zedekiah's breaking this oath is the sin which God will recompense upon his own head (v. 19), the trespass which he has trespassed against God, v. 20. Though Nebuchadnezzar was a worshipper of false gods, yet the true God will avenge this quarrel when one of his worshippers breaks his league with him; for truth is a debt due to all men. Having despised the oath, and broken the covenant, he shall not escape.

3. The punishment is made to answer the sin. He had rebelled against the king of Babylon, and the king of Babylon should be his effectual conqueror, v. 16. God himself will now take part with the king of Babylon against him: I will spread my net upon him, v. 20. He had relied upon the king of Egypt, and the king of Egypt should be his ineffectual helper: Pharaoh with his mighty army shall not make for him in the war (v. 17). On the approach of the Egyptian army, the Chaldeans withdrew from the siege of Jerusalem, upon their retreat they returned to it again and took it. Yet Zedekiah had bands but those bands, though we may suppose they were the best soldiers his kingdom afforded, shall become fugitives, shall fall by the sword of the enemy, v. 21. This was fulfilled when the city was broken up and all the men of war fled, Jer. lii. 7.

Verses 22–24

The unbelief of man shall not invalidate the promise of God. He will find out another seed of David in which it shall be accomplished.

I. The house of David shall again be magnified, and out of its ashes another phœnix shall arise. The metaphor of a tree, which was made use of in the threatening, is here presented in the promise, v. 22, 23. This promise had its accomplishment in part when Zerubbabel, a branch of the house of David, was raised up to head the Jews in their return out of captivity, and to rebuild the city and temple and re-establish their church and state; but it was to have its full accomplishment in the kingdom of the Messiah, Luke i. 32. 1. God himself undertakes the restoring of the house of David. Nebuchadnezzar had attempted the re-establishing of the house of David in dependence upon him, v. 5. But his plantation withered and was plucked up. "Well," says God, "the next shall be of my planting: I will also take of the highest branch of the high cedar and I will set it." 2. The house of David is revived in a tender one cropped from the top of his young twigs. Zerubbabel was so; that which was hopeful in him was but the day of small things (Zech. iv. 10), yet before him great mountains were made plain. Our Lord Jesus was the highest branch of the high cedar, the furthest of all from the root, but the nearest of all to heaven, for his kingdom was not of this world. He was taken from the top of the young twigs, a tender plant, and a root out of a dry ground (Isa. liii. 2), but a branch of righteousness, the planting of the Lord. 3. This branch is planted in a high mountain (v. 22), in the mountain of the height of Israel, v. 23. Thither he brought Zerubbabel in triumph; there he raised up Jesus, to gather the lost sheep of the house of Israel that were scattered upon the mountains, set him his king upon his holy hill of Zion, sent forth the gospel from Mount Zion, the word of the Lord from Jerusalem; there was the Christian church first planted. The churches of Judæa were the most primitive churches. 4. Thence it spreads far and wide. The Jewish state, though it began very low in Zerubbabel's time, was set as a tender branch, which might easily be plucked up, yet took root, spread and after some time those of other nations, fowl of every wing, put themselves under the protection of it. When the Gentiles flocked into the church then did the fowl of every wing come and dwell under the shadow of this goodly cedar. See Dan. iv. 21.

II. God himself will herein be glorified, v. 24. Never was there a more full conviction given of this truth, that all things are governed by an infinitely wise and mighty Providence, than that which was given by the exaltation of Christ and the establishment of his kingdom among men. All the trees of the field shall know, 1. That the tree which God will have to be brought down, and dried up, shall be so. 2. That the trees which God will have to be exalted, and to flourish, shall so be, though ever so low, and ever so dry. The house of Nebuchadnezzar, that now makes so great a figure, shall be extirpated, and the house of David that now makes so mean a figure, shall become famous again; and the Jewish nation, that is now despicable, shall be considerable. The kingdom of Satan, that has borne so long a sway, shall be broken, and the kingdom of Christ, that was looked upon with contempt, shall be established.

CHAP. XVIII

This chapter appears to concern us all, for, without particular reference to Judah and Jerusalem, it lays down the rule of judgment according to which God will deal with the children of men. I. The corrupt proverb used by the profane Jews, which gave occasion to the message here sent them, ver. 1–3. II. The reply given to this proverb, in which God asserts sovereignty and justice, ver. 4. But say to the righteous, It shall be well with them, ver. 5–9. In particular, he assures us, 1. That it shall be ill with a wicked man, though he had a good father, ver. 10–13. 2. That it shall be well with a good man, though he had a wicked father, ver. 14–18. And therefore in this God is righteous, ver. 19, 20. 3. That it shall be well with penitents, though they began ever so ill, ver. 21–23, and again ver. 27, 28. That it shall be ill with apostates, though they began ever so well, ver. 24, 26.

Verses 1–9

Sometimes evil proverbs beget good prophecies.

I. An evil proverb commonly used by the Jews in their captivity. This charges God with injustice: "You use this proverb concerning the land of Israel, now that it is laid waste by the judgments of God, saying, The fathers have eaten sour grapes and the children's teeth are set on edge; we are punished for the sins of our ancestors, which is as absurd as if the children should have their teeth set on edge by the fathers' eating sour grapes, whereas, if men eat or drink anything amiss, they only themselves suffer by it." Now God had often said that he would visit the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, especially the sin of idolatry, intending thereby to express the evil of sin. He had often declared by his prophets that in bringing the present ruin upon Judah and Jerusalem he had an eye to the sins of Manasseh and other preceding kings. They intended it as a reflection upon God. It is true that those who are guilty of wilful sin eat sour grapes; they will set the sinner's teeth on edge. When conscience is awake it will spoil the relish. But they suggest it as unreasonable that the children should smart for the fathers' folly and feel the pain of that which they never tasted.

II. A just reply to this proverb: "Your own consciences shall tell you that you yourselves have eaten the same sour grapes that your fathers ate before you, or else your teeth would not have been set on edge." God does not punish the children for the fathers' sins unless they tread in their fathers' steps and fill up the measure of their iniquity (Matt. xxiii. 32). It is only in temporal calamities that children fare the worse for their parents' wickedness, and God can make them work for good to those that are visited with them; but as to spiritual and eternal misery (and that is the death here spoken of) the children shall by no means smart for the parents' sins. He asserts his own absolute sovereignty: Behold, all souls are mine, v. 4. He that is the Maker of all things is in a particular manner the Father of spirits, for his image is stamped on the souls of men; it was so in their creation; it is so in their renovation. He forms the spirit of man within him. God bears a goodwill both to father and son, and will put no hardship upon either. He has such a kindness for all souls that none die but through their own default. Sin is the act of the soul therefore the punishment of sin is the tribulation and the anguish of the soul, Rom. ii. 9. If a man be just, do judgment and justice (v. 5), he shall surely live, saith the Lord God, v. 9. A just man is careful to keep himself: 1. From sins against the second commandment. In the matters of God's worship he has not so much as eaten upon the mountains, that is, not had any communion with idolaters by eating things sacrificed to idols, 1 Cor. x. 20. 2. From sins against the seventh commandment. He will keep the appetites of the body always in subjection to reason and virtue. 3. From sins against the eighth commandment. He is a just man, who has not, by fraud, oppressed any, spoiled any by violence, v. 7. A just man will not take advantage of his neighbour's necessity, but is willing to share in loss as well as profit. This is his character towards his neighbours; to complete his character he must be so to his God likewise (v. 9). This is a just man, and living he shall live.

Verses 10–20

God, by the prophet, having laid down the general rule of judgment, comes, in these verses, to show that men's parentage shall not alter the case.

I. It often happens that godly parents have wicked children and wicked parents have godly children.

1. A wicked man shall perish in his iniquity, though he be the son of a pious father. He is here supposed to allow himself in all those enormities which his good father dreaded. This wicked man shall perish, notwithstanding his being the son of a good father.

2. A righteous man shall be happy, though he be the son of a wicked father. Though the father did eat the sour grapes, if the children do not meddle with them, they shall fare never the worse for that. The graceless father alone shall die in his iniquity, but his gracious son shall fare never the worse for it.

II. He appeals to themselves then whether they did not wrong God with their proverb. "Thus plain the case is, and yet you say, Does not the son bear the iniquity of the father? No, he does not; he shall not if he will himself do that which is lawful and right," v. 19. But this people that bore the iniquity of their fathers had not done that which is lawful and right, and therefore justly suffered for their own sin and had no reason to complain of God's proceedings against them as at all unjust, though they had reason to complain of the bad example their fathers had left them as very unkind. Our fathers have sinned and are not, and we have borne their iniquity, Lam. v. 7. It is true that there is a curse entailed upon wicked families, but it is as true that the entail may be cut off by repentance and reformation; let the impenitent and unreformed therefore thank themselves if they fall under it. The settled rule of judgment is therefore repeated (v. 20): The soul that sins shall die, and not another for it. What direction God has given to earthly judges (Deut. xxiv. 16) he will himself pursue: The son shall not die, not die eternally, for the iniquity of the father, if he do not tread in the steps of it, nor the father for the iniquity of the son, if he endeavour to do his duty for the preventing of it. In the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God, which is now clouded and eclipsed, the righteousness of the righteous shall appear before all the world to be upon him, to his everlasting comfort and honour, upon him as a robe, upon him as a crown; and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him, to his everlasting confusion, upon him as a chain, upon him as a load, as a mountain of lead to sink him to the bottomless pit.

Verses 21–29

Another rule of judgment by which is demonstrated the equity of God's government. Here he shows that he will reward or punish according to the change made in the person himself. While we are in this world we are in a state of probation; the time of trial lasts as long as the time of life.

I. The case fairly stated, much as it had been before (ch. iii. 18, &c.), and here it is laid down once (v. 21–24) and again (v. 26–28), because it is a matter of life and death.

1. A fair invitation given to wicked people, to turn from their wickedness. Assurance is given that, if the wicked will turn, he shall surely live, v. 21, 27. The first step towards conversion is consideration (v. 28): Because he considers and turns. This consideration must produce an aversion to sin. He must turn from all his sins without a reserve for any Delilah, any house of Rimmon. This must be accompanied with a conversion to God and duty. Those that do thus turn from sin to God shall save their souls alive, v. 27. A repenting returning sinner is conscious that his obedience for the future can never be compensation for his former disobedience; but God's nature and delight, is to have mercy and to forgive (v. 23).

2. A fair warning given to righteous people not to turn from their righteousness, v. 24–26.

II. An appeal to the consciences even of the house of Israel, though very corrupt, concerning God's equity in all these proceedings. The charge they drew up against God is blasphemous, v. 25, 29. God's reasonings with them are very gracious, for even these blasphemers God would rather have convinced and saved than condemned.

Verses 30–32

Behold, a miracle of mercy; the day of grace and divine patience is yet lengthened out; and therefore, though God will at last judge everyone according to his ways, yet he waits to be gracious, and closes with a call to repentance and a promise of pardon upon repentance.

CHAP. XIX

The scope of this chapter is much the same with that of the 17th to foretell and lament the ruin of the house of David, ver. 1. And he does it by similitudes. I. The kingdom of Judah and house of David are here compared to a lioness, and those princes to lions, that were fierce and ravenous, but were hunted down and taken in nets, ver. 2–9. II. That kingdom and that house are here compared to a vine, and these princes to branches, which had been strong and flourishing, but were now broken and burnt, ver. 10–14.

Verses 1–9

I. Orders given to the prophet to bewail the fall of the royal family. The kings of Judah are here called princes of Israel; for their glory was diminished.

II. The prophet must compare the kingdom of Judah to a lioness, v. 2. The royal family is as a mother to the kingdom, a lioness, fierce, and cruel, and ravenous. She nourished her whelps among young lions, taught the young princes the way of tyrants. If they had adhered to the divine law and promise, God would have preserved to them the might and majesty of a lion, and does it in Christ, the Lion of the tribe of Judah. But these lions' whelps were cruel and oppressive. Jehoahaz, one of the whelps became a young lion (v. 3); he was made king, and thought he was made so that he might do what he pleased. He did not prosper long in his tyranny: The nations heard of him (v. 4), he was taken, as a beast of prey, in their pit, and brought in chains to the land of Egypt. Jehoiakim, instead of taking warning by his brother's fate, trod in his brother's steps: He went up and down among the lions, v. 6. And he soon learned to catch the prey, and he devoured men (v. 6); he seized his subjects' estates, and swallowed up all that stood in his way. He had the art of discovering where the treasures were which they had hoarded up: he knew their desolate places (v. 7). By his oppression he laid waste their cities. It did but hasten his own ruin (v. 8). God brought against Jehoiakim bands of the Syrians, Moabites and Ammonites, with the Chaldees (2 Kings xxiv. 2), and he was taken in their pit. Nebuchadnezzar bound him in fetters to carry him to Babylon, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6. There was an end of his tyranny: he was buried with the burial of an ass (Jer. xxii. 19).

Verses 10–14

Jerusalem, the mother-city, is here represented by another similitude; she is a vine, and the princes are her branches. This comparison we had before, ch. xv. Jerusalem is as a vine; the Jewish nation is so: Like a vine in thy blood (v. 10). Places of great wickedness may prosper for a while; and a vine set in blood may be full of branches. Jerusalem was full of able magistrates, that were strong rods, branches of uncommon strength, or poles for the support of this vine, for such magistrates are. The boughs had grown to such maturity that they were fit to make white staves for the sceptres of those that bore rule, v. 11. When the royal family of Judah was numerous, and the courts of justice were filled with men of sense and probity, then Jerusalem's stature was exalted among thick branches. When Zedekiah was quiet and easy under the king of Babylon's yoke his kingdom flourished thus. This vine is now destroyed. Nebuchadnezzar, provoked by Zedekiah's treachery, plucked it up in fury (v. 12), ruined the city, and cut off all the branches of the royal family. The vine itself is planted in the wilderness, v. 13. Babylon was as a wilderness to those of the people that were carried captives thither; the land of Judah was as a wilderness to Jerusalem. Those strong rods had been instruments of oppression, and now they are destroyed with him. Tyranny is the inlet to anarchy; and, when the rod of government is turned into the serpent of oppression, it is just with God to say, "There shall be no strong rod to be a sceptre to rule; but let men be as are the fishes of the sea, where the greater devour the less."

CHAP. XX

I. The prophet is consulted by some of the elders of Israel, ver. 1. II. He is instructed by his God what answer to give them. He must, 1. Signify God's displeasure against them, ver. 2, 3. And, 2. He must show them what just cause he had for that displeasure, by giving them a history of God's grateful dealings with their fathers. (1) In Egypt, ver. 5–9. (2) In the wilderness, ver. 10–26. (3) In Canaan, ver. 27–32. 3. The judgments of God against them, ver. 33–36. 4. He must tell them what mercy God had in store for them, ver. 37–44. 5. Another word towards Jerusalem, which is explained in the next chapter, ver. 45–49.

Verses 1–4

Certain of the elders of Israel came to enquire of the Lord. Their enquiry was whether now that they were captives in Babylon, where they had no temple, no synagogue, for the worship of God, it was not lawful for them, to join in worship and do as the families of these countries do, that serve wood and stone. They must be made to know that God is justly angry with them (v. 4): "Wilt thou judge them, son of man, wilt thou judge them? See, I have set thee over the nation; wilt thou not declare to them the judgment of the Lord? Cause them therefore to know the abominations of their fathers."

Verses 5–9

I. The gracious purposes of God's law concerning Israel in Egypt, where they were bond-slaves to Pharaoh. 1. He chose Israel to be a peculiar people to himself, though their condition was bad and their character worse, that he might have the honour of mending both. 2. He made himself known to them by his name Jehovah (a new name, Exod. vi. 3), when by reason of their servitude they had almost lost the knowledge of that name by which he was known to their fathers, God Almighty. 3. He made over himself to them as their God in covenant: I lifted up my hand unto them, saying it, and confirming it with an oath, I am the Lord your God. 4. He promised to bring them out of Egypt; and made good what he promised. 5. He assured them that he would put them in possession of the land of Canaan. He therefore brought them out of Egypt, that he might bring them into a land that he had spied out for them, a second garden of Eden.

II. The reasonable commands he gave them: "Cast you away every man his images that he uses for worship, that should be the abominations, of his eyes. Defile not yourselves with the idols of Egypt."

III. Their unreasonable disobedience to these commands, for which God might justly have cut them off as soon as ever they were formed into a people (v. 8). It was strange that all the plagues of Egypt would not prevail to cure them of their affection to the idols of Egypt. Justly might he have said, "Let them die with the Egyptians."

IV. The wonderful deliverance which God wrought for them, notwithstanding. Though they forfeited the favour while it was in the bestowing, yet mercy rejoiced against judgment, and God did what he designed purely for his own name's sake, v. 9. When nothing in us will furnish him with a reason for his favours he furnishes himself with one.

Verses 10–26

The history of the struggle between the sins of Israel, by which they endeavoured to ruin themselves, and the mercies of God, by which he endeavoured to save them and make them happy, is here continued. The story of Israel in the wilderness is referred to in the New Testament (1 Cor. x and Heb. iii), as well as often in the Old, for warning to us Christians.

I. The great things God did for them, which he puts them in mind of, not as grudging them his favours, but to show how ungrateful they had been. God brought them forth out of Egypt (v. 10), though, as it follows, he brought them into the wilderness and not into Canaan immediately. It is better to be at liberty in a wilderness than bond-slaves in a land of plenty. But, when they met with the difficulties of a desert, some wished themselves in Egypt again. God made them to know his judgments, not only enacted laws for them, but showed them the reasonableness and equity of those laws. He revived the ancient institution of the sabbath day, which was lost and forgotten while they were bond-slaves in Egypt. Sabbaths are signs; it is a sign that men have a sense of religion. Sabbaths, if duly sanctified are the means of our sanctification.

II. Their disobedient undutiful conduct towards God, for which he might justly have thrown them out of covenant (v. 13): They rebelled in the wilderness. There where they received so much mercy from God, and were in their way to Canaan, they broke out in open rebellions against the God that led them and fed them.

III. God's determination to cut off that generation of them in the wilderness. That which was at the bottom of their disobedience to God, and their neglect of his institutions, was a secret affection to the gods of Egypt: Their heart went after their idols.

IV. When he looked upon them he had compassion on them, and did not make an end of them, but reprieved them till a new generation was reared.

V. The revolt of the next generation from God, by which they also made themselves obnoxious to the wrath of God (v. 21): The children rebelled against me too. They polluted God's sabbaths, as their fathers.

It is said of the children (v. 24) that their eyes went after their fathers' idols. If they must have gods, they would have such as they could see.

VI. The judgments of God upon them for their rebellion. God gave them statutes and judgments which were not good, and by which they should not live, v. 25. By this we may understand the several ways by which God punished them while they were in the wilderness—the plague that broke in upon them, the fiery serpent, and the like—which are called judgments, because inflicted by the justice of God, and statutes, because he commanded desolations as sometimes he had commanded deliverances. Spiritual judgments are the most dreadful. He made their sin to be their punishment, gave them up to a reprobate mind, as he did the Gentile idolaters (Rom. i. 24, 26). God sometimes makes sin to be its own punishment, and there needs no more to make men miserable than to give them up to their own vile appetites and passions.

Verses 27–32

The prophet goes on with the story of their rebellions.

I. They had persisted in them after they were settled in the land of Canaan, v. 27. They were often very near being cut off in the wilderness, and yet they came to Canaan at last. Even God's Israel get to heaven by hell-gates; so many are their transgressions, and so strong their corruptions, that it is a miracle of mercy they are happy at last; as hypocrites go to hell by heaven-gates. They obstinately persisted notwithstanding all the admonitions that were given them (v. 29).

II. They are persisting still. The prophet must say to the present house of Israel, some of whose elders were now sitting before him, "Are you polluted after the manner of your fathers?" These elders seem to have been projecting a coalition with the heathen. Now the prophet is here ordered to tell those who were for compounding between God and Baal, that they should have no comfort or benefit from either. There is nothing got by sinful compliances; and the carnal projects of hypocrites will stand them in no stead.

The design on foot among the elders was that the people of Israel should conform to those among whom they lived; but God had told them that the design should not take effect, v. 32. In these verses, he shows how it should be frustrated.

I. Babylon shall not protect them, nor any of the countries of the heathen; for God will cast them out of his protection and then what prince, what place, can be a sanctuary to them? They shall be brought into the wilderness of the people (v. 35), either into Babylon, which is called a wilderness (ch. xix. 13), or into some place which, though full of people, shall be a place where God will plead with them face to face, as he pleaded with their fathers in the wilderness of Egypt (v. 36)—where he will avenge the breach of his law with as much terror as that with which he gave it in the wilderness of Sinai.

II. Israel shall be no more able to protect them than Babylon could. There will come a distinguishing day, when God will separate between the precious and the vile; he will cause them, as the shepherd causes his sheep, to pass under the rod, when he tithes them (Lev. xxvii. 32), that he may mark which is for God. Or it may refer to those among them that repented and reformed; he will cause them to pass under the rod of affliction, and will bring them again into the bond of the covenant. The judgments of God shall find them out, and their naming the name of Israel shall be no shelter to them. It is promised that those who preserved their integrity, and would not serve idols, in other lands, shall return to their prosperity and shall serve the true God in their own land: All of them in the land shall serve me. He will give them true repentance for their sins, v. 43. He will give them the knowledge of himself: They shall know by experience that he is the Lord, kind to his people and faithful to his covenant with them.

Verses 45–48

A prophecy of wrath against Judah and Jerusalem, which would more fitly have begun the next chapter than conclude this. The beginning of the next chapter is the explication of it, when the people complained that this was a parable which they understood not. In this parable, 1. It is a forest that is prophesied against, the forest of the south field, Judah and Jerusalem. These lay south from Babylon, and therefore he is directed to set his face towards the south (v. 46), to intimate that God had set his face against them. But, though it be a message of wrath, he must deliver it with tenderness; he must drop his word towards the south; his doctrine must distil as the rain (Deut. xxxii. 2), that people's hearts might be softened by it. Judah and Jerusalem are called forests because they had been empty of fruit, for fruit-trees grow not in a forest. Those that should have been as the garden of the Lord had become like a forest, overgrown with briers and thorns. It is a fire kindled in his forest that is prophesied, v. 47. I will kindle a fire in thee. He that had been himself a protecting fire about Jerusalem is now a consuming fire in it. All faces (that is, all that covers the face of the earth) from the south of Canaan to the north, from Beersheba to Dan, shall be burnt therein. The people, on occasion of this discourse, said, Does he not speak parables?

CHAP. XXI

I. An explication of the prophecy in the close of the foregoing chapter concerning the fire in the forest (ver. 1–5), with directions to the prophet to show himself deeply affected with it, ver. 6, 7. II. A further prediction of the sword that was coming upon the land, ver. 8–17. III. A prospect given of the king of Babylon's approach to Jerusalem, ver. 18–24. IV. Sentence passed upon Zedekiah, king of Judah, ver. 25–27. V. The destruction of the Ammonites by the sword, foretold, ver. 28–32.

Verses 1–7

The prophet faithfully delivered the message in the terms wherein he received it, but the word of the Lord came to him again, and gave him a key to that figurative discourse. 1. The prophet is here directed against whom to level the arrow of this prophecy. He must drop his word towards the holy places (v. 2), towards Canaan the holy land, Jerusalem, the holy city, the temple, the holy house. 2. The meaning of the fire that was to consume the forest of the south: it signified the sword of war which should make the land desolate (v. 3). Did the fire devour every green tree and every dry tree? The sword in like manner shall cut off the righteous and the wicked. The righteous were cut off from the land of Israel when they were sent captives in Babylon. In the beginning such excellent men as Daniel and his fellows, and Ezekiel, were cut off from it and conveyed to Babylon. But far be it from us to think that the righteous are as the wicked. God's graces and comforts make a great difference. The good figs are sent into Babylon for their good, Jer. xxiv. 5, 6. 3. The prophet is ordered, by expressions of his own grief and concern for these calamities that were coming on, to try to make impressions of the like upon the people. He must sigh as if his heart would burst, sigh with bitterness.

Verses 8–17

Another prophecy of the sword. The sword was unsheathed in the foregoing verses; here it is fitted up to do execution, which the prophet is commanded to lament.

I. The sword is sharpened. It is furbished, that it may glitter, to the terror of those against whom it is drawn. This sword is that rod of iron which contemns every tree and will bear it down. Or, This sword is the rod of my son, a correcting rod, for the chastening of the transgression of God's people (2 Sam. vii. 14), not to cut them off from being a people. It is a sword to others, a rod to my son.

II. How the sword is here put into the hand of the executioners. It is given into the hand, not of the fencer to be played with, but of the slayer to do execution.

III. Against whom it is sent (v. 12): It shall be upon my people; they shall fall by this sword. The sword of the heathen shall be upon God's own people. But, if the sword be at any time upon God's people, have they not comfort within sufficient to arm them against everything that is frightful? They have, while they conduct themselves as becomes his people; but these had not done so, and therefore terrors, by reason of the sword, shall be upon those that call themselves my people. This sword is directed particularly against the great men, for they had been the greatest sinners among them. The sword, the point of this sword, is directed against all their gates (v. 15), against all those things with which they thought to keep it out. This sword is sent with a running warrant (v. 16): "Go thee, one way or other, which way thou wilt, turn to the right hand or to the left, thou wilt find those that are obnoxious, for there are none free from guilt."

IV. The nature of this sword, and the limitations of it as to the people of God, v. 13. It is a correction; it is designed to be so; the sword to others is a rod to them. This is a comfortable word which comes in in the midst of these terrible ones. Fears are silenced with an assurance that the sword shall not forget the errand on which it is sent: It is a trial, and it is no more than a trial. It is matter of comfort to the people of God, when his judgments are abroad that when they are tried, they shall come forth as gold, and the proving of their faith shall be the improving of it.

V. Here the prophet and the people must show themselves affected with these judgments threatened. The prophet must not study for fine words, A sword! a sword! and (v. 14), Let the sword be doubled the third time in thy preaching. Again (v. 14), Prophesy, and smite thy hands together, wring thy hands, as lamenting the desolation.

Verses 18–27

The prophet, in the verses before, had shown them the sword coming.

I. He must show the Chaldean army coming against Jerusalem. The prophet must appoint him two ways, two roads (v. 19), and must bring the king of Babylon's army to the place where the roads part, for there they will make a stand. One road leads to Rabbath, the head city of the Ammonites, and the other to Jerusalem. He is resolved to be the ruin of both, yet he is not determined which to attack first. Many of the inhabitants of Judah had now taken shelter in Jerusalem, and therefore it is called Judah in Jerusalem the defenced. The prophet must describe this dilemma (v. 21); for the king of Babylon stood at the head of the two ways. It seems, he knew neither his own interest nor his own mind. To come to a resolution he used divination. He made his arrows bright, to be drawn for the lots. Perhaps Jerusalem was written on one arrow and Rabbath on the other, and that which was first drawn out of the quiver he determined to attack first. Or he heard the observations which the augurs made upon the entrails of the sacrifices: he looked in the liver. Jerusalem being the mark set up (v. 22), the campaign is opened.

II. He must show the people and the prince that they bring this destruction upon themselves by their own sin.

1. The people do so, v. 23, 24. They slight the notices that are given them of the judgment coming. Ezekiel's prophecy is to them a false divination.

2. The prince likewise brings his ruin upon himself. Zedekiah was wicked, as he promoted sin among his people; he sinned, and made Israel to sin. He has forfeited his crown, and he shall no longer wear it; he has by his profaneness profaned his crown, and it shall be cast to the ground (v. 26): Remove the diadem. Crowns and diadems are losable things; it is only in the other world that there is a crown of glory that fades not away. Attempts to re-establish the government shall come to nothing. This monarchy shall never be restored till it is fixed for perpetuity in the hands of the Messiah.

Verses 28–32

The prediction of the destruction of the Ammonites, was effected by Nebuchadnezzar about five years after the destruction of Jerusalem.

I. The sin of the Ammonites is here intimated, v. 28. The reproach they put upon the Israel of God, when they triumphed in their afflictions, was inhuman. A conceit that they were a better people than Israel, being spared when they were cut off, made them so haughty that they did even tread on the necks of the Israelites that were slain.

II. The utter destruction of the Ammonites is threatened, God resents the indignities and injuries done to his people as done to himself (v. 31). "I will judge thee where thou wast created, where thou wast first formed into a people, and where thou hast been settled ever since, and therefore where thou seemest to have taken root; the land of thy nativity shall be the land of thy destruction."

CHAP. XXII

Three separate messages which God entrusts the prophet to deliver concerning Judah and Jerusalem, to show them their sins and the judgments that were coming. I. A catalogue of their sins, ver. 1–16. II. They are condemned as dross to the fire, ver. 17–22. III. All are found guilty, ver. 23–31.

Verses 1–16

The prophet is authorized to judge the bloody city, the city of bloods. Jerusalem is so called because her crimes in general were bloody crimes (ch. vii. 23), such as polluted her in her blood.

I. He is to find Jerusalem guilty of many heinous crimes. The city sheds blood in the midst of it, where the magistrates would, if anywhere, be vigilant. She makes idols against herself to destroy herself, v. 3. In thee have the children set light by their father and mother, mocked them, and despised them, v. 7. To enrich themselves they wronged the poor (v. 7). Thou hast despised my holy things, holy oracles, holy ordinances, v. 8. Jerusalem had been famous for its purity, but now in the midst of thee they commit lewdness (v. 9). Unmindfulness of God was at the bottom of all this wickedness (v. 12): "Thou hast forgotten me, else thou wouldst not have done thus."

II. He is to pass sentence upon Jerusalem for these crimes. Let her know that she has filled up the measure of her iniquity, and that her sins call for speedy vengeance. She has made her time to come (v. 3), her days to draw near for punishment (v. 4). God has justly exposed her to the contempt and scorn of all her neighbours (v. 4). Since she has walked in the way of the heathen, and learned their works, she shall have enough of them (v. 15): "I will not only send thee among the heathen, out of thy own land, but I will scatter thee among them and disperse thee in the countries."

Verses 17–22

I. The wretched degeneracy of the house of Israel is described. In David's and Solomon's time it had been a head of gold; when the kingdoms were divided it was as the arms of silver. It has degenerated into baser metal. They are all brass, and tin, and iron, and lead, which some make to signify divers sorts of sinners among them. The house of Israel has become dross to me. So she is in God's account. They were silver, but now they are even the dross of silver; the word signifies all the dirt, and rubbish, and worthless stuff, that are separated from the silver in the washing, melting, and refining of it.

II. The woeful destruction of this degenerate house of Israel is foretold. They are all gathered together in Jerusalem; thither people fled from all parts of the country as to a city of refuge. Now God tells them that their flocking into Jerusalem should be as the gathering of various sorts of metal into the furnace or crucible, to be melted down, and to have the dross separated from them.

Verses 23–31

I. A general idea given of the land of Israel, how well it deserved the judgments coming to destroy it and how much it needed these judgments to refine it. Let the prophet tell her plainly, "Thou art the land that is not cleansed, not refined as metal is, and therefore needest to be again put into the furnace."

II. They had all helped to fill the measure of the nation's guilt, but none had done anything towards the emptying of it. The prophets, who pretended to make known the mind of God to them, were not only deceivers, but devourers (v. 25). They devoured souls by flattering sinners into a false peace. The priests, who were teachers by office, violated the law of God, which they should have observed and taught others to observe. They did not put a difference between the holy and profane, the clean and the unclean, according to the directions of the law. They hid their eyes from God's sabbaths and looked another way when they should have inspected the behaviour of the people on sabbath days. The princes were as daring transgressors of the law as any (v. 27): They are like wolves ravening the prey; for such is power without justice and goodness to direct it. The prophets daubed them with untempered mortar, told them in God's name that there was no harm in what they did. Daubing prophets are the great supporters of ravening princes. The people that had any power in their hands learned of their princes to abuse it, v. 29. There is none that appears as an intercessor for them (v. 30): I sought for a man among them that should stand in the gap, but I found none. Sin makes a gap in the hedge of protection that is about a people at which good things run out from them and evil things pour in upon them. There is a way of standing in the gap, by repentance, and prayer, and reformation. Moses stood in the gap when he made intercession for Israel to turn away the wrath of God, Ps. cvi. 23.

CHAP. XXIII

A history of the apostasies of God's people from him under the similitude of corporal whoredom and adultery. Here the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, the ten tribes and the two, with their capital cities, Samaria and Jerusalem, are considered distinctly. I. The apostasy of Israel and Samaria from God (ver. 1–8) and their ruin, ver. 9, 10. II. The apostasy of Judah and Jerusalem from God (ver. 11–21) and they shall in like manner be destroyed, ver. 22–35. III. The joint wickedness of them both (ver. 36–44) and the joint ruin of both, ver. 45–49.

Verses 1–10

The sinners that are here to be exposed are two women, two kingdoms, sister-kingdoms, Israel and Judah, daughters of one mother, having been for a long time but one people. 1. When they were one (v. 3): They committed whoredoms in Egypt, for there they were guilty of idolatry, as we read before, ch. xx. 8. 2. Their names when they became two, v. 4. The kingdom of Israel is called the elder sister, because that first made the breach—the greater sister (so the word is), for ten tribes belonged to that kingdom and only two to the other. In this parable Samaria and the kingdom of Israel shall bear the name of Aholah—her own tabernacle, because the places of worship which that kingdom had were of their own devising, and the worship itself was their own invention. Jerusalem and the kingdom of Judah bear the name of Aholibah—my tabernacle is in her, because their temple was the place which God himself had chosen to put his name there. 3. The treacherous departure of the kingdom of Israel from God (v. 5). Though the ten tribes had deserted the house of David, yet God owned them for his still; as long as they worshipped the God of Israel only, though by images, he did not quite cast them off. But Aholah played the harlot, brought in the worship of Baal (1 Kings xvi. 31), in competition with Jehovah (1 Kings xviii. 21), as a vile adulteress doted on her lovers, so she doted upon her neighbours, particularly the Assyrians. She admired their idols and worshipped them. The destruction of the kingdom of Israel for their apostasy from God (v. 9, 10): I have delivered her into the hand of her lovers. God first justly gave her up to her lust, and then gave her up to her lovers. We have the story at large 2 Kings xvii. 6, &c.

Verses 11–21

The prophet Hosea, in his time, observed that the two tribes retained their integrity, in a great measure, when the ten tribes had apostatized (Hos. xi. 12). By some unhappy matches made between the house of David and the house of Ahab the worship of Baal had been brought into the kingdom of Judah, but had been by the reforming kings worked out again. In the reign of Manasseh, soon after the kingdom of Judah had seen the destruction of the kingdom of Israel, they became more corrupt than Israel had been in their inordinate love of idols, v. 11.

I. Jerusalem, that had been a faithful city, became a harlot, Isa. i. 21. She also doted upon the Assyrians (v. 12), joined in league with them, joined in worship with them. And thus they grew to affect everything that was foreign and to despise their own nation; and even the religion of it was mean and homely. She doted upon the Babylonian captains (v. 15, 16), joined in alliance with that kingdom, and sent for patterns of their images, altars, and temples, and made use of them in their worship. And when she had had enough of the Chaldeans, she courted the Egyptians (v. 20), would come into an alliance with them, and would join with them in their idolatries. Thus she multiplied her whoredoms, repeated her former whoredoms, and encouraged herself by calling to remembrance the days of her youth. Those who, instead of reflecting upon their former sins with sorrow and shame, reflect upon them with pleasure and pride, bid defiance to repentance. They called it God's remembrance, and provoked him to remember it against them.

II. God justly gives a bill of divorce to this now faithless city. Sin alienates God's mind from the sinner, and justly, for it is the alienation of the sinner's mind from God.

Verses 22–35

Jerusalem indicted by the name of Aholibah, as a false traitor to her sovereign Lord the God of heaven, not having his fear before her eyes, but moved by the instigation of the devil, had revolted from her allegiance to him.

I. Her old confederates must be her executioners (v. 22): "I will raise up thy lovers against thee, the Chaldeans, whom formerly thou didst admire and with whom thou hast perfidiously broken covenant."

II. The execution to be done upon her. Her enemies shall come against her on every side (v. 22). They shall come with military force (v. 24), a vast army, and well armed. They shall have justice on their side: "I will set judgment before them." It being a war of revenge, they shall deal with thee hatefully, v. 29. The clothes and the fair jewels, with which she had endeavoured to recommend herself to her lovers, these she shall be stripped of, v. 26. Both city and country shall be impoverished and her children shall go into captivity. She shall be stigmatized and deformed: "They shall take away thy nose and thy ears, shall mark thee for a harlot, and render thee for ever odious," v. 25. Some will have this to be understood figuratively; and by the nose they think is meant the kingly dignity, and by the ears that of the priesthood. Because she had trod in the steps of Samaria's sins, she must expect no other than Samaria's fate, v. 31. They have been bad, very bad, and that justifies God in all that is brought upon them (v. 30): I will do these things unto thee because thou hast gone a-whoring after the heathen, and (v. 35) because thou hast forgotten me and cast me behind thy back. Forgetfulness of God is at the bottom of all our treacherous departures from him. This fire, though consuming to many, shall be refining to a remnant (v. 27). Before the captivity, no nation (all things considered) was more impetuously bent upon idols and idolatry than they were, after that captivity no nation was more vehemently set against idols and idolatry.

Verses 36–49

After the ten tribes were carried into captivity, the remains of it by degrees incorporated with the kingdom of Judah, and gained a settlement in Jerusalem; so that the two sisters had in effect become one again; and therefore, "Thou shalt now be employed, in God's name, to judge them, ch. xx. 4. The matter is rather worse than better since the union."

I. Declare unto them openly and boldly their abominations. They have been guilty of gross idolatry, here called adultery (v. 37), have broken their marriage-covenant with God. They have committed the most barbarous murders, in sacrificing their children to Moloch. They have profaned the sacred things with which God had dignified and distinguished them, v. 38. They defiled the sanctuary on the same day that they profaned the sabbath. They have courted foreign alliances. This also is represented by the sin of adultery, for it was a departure from God, in whom alone they ought to put their trust. Great preparation was made for the reception of these foreign ministers, for their public entry and public audience, which is compared to the pains that an adulteress takes to make herself look handsome, v. 40–42. The men of the common sort were there to increase the crowd; and with them were brought Sabeans from the wilderness. The margin reads it drunkards from the wilderness, that would drink healths to the prosperity of this grand alliance. But an alliance between the nation of the Jews and a heathen nation can never be for the advantage of either. They are iron and clay, that will not mix, nor will God bless such an alliance.

II. Let them be made to foresee the judgments that are coming upon them for these sins (v. 45). The prophets, whose office it was, in God's name, judge them and pass sentence upon them. This judgment being given by the righteous men, the righteous God will award execution, v. 46, 47. The same as before, v. 23, &c. The destruction of God's city, like the death of God's saints, shall do that for them which ordinances and providences before could not do; so that Jerusalem shall rise out of its ashes a new lump, as gold comes out of the furnace purified from its dross.

CHAP. XXIV

Two sermons in this chapter, preached on a particular occasion, and they are both from Mount Sinai, the mount of terror, both from Mount Ebal, the mount of curses; both speak the approaching fate of Jerusalem. The occasion of them was the king of Babylon's laying siege to Jerusalem. I. By the sign of flesh boiling in a pot over the fire are shown the miseries that Jerusalem should suffer during the siege, ver. 1–14. II. By the sign of Ezekiel's not mourning for the death of his wife is shown that the calamities coming upon Jerusalem were too great to be lamented, so great that they should sink down under them into a silent despair, ver. 15–27.

Verses 1–14

I. The notice God gives to Ezekiel in Babylon of Nebuchadnezzar's laying siege to Jerusalem (v. 2): "Son of man, take notice, the king of Babylon, who is now abroad with his army, thou knowest not where, set himself against Jerusalem this same day." He tells the prophet, that the prophet might tell the people, that so when it proved to be punctually true, it might be a confirmation of the prophet's mission.

II. The notice which he orders him to take of it. He must enter it in his book, memorandum, that in the ninth year of Jehoiachin's captivity, in the tenth month, on the tenth day of the month, the king of Babylon laid siege to Jerusalem; and the date here agrees with the date in the history, 2 Kings xxv. 1.

III. The notice which he orders him to give to the people. A rebellious house will soon be a ruinous house.

1. He must show them this by a sign; that of a boiling pot. This agrees with Jeremiah's vision many years before (Jer. i. 13, I see a seething pot, with the face towards the north; and the explanation of it (v. 15) makes it to signify the besieging of Jerusalem by the northern nations); to confront the vain confidence of the princes of Jerusalem, who had said (ch. xi. 3), This city is the cauldron and we are the flesh, meaning, "We are as safe here as if we were surrounded with walls of brass." "Well," says God, "it shall be so; you shall be boiled in Jerusalem, as the flesh in the cauldron." Those that from all parts of the country fled into Jerusalem for safety would be sadly disappointed; and yet there was no getting out of it, but they must be forced to abide by it, as the flesh in a boiling pot.

2. He must give them a comment upon this sign. It is to be construed as a woe to the bloody city, v. 6. Jerusalem, during the siege, is like a pot boiling over the fire. Care is taken to keep a good fire under the pot, which signifies the closeness of the siege. Commission is given to the Chaldeans (v. 10) to heap on wood, and kindle the fire. Here is no line, no lot of mercy, made use of; all goes to destruction. God would not take these severe methods with Jerusalem but that he is provoked to it (v. 7, 8). Jerusalem was to be made an example and therefore was made a spectacle, to the world. Because she is incurably wicked she is abandoned to ruin, without remedy. Methods and means of reformation had been tried in vain (v. 13). It is therefore resolved that no more such methods shall be used: Thou shalt not be purged from thy filthiness any more. The fire shall no longer be a refining fire, but a consuming fire.

Verses 15–27

These verses conclude Ezekiel's prophecies of the destruction of Jerusalem; for after this, though he prophesied much concerning other nations, he said no more concerning Jerusalem, till he heard of the destruction of it, almost three years after, ch. xxxiii. 21.

I. The sign by which this was represented to them.

1. He must lose a good wife, that should suddenly be taken from him by death. God gave him notice of it before (v. 16). A beloved wife is the desire of the eyes. When the desire of our eyes is taken away with a stroke we must see and own the hand of God in it: I take away the desire of thy eyes.

2. He must deny himself the satisfaction of mourning for his wife, which would have been both an honour to her and an ease to the oppression of his own spirit. But Ezekiel is not allowed to do this, though he would perhaps be ill thought of by the people if he did it not. He must not eat the bread of men, nor expect that his neighbours and friends should send him in provisions, as usually they did in such cases, presuming the mourners had no heart to provide meat for themselves; but, if it were sent, he must not eat of it. It could not but be greatly against the grain to flesh and blood not to lament the death of one he loved so dearly, but so God commands; and I did in the morning as I was commanded. He appeared in public without any signs of mourning. Here Ezekiel, to make himself a sign to the people, must exercise an extraordinary piece of self-denial.

II. The application of this sign. The people enquired the meaning of it (v. 19): Wilt thou not tell us what these things are to us that thou doest so? They knew that the death of his wife was a great affliction to him, and that he would not appear so unconcerned at it but for some good reason.

1. Let them know that if a faithful servant of God was thus afflicted only for his trial, shall such a generation of rebels against God go unpunished? That which was their public pride, the temple: "I will profane my sanctuary, by giving that into the enemy's hand, to be plundered and burnt." That which was their family-pleasure, which they looked upon with delight: "Your sons and your daughters (which are the dearer to you because they are but a few left of many, the rest having perished by famine and pestilence) shall fall by the sword of the Chaldeans." This was the punishment of sin.

2. Let them know that as Ezekiel wept not for his affliction so neither should they weep for theirs. He must say, You shall do as I have done, v. 22. You shall not mourn nor weep, v. 23. Their grief shall be so great that they shall be overwhelmed. Their calamities shall come so fast upon them, that by long custom they shall be hardened in their sorrows (Job. vi. 10) and stupefied. There shall be none of that sense of sorrow which would help to bring them to repentance, but that only which shall drive them to despair: "You shall pine away for your iniquities, with seared consciences and reprobate minds, and you shall mourn, not to God in prayer and confession of sin, but one towards another," complaining of God.

III. "When this comes, as it is foretold, when Jerusalem, which is this day besieged, is quite destroyed, which now you cannot believe will ever be, then you shall know that I am the Lord God, who have given you this fair warning of it. Then you will remember that Ezekiel was to you a sign." "He that escapes in that day shall, by a special direction of Providence, come to thee, to bring thee intelligence of it," which we find was done, ch. xxxiii. 21. Whereas, from this time to that, Ezekiel was thus far dumb that he prophesied no more against the land of Israel, but against the neighbouring nations, as we shall find in the following chapters, then he shall have orders given him to speak again to the children of his people (ch. xxxiii. 2, 22). When God was speaking so loudly by the rod, there was the less need of speaking by the word.

CHAP. XXV

Ezekiel had finished his testimony which related to the destruction of Jerusalem. As to that he was ordered to say no more, but wait the issue; and yet he must not be silent; there are divers nations bordering upon the land of Israel, which he must prophesy against, as Isaiah and Jeremiah had done before. In this chapter we have his prophecy, I. Against the Ammonites, ver. 1–7. II. Against the Moabites, ver. 8–11. III. Against the Edomites, ver. 11–14. IV. Against the Philistines, ver. 15–17. That which is laid to the charge of each of them is their barbarous and insolent conduct towards God's Israel.

Verses 1–7

I. The prophet is ordered to address himself to the Ammonites, in the name of the Lord Jehovah the God of Israel, who is also the God of the whole earth. He is bidden to set his face against the Ammonites, for he is God's representative and thus he must signify that God set his face against them, for the face of the Lord is against those that do evil, Ps. xxxiv. 16. He must show that, though he had prophesied so long against Israel, yet still he was for Israel, and, while he witnessed against their corruptions, he gloried in God's covenant with them.

II. He is directed what to say to them. Ezekiel is now a captive in Babylon, and knows little of the nations that were about it; but God tells him what they were doing and what he was about to do with them.

1. He must upbraid the Ammonites with their insolent and barbarous triumphs over the people of Israel in their calamities, v. 3. The Ammonites, of all people, should not have rejoiced in Jerusalem's ruin, but should rather have trembled, because they themselves had such a narrow escape, ch. xxi. 20. And they had reason to think that the king of Babylon would set upon them next. It is a wicked thing to be glad at the calamities of any.

2. He must threaten the Ammonites with utter ruin for this insolence. He had before predicted the destruction of the Ammonites, ch. xxi. 28. Had they repented, that would have been revoked; but now it is ratified. The Chaldeans came from the north-east, and their army, under the command of Nebuchadnezzar, destroyed the country of the Ammonites, about five years after the destruction of Jerusalem, and then the Arabians, who were properly the children of the east, when the Chaldeans had made the country desolate, came and took possession of it for themselves. They made use even of the royal city for their cattle (v. 5): I will make Rabbath, that was a nice and splendid city, to be a stable for camels. Thus God will maintain his own honour, and will make it appear that he is the God of Israel, though he suffers them for a time to be captives in Babylon. Thus he will bring those that were strangers to him into an acquaintance with him.

Verses 8–17

Three more of Israel's ill-natured neighbours are here condemned to destruction, for contributing to and triumphing in Jerusalem's fall.

I. The Moabites. Seir, which was the seat of the Edomites, is joined with them (v. 8).

1. The Moabites said, Behold, the house of Judah is like unto all the heathen. They were pleased to see them forsake their God and worship idols. Let the Moabites know that, though there are those of the house of Judah who have made themselves like the heathen, yet there is a remnant that retain their integrity, the religion of the house of Judah shall recover itself. Their God is no more able to deliver them from this overflowing scourge of these parts of the world than the gods of the heathen are to deliver them. Those who judge only by outward appearance are ready to conclude that the people of God have lost all their privileges when they have lost their worldly prosperity.

2. The punishment of Moab for this sin; their country shall be in like manner overthrown with that of the Ammonites, who were guilty of the same sin (v. 9, 10). The frontier-towns, that were its strength, shall be demolished by the Chaldean forces, and laid open. The men of the east, when they come to take possession of the country of the Ammonites, shall seize that of the Moabites too. The Arabians, who are shepherds, and live quietly, plain men dwelling in tents, shall by an overruling Providence be put in possession of the land of the Moabites, who are soldiers, that live turbulently. The Chaldeans shall get it by war, and the Arabians shall enjoy it in peace.

II. The Edomites were the posterity of Esau, between whom and Jacob there had been an old enmity. They not only triumphed in the ruin of Judah and Jerusalem, as the Moabites and Ammonites had done, but they took advantage from the present distressed state to which the Jews were reduced to do them some real mischiefs, probably made inroads upon their frontiers and plundered their country, v. 12. Amaziah severely chastised them (2 Kings xiv. 7), and for this they took vengeance. Now they would pay off all the old scores. God will take them to task for it (v. 13): I will stretch out my hand upon Edom. Their country shall be desolate from Teman in the south, and they shall fall by the sword unto Dedan, which lay north. They suffered much by the Chaldeans, which seems to be referred to, Jer. xlix. 8. Judas Maccabeus fought against the children of Esau in Idumea, gave them a great overthrow, abated their courage, and took their spoil (1 Mac. v. 3), and Josephus says (Antiq. lib. 13, cap. 17), that Hircanus made the Edomites tributaries to Israel.

III. The Philistines. Their sin is much the same with that of the Edomites: They have dealt by revenge with the people of Israel, and have taken vengeance with a despiteful heart, to destroy them, for the old hatred (v. 15), the old grudge they bore them. Their punishment likewise is much the same, v. 16. Their country was wasted by the Chaldean army, not long after the destruction of Jerusalem, which is foretold, Jer. xlvii.

CHAP. XXVI

The city of Tyre is next set to the bar; this, being a place of vast trade, was known all the world over; and therefore are three chapters, this and the two that follow, spent in the prediction of the destruction of Tyre. We have "the burden of Tyre," Isa. xxiii. It is but just mentioned in Jeremiah, ch. xxv. 22; xxvii. 3; xlvii. 4. But Ezekiel is ordered to be copious upon that head. In this chapter, I. The sin charged upon Tyre, which was triumphing in the destruction of Jerusalem, ver. 2. II. The destruction of Tyrus itself foretold. 1. The extremity of this destruction, ver. 4–6, 12–14. 2. The instruments of this destruction (ver. 3), and the king of Babylon with his vast victorious army, ver. 7–11. 3. The surprise of the neighbouring nations, ver. 15–21.

Verses 1–14

This prophecy is dated in the eleventh year, which was the year that Jerusalem was taken, and in the first day of the month, but it is not said what month.

I. The pleasure with which the Tyrians looked upon the ruins of Jerusalem (v. 2): "Aha! she is broken, broken to pieces, that was the gates of the people! all the wealth, power, and interest, which Jerusalem had, shall be turned to Tyre, and so now that she is laid waste I shall be replenished." They were men of business, and therefore were not of a persecuting spirit. All their care was to get estates and enlarge their trade, and they looked upon Jerusalem not as an enemy, but as a rival. Tyre promised herself that the fall of Jerusalem would be an advantage to her in respect of trade and commerce, that now she shall have Jerusalem's customers, and thus the prosperity of Tyre will rise out of the ruins of Jerusalem. It is just with God to blast the designs and projects of those who thus contrive to raise themselves upon the ruins of others.

II. Tyrus was a pleasant and wealthy city, and might have continued so if she had sympathized with Jerusalem in her calamities. Many nations shall come against thee, an army made up of many nations, or one nation that shall be as strong as many. The person is named that shall bring this army upon them—Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, a king of kings, that had many kings tributaries to him, besides those that were his captives, Dan. ii. 37, 38. He shall come with a vast army, horses and chariots, &c. He shall (v. 8), make a fort, and cast a mount, and (v. 9) shall set engines of war against the walls. His troops shall raise a dust that shall cover the city, v. 10. The city held out a long siege, but it was taken at last. Not only the soldiers that are found in arms, but the burghers, shall be put to the sword, the king of Babylon being highly incensed against them for holding out so long. The wealth of the city shall all become a spoil to the conqueror (v. 12). All the pleasant houses shall be destroyed (v. 12). When Jerusalem was destroyed it was ploughed like a field, Mic. iii. 12. But the destruction of Tyre is carried further; the very soil of it shall be scraped away, and it shall be made like the top of a rock (v. 4, 14), that has no earth to cover it; it shall only be a place for the spreading of nets (v. 5, 14); it shall serve fishermen to dry their nets upon.

Verses 15–21

1. How high, how great, Tyre had been, how little likely ever to come to this! She was inhabited of seas, that is, of those that trade at sea, of those who from all parts came thither by sea. Everybody stood in awe of the Tyrians and was afraid of disobliging them.

2. How low, how little, Tyre is made, v. 19, 20. This renowned city is made a desolate city, a city overflowed by an inundation of waters, which cover it, and upon which the deep is brought up. The Tyrians shall be lost among the nations, so that people will look in vain for Tyre in Tyre: Thou shalt be sought for, and never found again.

3. What a distress the inhabitants of Tyre are in (v. 15): There is a great slaughter made in the midst of thee.

4. What a consternation all the neighbours are in upon the fall of Tyre. The islands shall shake at the sound of thy fall (v. 15). The princes of the sea shall be affected, who ruled in those islands. The rich merchants, who live like princes (Isa. xxiii. 8), and the masters of ships, who command like princes, these shall condole the fall of Tyre. When Jerusalem, the holy city, was destroyed, there were no such lamentations for it; it was nothing to those that passed by (Lam. i. 12); but when Tyre, the trading city, fell, it was universally bemoaned.

5. The irreparable ruin of Tyre is aggravated by the prospect of the restoration of Israel. Thus shall Tyre sink when I shall set glory in the land of the living, v. 20. None but holy souls are properly living souls.

CHAP. XXVII

In this chapter we have, I. A large account of the dignity, wealth, and splendour of Tyre, while it was in its strength (ver. 1–25). II. A prediction of its fall and ruin, ver. 26–36. And this is intended to let us see the vanity and uncertainty of the riches, honours, and pleasures of the world.

Verses 1–25

I. The prophet is ordered to take up a lamentation for Tyrus, v. 2. It was yet in the height of its prosperity, and there appeared not the least symptom of its decay; yet the prophet must lament it, because its prosperity is its snare, which will make its fall the more grievous.

II. He is directed what to say, and to say it in the name of the Lord Jehovah.

1. He must upbraid Tyre with her pride: O Tyrus! thou hast said, I am of perfect beauty (v. 3), of universal beauty (so the word is), well-built and well-filled with money and trade.

2. He must upbraid Tyre with her prosperity, which was the matter of her pride. The city of Tyre stood at the east end of the Mediterranean, convenient for trade by land into all the Levant, so that she became a merchant of the people for many isles. Lying between Greece and Asia, it became the rendezvous of merchants from all parts: Thy borders are in the heart of the seas, v. 4. It has its haven replenished with abundance of gallant ships, Isa. xxxiii. 21. They made their sails of fine linen fetched from Egypt, and that embroidered too, v. 7. The word signifies a banner as well as a sail. They hung rooms on ship-board with blue and purple, the richest cloths and richest colours they could get. Tyre was itself famous for purple, which is therefore called the Tyrian dye. These gallant ships were well-manned. The pilots and masters of the ships were of their own city (v. 8): Thy wise men, O Tyrus! that were in thee, were thy pilots. The inhabitants of Arvad and Zidon were thy mariners. They sent to Gebal in Syria for calkers, or strengtheners of the clefts or chinks, to stop them when the ships come home, after long voyages, to be repaired. Their city was guarded by a military force that was considerable, v. 10, 11. The land of Israel (though it lay next them), furnished them with timber, but we do not find that it furnished them with men; that would have trenched upon the liberty and dignity of the Jewish nation, 2 Chron. ii. 17, 18. They had a vast trade and a correspondence with all parts of the known world. Ezekiel knew little, of his own knowledge, concerning the trade of Tyre. He was a priest, carried away captive far from Tyre, and there he had been eleven years. Yet he speaks of the particular merchandise of Tyre as nicely as if he had been comptroller of the custom-house there. The wisdom of God, and his goodness, as the common Father of mankind is seen in making one country to abound in one commodity and another in another, and all more or less serviceable. One land does not supply all the varieties of produce. Providence dispenses its gifts variously, some to each, and all to none, that there may be a mutual commerce among those whom God has made of one blood, though they are made to dwell on all the face of the earth, Acts xvii. 26. Let every nation therefore thank God for the productions of its country; though they be not so rich as those of others, yet there is use for them in the public service of the world. Judah and the land of Israel were merchants in Tyre. They traded mostly in wheat, a substantial commodity. Tyre was maintained by corn fetched from the land of Israel. Though Tyre got abundance by buying and selling, importing commodities from one place and exporting them, the wares of their own making, and a multitude of such wares, are here spoken of, v. 16, 18. It is the wisdom of a nation to encourage art and industry, for it contributes much to the wealth and honour of a nation to send abroad wares of their own making.

Verses 26–36

The destruction of Tyre was sudden. Her sun went down at noon. And all her wealth and grandeur, pomp and power, did but aggravate her ruin. She is as a great ship richly laden, that is sunk by the indiscretion of her steersmen: Thy rowers have themselves brought thee into great and dangerous waters; the governors of the city involved them in war with the Chaldeans which was the ruin of their state. By their insolence they provoked Nebuchadnezzar to make a descent upon them, and, by their obstinacy enraged him to such a degree that he determined on the ruin of their state, and, like an east wind, broke them in the midst of the seas. All her wealth shall be buried with her, her riches, her fairs, and her merchandise (v. 27); all shall fall with her into the midst of the seas, in the day of her ruin. The pilots, her princes and governors, when they see how wretchedly they have mismanaged and how they have contributed to their own ruin, shall cry out so loud as to make even the suburbs shake (v. 28). Tyre should be upbraided with her former prosperity (v. 32, 33); she that was Tyrus the renowned shall now be called Tyrus the destroyed in the midst of the sea. Some shall be sorely afraid, and shall be troubled (v. 35). Others shall hiss at her (v. 36), shall ridicule her pride, and bad management, and think her ruin just.

CHAP. XXVIII

I. A prediction of the fall and ruin of the king of Tyre, who, in the destruction of that city, is particularly set up as a mark for God's arrows, ver. 1–10. II. A lamentation for the king of Tyre, though he falls by his own iniquity, ver. 11–19. III. A prophecy of the destruction of Zidon, which was in the neighbourhood of Tyre, ver. 20–23. IV. A promise of the restoration of the Israel of God, though in the day of their calamity they were insulted by their neighbours, ver. 24–26.

Verses 1–10

The prince of Tyrus is singled out from the rest. Here is a message to him from God, which the prophet must send him.

I. He must tell him of his pride. His heart was lifted up, v. 2. Out of the pride of his heart he said, I am a god. He thought that the city of Tyre had as necessary a dependence upon him as the world has upon the God that made it. "I am the strong God, and therefore will not be contradicted, because I cannot be controlled. I sit in the seat of God; I sit as safely as God, as safely in the heart of the seas, and as far out of the reach of danger, as he in the height of heaven." He shall be told, Thou art a man, and not God, a depending creature, a dying creature; thou art flesh, and not spirit, Isa. xxxi. 3. The king of Tyre, though he has such a mighty influence and though he is flattered by his courtiers and made a god of by his poets, yet he is but a man; he knows it; he fears it. He was proud of his wisdom. When the king of Tyre dreams himself to be a god he says, I am wiser than Daniel. There is no secret that they can hide from thee. He that was wiser than Daniel was prouder than Lucifer. As some of the kings of Judah loved husbandry (2 Chron. xxvi. 10), so the king of Tyre loved merchandise, and by it he got riches, increased his riches, and filled his treasures with gold and silver, v. 4, 5. He attributed the increase of his wealth, to himself and not to the providence of God, forgetting him who gave him power to get wealth, Deut. viii. 17, 18. He thought himself a wise man because he was a rich man; whereas a fool may have an estate (Eccles. ii. 19).

II. Since pride goes before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall, he must tell him of that destruction, of that fall. "Because thou hast pretended to be a god (v. 6), therefore thou shalt not be long a man," v. 7. I will bring strangers upon thee—the Chaldeans. They are people of a strange language. They are the terrible of the nations; it was an army made up of many nations, formidable both for strength and fury. They shall draw their swords against the beauty of thy wisdom (v. 7), against all those things which thou gloriest in as thy beauty and the product of thy wisdom. The king of Tyre's palace, his treasury, his city, his navy, his army, these he glories in as his brightness, these the victorious enemy shall defile, shall deface, shall deform. He shall be so vilified in his death that he may despair of being deified after his death. The sentence of death here passed upon the king of Tyre is ratified by a divine authority: I have spoken it, saith the Lord God. When the conqueror sets his sword to thy breast, and thou seest no way of escape, wilt thou then say, I am God? The fear of it will force thee to own that thou art not a god, but a weak, timorous, trembling, dying man.

Verses 11–19

After the ruin of the king of Tyre is foretold it is bewailed.

I. This is commonly understood of the prince who then reigned over Tyre, spoken to, v. 2. His name was Ethbaal, or Ithobalus, as Diodorus Siculus calls him that was king of Tyre when Nebuchadnezzar destroyed it. He was an accomplished man, but his iniquity was his ruin.

II. Some think that by the king of Tyre is meant the whole royal family. He is here spoken of as having lived in great splendour, v. 12–15. He was looked upon to be as wise as the reason of men could make him, and as happy as the wealth of this world and the enjoyment of it could make him. He seemed to be as wise and happy as Adam in innocency (v. 13): "Thou hast been in Eden, even in the garden of God; thou hast lived as it were in paradise all thy days, hast had dominion over all about thee, as Adam had." His rooms were set round with jewels, so that he walked in the midst of them, and fancied himself as glorious as if, like God, he had been surrounded by so many angels, who are compared to a flame of fire. Gold is mentioned last, as far inferior in value to those precious stones; and he used to speak of it accordingly. Another thing that made him think his palace a paradise was the curious music he had, the tabrets and pipes, hand-instruments and wind-instruments. He appeared in as much splendour as the high priest when he was clothed with his garments for glory and beauty. Thou wast perfect in thy ways; thou didst prosper in all thy affairs and everything went well with thee; from the day thou wast created, till iniquity was found in thee; and that spoiled all (v. 15). And when iniquity was once found in him it increased; he grew worse and worse (v. 18). The king had so much to do with his merchandise, and was so wholly intent upon the gains of that, that he took no care to do justice, to give redress, to those that suffered wrong and to protect them from violence (v. 16). "Thy heart was lifted up because of thy beauty; thou wast in love with thyself, v. 17." He disgraces the crown he wears, and so has forfeited it, and shall be destroyed from the midst of the stones of fire, the precious stones with which his palace was garnished.

Verses 20–26

The destruction of Zidon, a city that lay near to Tyre, was more ancient, but not so considerable, had a dependence upon it and stood and fell with it. The Zidonians were more addicted to idolatry than the Tyrians, who, being men of business, were less under the power of bigotry and superstition. The Zidonians were noted for the worship of Ashtaroth. Jezebel was daughter to the king of Zidon, who brought the worship of Baal into Israel (1 Kings xvi. 31); so that God had been much dishonoured by the Zidonians. The judgments that shall be executed upon Zidon are war and pestilence, v. 23. Nor is it Tyre and Zidon only on which God would execute judgments, but on all those that despised his people Israel, and triumphed in their calamities; for this was now God's controversy with the nations that were round about them, v. 26. God will be glorified in the restoration of his people to their former prosperity. He had been dishonoured by the sins of his people, and their sufferings too had given occasion to the enemy to blaspheme (Isa. lii. 5); but God will now both cure them of their sins and ease them of their troubles, and so will be sanctified in them in the sight of the heathen, v. 25. They shall enjoy great tranquillity there. When those that have been vexatious to them are taken off they shall live in quietness; there shall be no more a pricking brier nor a grieving thorn, v. 24. They shall have a happy settlement, for they shall build houses, and plant vineyards, and there shall be none to disquiet them or make them afraid, v. 26. But the full accomplishment of this promise is reserved for the heavenly Canaan, everything that offends shall be removed, and all griefs and fears for ever banished.

CHAP. XXIX

Four chapters concerning Egypt and its king. Egypt had formerly been a house of bondage to God's people; of late they had depended too much upon it; and therefore, whether the prediction reached Egypt or no, it would be of use to Israel, to take them from their confidence in their alliance. In this chapter we have, I. The destruction of Pharaoh foretold, for his dealing deceitfully with Israel, ver. 1–7. II. The desolation of the land of Egypt foretold, ver. 8–12. III. A promise of the restoration thereof, in part, after forty years, ver. 13–16. IV. The possession that should be given to Nebuchadnezzar of the land of Egypt, ver. 17–20. V. A promise of mercy to Israel, ver. 21.

Verses 1–7

I. The date of this prophecy against Egypt. It was in the tenth year of the captivity. The first prophecy against Egypt was just at the time when the king of Egypt was coming to relieve Jerusalem and raise the siege (Jer. xxxvii. 5), but did not answer the expectations of the Jews.

II. This prophecy is directed against Pharaoh king of Egypt, and against all Egypt, v. 2. This begins with the prince, because it began to have its accomplishment in the rebellions of the people against the prince, not long after this.

III. The prophecy itself. Pharaoh Hophrah (for so was the reigning Pharaoh surnamed) is here represented by a great dragon, or crocodile, that lies in the midst of his rivers to play therein, v. 3. Nilus, the river of Egypt, was famed for crocodiles.

1. The pride and security of Pharaoh. He boasts that he is an absolute prince, a sole prince, and has neither partner in the government nor competitor. Pharaoh's reason for his pretensions is absurd: My river is my own, for I have made it for myself. Here he usurps two of the divine prerogatives, to be the author and the end of his own being and felicity. Self is the great idol that all the world worships, in contempt of God and his sovereignty.

2. The course God will take with this proud man, to humble him. He is a great dragon in the waters, and God will accordingly deal with him, v. 4, 5. Herodotus relates of this Pharaoh, who was now king of Egypt, that he had reigned in great prosperity for twenty-five years, and was so elevated with his successes that he said that God himself could not cast him out of his kingdom. All his fish shall be drawn out with him, his servants, his soldiers, and all that had a dependence on him. These shall stick to his scales, adhere to their king, resolving to live and die with him. But king and army, the dragon and all the fish that stick to his scales, shall perish together, as fish cast upon dry ground, v. 5. Now this is supposed to have had its accomplishment soon after, when this Pharaoh, in defence of Aricius king of Libya, who had been expelled his kingdom by the Cyrenians, levied a great army, and went out against the Cyrenians, to re-establish his friend, but was defeated in battle, which gave such disgust to his kingdom that they rose in rebellion against him. Thus was he left thrown into the wilderness, he and all the fish of the river with him.

3. The ground of the controversy God has with the Egyptians; it is because they have cheated his people.

They failed them (v. 6, 7). When any stress was laid upon them, they either could not or would not do that for them which was expected. The king of Egypt, it is probable, had encouraged Zedekiah to break his league with the king of Babylon, with a promise that he would stand by him, which he failed to do. God had told them, long since, that the Egyptians were broken reeds, Isa. xxx. 6, 7. And now they found it so.

Verses 8–16

I. A prophecy of the ruin of Egypt. The threatening is particular; and the sin is their pride, v. 9. God is against the king and against the people, against thee and against thy rivers. Waters signify people and multitudes, Rev. xvii. 15. Multitudes shall be cut off by war, the sword of civil war. The country shall be depopulated. The land of Egypt shall be utterly waste (wastes of waste, so the margin reads it), and desolate (v. 10); neither men nor beasts shall pass through it, nor shall it be inhabited (v. 11); it shall be desolate in the midst of the countries that are so, v. 12. This was the effect of the war which the king of Babylon made upon them. The people shall be dispersed and scattered among the nations (v. 12), so that those who thought the balance of power was in their hand should now become a contemptible people.

II. Of the restoration of Egypt after awhile, v. 13. Egypt shall lie desolate forty years (v. 12) and then I will bring again the captivity of Egypt, v. 14. The forty years end about the first year of Cyrus, when the seventy years' captivity of Judah ended, or soon after. God will gather the Egyptians, and make them to return to the land of their habitation, v. 14. They shall not make a figure as they have done. Egypt shall be a kingdom again, but it shall be the basest of the kingdoms (v. 15). For two reasons it shall be thus mortified: (1) That it may not domineer over its neighbours, but that it may know what it is to be low and despised. (2) That it may not deceive the people of God (v. 16): It shall no more be the confidence of the house of Israel; they shall no more trust in it as they have done.

Verses 17–21

The date of this prophecy is in the twenty-seventh year of Ezekiel's captivity, sixteen years after the prophecy in the former part of the chapter. After the destruction of Jerusalem Nebuchadnezzar spent two or three campaigns in the conquest of the Ammonites and Moabites. Then he spent thirteen years in the siege of Tyre. During all that time the Egyptians were embroiled in war with the Cyrenians, by which they were much weakened and impoverished; and at the end of the siege of Tyre God delivers this prophecy to Ezekiel, to signify to him that that utter destruction of Egypt which he had foretold fifteen or sixteen years before, should now be completed by Nebuchadnezzar. The prophecy which begins here, it should seem, is continued to the twentieth verse of the next chapter. It is the last prophecy we have of this prophet, but is laid here, that all the prophecies against Egypt might come together.

I. The success God would give to Nebuchadnezzar against Egypt, v. 19, 20. It was a cheap and easy prey. Jeremiah foretold that Nebuchadnezzar should array himself with the land of Egypt as a shepherd puts on his coat, which intimates what a rich and cheap prey it should be.

II. This success was a recompense for the hard service with which he had caused his army to serve against Tyre, v. 18, 20. 1. The taking of Tyre cost Nebuchadnezzar abundance of blood and treasure. In this siege every head was made bald, and every shoulder peeled, with carrying burdens and labouring in the water when they had a strong tide to contend with. 2. In this service God owns that they wrought for him, v. 20. He set them at work, for the humbling of a proud city and its king, though they meant not so, neither did their heart think so. 3. For this service he had no wages. He was at vast expense to take Tyre; and he promised himself good plunder, but the Tyrians sent away by ship their best effects, and threw the rest into the sea, so that they had nothing but bare walls. 4. He shall have the spoil of Egypt to recompense him for his service against Tyre.

III. The mercy God had in store for the house of Israel. When the tide is at the highest it will turn, and so it will when it is at the lowest. Nebuchadnezzar was in the zenith of his glory when he had conquered Egypt, but within a year after he ran mad (Dan. iv). When he was at the highest Israel was at the lowest; but in that day the horn of the house of Israel shall bud forth, v. 21. Their princes are the horns of the house of Israel, the seat of their glory and power. These began to bud forth when Daniel and his fellows were highly preferred in Babylon (Dan. ii. 49). Within a year after the conquest of Egypt they were thus preferred; and, soon after, three of them were made famous by the honour God put upon them in bringing them alive out of the burning fiery furnace. And this promise had a further accomplishment in the elevation of Jehoiachin king of Judah, Jer. lii. 31, 32. God will honour their prophets: And I will give thee the opening of the mouth. Though none of Ezekiel's prophecies, after this, are recorded, yet we think he went on prophesying, and with more liberty, when Daniel and his fellows were in power, ready to protect him.

CHAP. XXX

I. A continuation of the prophecy against Egypt just before the desolation of that once flourishing kingdom was completed by Nebuchadnezzar, in which is foretold the destruction of all her allies and confederates, ver. 1–19. II. A repetition of a former prophecy against Egypt, just before the desolation of it begun by their own bad conduct, which gradually weakened them and prepared the way for the king of Babylon, ver. 20–26.

Verses 1–19

The prophecy of the destruction of Egypt is here very full.

I. It shall be a lamentable destruction, and such as shall occasion great sorrow (v. 2, 3). You have your day now, when you carry all before you, and trample on all about you, but God will have his day shortly. It will be a cloudy day, that is, dark and dismal, and it shall threaten a storm. It shall be the time of the heathen, of reckoning with the heathen for all their heathenish practices.

II. It shall be the destruction of Egypt, and of all the countries in confederacy with her. 1. Egypt herself shall fall (v. 4). 2. Her neighbours shall fall with her. When the slain fall so thickly in Egypt great pain shall be in Ethiopia, both in Africa, and in Asia. There were those of other countries who upon some account or other resided in Egypt, as did also the men of the land that is in league, some of the remains of the people of Israel and Judah, the children of the covenant, or league, as they are called (Acts iii. 25). These sojourned in Egypt contrary to God's command, and these shall fall with them.

III. All that pretend to support the sinking interests of Egypt shall come down with her (v. 6). Even the multitude of Egypt shall be made to cease, v. 10. That populous country shall be depopulated. Is the river Nile her support and are the several channels of it a defence to her? I will make the rivers dry (v. 12). Are her idols a support to her? They shall be destroyed. Is her royal family her support? There shall be no more a prince in the land of Egypt; the royal family shall be extirpated. Is her courage her support: I will put a fear in the land of Egypt. Is the rising generation her support? Alas! the young men shall fall by the sword (v. 17) and the daughters shall go into captivity (v. 18), and so she shall be robbed of all her hopes.

IV. God shall inflict these desolating judgments on Egypt (v. 8).

V. The king of Babylon and his army shall be employed as instruments of this destruction, v. 10. Those that undertook to protect Israel from the king of Babylon shall not be able to protect themselves.

VI. No place in the land of Egypt shall be exempted from the fury of the Chaldean army, not the strongest, not the remotest: The sword shall go through the land. Various places are here named: Pathros, Zoan, and No (v. 14), Sin and Noph (v. 15, 16), Aven and Pi-beseth (v. 17), and Tehaphnehes, v. 18. These shall be made desolate. The pomp of their strength shall cease, and a cloud shall cover them. And, lastly, the Ethiopians, who are at a distance from them, as well as those who are mingled with them, shall share in their pain and terror. The close of this prediction leaves, 1. The land of Egypt mortified: Thus will I execute judgments on Egypt, v. 19. 2. The God of Israel herein glorified: They shall know that I am the Lord.

Verses 20–26

This short prophecy of the weakening of the power of Egypt was delivered about the time that the army of the Egyptians, which attempted to raise the siege of Jerusalem, was frustrated and returned without accomplishing their purpose.

I. It is here foretold that the king of Egypt shall grow weaker and weaker. 1. This was in part done already (v. 21): I have broken the arm of Pharaoh. One arm of that kingdom might well be reckoned broken when the king of Babylon routed the forces of Pharaoh-Necho at Carchemish (Jer. xlvi. 2), and made himself master of all that pertained to Egypt from the river of Egypt to Euphrates, 2 Kings xxiv. 7. Before Egypt's heart and neck were broken its arm was. 2. This was to be done again. Now (v. 22), I am against Pharaoh, and will break both his arms. The king of Egypt shall be dispirited when he finds himself in danger of the king of Babylon's forces: he shall groan before him with the groaning of a deadly wounded man. The people of Egypt shall be dispersed (v. 23 and again v. 26): I will scatter them among the nations.

II. It is here foretold that the king of Babylon shall grow stronger and stronger, v. 24, 25.

CHAP. XXXI

The prophecy of this chapter is against Egypt, and designed for the humbling of Pharaoh. Pharaoh stands indicted for his pride and haughtiness, and the injuries he had done to God's people; but he thinks himself so high as not to be accountable to any authority, so strong as not to be conquerable. The prophet is therefore directed to report to him the case of the king of Assyria, whose head city was Nineveh. I. He must show him how great a monarch the King of Assyria had been, what a vast empire he had, ver. 3–9. II. He must then show him how like he was to the king of Assyria in pride, ver. 10. III. He must next read him the history of the fall and ruin of the king of Assyria, ver. 11–17. IV. He must leave the king of Egypt to apply all this to himself to see his own face in the looking-glass of the king of Assyria's sin, and to foresee his own fall, ver. 18.

Verses 1–9

This prophecy bears date the month before Jerusalem was taken, as that in the close of the foregoing chapter about four months before. When God's people were in the depth of their distress, it would be some comfort to them to be told from heaven that the cup was going round, even the cup of trembling, that it would shortly be taken out of the hands of God's people and put into the hands of those that hated them, Isa. li. 22, 23.

I. The prophet is directed to put Pharaoh searching for a case parallel to his own (v. 2). The falls of others, both into sin and ruin, are intended as admonitions to us not to be secure or high-minded, nor to think we stand out of danger.

II. He is directed to show him an instance of one whom he resembled in greatness (v. 3). Sennacherib was one of the mighty princes of that monarchy; but it sunk down soon after him, and the monarchy of Nebuchadnezzar was built upon its ruins. The king of Assyria is here compared to a stately cedar, v. 3. 1. The Assyrian monarch was a tall cedar, of a high stature, and his top among the thick boughs. He surpassed all the princes in his neighbourhood; they were all shrubs to him (v. 5): His height was exalted above all the trees of the field; he overtopped them all, v. 8. 2. He was a spreading cedar, denoting that his territories were large, and he extended his conquests far and his influences much further. His large dominions were well managed. His government was admirable in the eyes of all men. In all the surrounding nations there was no prince so much admired, so much courted, as the king of Assyria. 3. He was serviceable by his shadow (v. 6). The meaning is, Under his shadow dwelt all great nations; they all fled to him for safety, and were willing to swear allegiance to him if he would undertake to protect them. But the utmost security that any creature, even the king of Assyria himself, can give, is but like the shadow of a tree, which is but a scanty protection. God will take us under the shadow of his wings, where we shall be warmer and safer than under the shadow of the strongest and stateliest cedar, Ps. xvii. 8; xci. 4. 4. He seemed to be settled and established in his greatness and power. This cedar was not like the heath in the desert, made to inhabit the parched places (Jer. xvii. 6); it was not a root in a dry ground, Isa. liii. 2. He had abundance of wealth to support his power and grandeur (v. 4): The waters made him great; he had vast treasures, which were as the deep that set him up on high, as rivers running round about his plants; these enabled him to strengthen and secure his interests everywhere, for he sent out his little rivers to all the trees of the field, to water them; their country was nourished by the king's country (Acts xii. 20), and they would be serviceable and faithful to him.

Verses 10–18

The king of Egypt resembled the king of Assyria in pomp, and power, and prosperity.

I. He does likewise resemble him in his pride, v. 10. For the same temptation of a prosperous state by which some are overcome are fatal to many others too. "Thou, O king of Egypt! hast lifted up thyself in height, has been proud of thy wealth and power, ch. xxix. 3. And the king of Assyria shot up his top among the thick boughs, and grew insolent and imperious, set God himself at defiance, and trampled upon his people"; Isa. xxxvi. 4. How haughtily does he speak of his achievements!

II. How he shall therefore resemble him in his fall.

1. The fall of the king of Assyria. Cyaxares, king of the Medes, in conjunction with Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, destroyed Nineveh, and with it the Assyrian empire. Respecting the Assyrian three things are affirmed: (1) It is God himself that orders his ruin: I have delivered him into the hand of the executioner; I have driven him out. (2) It is his own sin that procures his ruin: I have driven him out for his wickedness. (3) It is a mighty one of the heathen that shall be the instrument of his ruin. In this history of the fall of the Assyrian there is still the similitude of the cedar. He grew very high, and extended his boughs very far; but his day comes to fall. This stately cedar was dropped: The terrible of the nations cut him off. They have lopped off his branches first, cities or countries broken off from the Assyrian monarchy. It was deserted: All the people of the earth, that had fled to him for shelter, have gone down from his shadow and have left him. Upon his ruin shall all the fowls of the heaven remain, to tread upon the broken branches of this cedar. All the trees of Eden, that had fallen before him, all that drank water of the rain of heaven, as the stump of the tree that is left in the south (Dan. iv. 23), shall be comforted in the nether parts of the earth when they see this proud cedar brought as low as themselves. But the trees of Lebanon, that are yet standing, mourned for him, because they could read their own destiny in his fall. By the cutting down of this cedar is signified the slaughter of this mighty monarch and all his supporters. God designed thereby, First, To give an alarm to the nations about (v. 16): I made the nations to shake at the sound of his fall. Secondly, To give an admonition to their kings (v. 14). It would have been well for Nebuchadnezzar, who was himself active in bringing down the Assyrian, if he had taken the admonition.

2. A prophecy of the fall of the king of Egypt in like manner, v. 18.

CHAP. XXXII

The destruction of Pharaoh and Egypt enlarged upon. I. Perhaps it may look as far back as the book of Genesis (ch. xv. 14). II. Perhaps it may look as far forward as the book of the Revelation, where we find that the great enemy of the gospel-church is spiritually called Egypt, Rev. xi. 8. And, if so, between this prophecy of the ruin of Egypt and the prophecy of the destruction of the antichristian generation there is some analogy. We have two distinct prophecies in this chapter relating to Egypt, both in the same month. They are both lamentations to intimate how much the prophet himself should lament it, from a generous principle of love to mankind. The destruction is here represented under two similitudes: 1. The killing of some devouring creature, ver. 1–16. 2. The funeral of a great commander, ver. 17–32.

Verses 1–16

I. The prophet is ordered to take up a lamentation for Pharaoh king of Egypt, v. 2.

II. He is ordered to show cause for that lamentation.

1. Pharaoh has been a troubler of the nations, even of his own nation. He is like a young lion of the nations (v. 2), threatening as a lion when he roars. He is like a whale, like a crocodile (so some) in the seas, vexatious, as the leviathan that makes the deep to boil like a pot, Job. xli. 31. When Pharaoh engaged in an unnecessary war with the Cyrenians he came forth with his rivers, with his armies, troubled the waters, disturbed his own kingdom and the neighbouring nations.

2. He that has troubled others must expect to be himself troubled; for the Lord is righteous, Joshua vii. 25. This is set forth by a comparison. Is Pharaoh like a great whale? God has a net strong enough to secure him (v. 3): I will spread my net over thee, even the army of the Chaldeans, a company of many people. The flesh of this great whale shall be laid upon the mountains (v. 5) and the valleys shall be filled with his height. Such members of Pharaoh's soldiers shall be slain that the dead bodies shall be scattered upon the hills and piled up in the valleys. It is set forth by a prophecy of the deep impression which the destruction of Egypt should make upon the neighbouring nations. When Pharaoh, who had been like a blazing burning torch, is put out and extinguished it shall make all about him look black, v. 7. The hearts of many people will be vexed to see the word of the God of Israel fulfilled in the destruction of Egypt, and that all the gods of Egypt were not able to relieve it. It shall fill them with admiration (v. 10): They shall be amazed at thee, shall wonder to see such great riches and power come to nothing, Rev. xviii. 17. It shall fill them with fear. When others are ruined by sin we have reason to quake for fear, as knowing ourselves guilty and obnoxious. It is the sword of the king of Babylon that shall come upon thee (v. 11), the swords of the mighty, even the terrible of the nations, all of them (v. 12). The multitude of Egypt shall be destroyed. The pomp of Egypt shall be spoiled. The cattle of Egypt, that used to feed by the rivers, shall be destroyed (v. 13), either by the sword or carried off for a prey. The waters of Egypt, that used to flow briskly, shall now grow slow, and heavy, and shall run like oil (v. 14), a figurative expression signifying that there should be such universal sadness and heaviness upon the whole nation that even the rivers should go softly and silently like mourners. The whole country of Egypt shall be stripped of its wealth (v. 15). Then shall they know that I am the Lord.

Verses 17–32

This prophecy completes the burden of Egypt.

I. The funeral of that once flourishing kingdom.

1. This dead kingdom is here brought to the grave. The prophet is ordered (v. 18), to foretell their destruction. Yet he must foretell it as one that had an affectionate concern for them; he must wail for the multitude of Egypt, even when he casts them down. When Egypt is slain, let her have an honourable funeral; let her be buried with the daughters of the famous nations.

2. This corpse of a kingdom is bid welcome to the grave, and Pharaoh is made free of the congregation of the dead, not without some pomp and ceremony. There lie the Assyrian empire, and all the princes and mighty men of that monarchy (v. 22). There lies the kingdom of Persia, which perhaps within the memory of man at that time had been wasted and brought down: There is Elam and all her multitude, the king of Elam and his numerous armies, v. 24, 25. There lies the Scythian power. Meshech and Tubal, those barbarous northern nations, had lately made a descent upon the Medes, and lived among them upon free quarter for some years, but at length Cyaxares, king of the Medes, obliged them to quit his country, v. 26. These Scythians are not buried with marks of honour. There lies the kingdom of Edom, which had flourished long, but before the destruction of Egypt, was made desolate, as was foretold, ch. xxv. 13. Among the sepulchres of the nations there is Edom, v. 29. There lie the princes of the north, and all the Zidonians. These were as well acquainted with maritime affairs as the Egyptians were, who relied much upon that part of their strength, but they have gone down with the slain (v. 30). All this is applied to Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who have no reason to flatter themselves with hopes of tranquillity when they see how the wisest, and wealthiest, and strongest of their neighbours have been laid waste (v. 28).

II. The view which this prophecy gives us of ruined states may show us something of this present world, and the empire of death in it. Men are ingenious at finding out ways to destroy one another. It is not only a great pit, but a great cockpit.

CHAP. XXXIII

The prophet now returns to the children of his people. I. He must let them know that he was a watchman, and had received a charge concerning them, ver. 1–9. The substance of this we had before, ch. iii. 17, &c. II. He must let them know upon what terms they stand with God, that they are upon their trial, ver. 10–20. III. A particular message sent to those who yet remained in the land of Israel, ver. 21–29. IV. A rebuke to those who personally attended Ezekiel's ministry, but were not sincere in their professions of devotion, ver. 30–33.

Verses 1–9

The prophet, now that Jerusalem is taken, is appointed again to direct his speech to them; and here his commission is renewed.

I. The office of a watchman laid down, the trust reposed in him, the charge given him, v. 2, 6. 1. It is supposed to be a public danger that gives occasion for the appointing of a watchman, v. 2. When a country is in fear of a foreign invasion, that they may not be surprised, but may have early notice of it, in order to give the invader a warm reception, they set a man of their coast, some likely person, that lives upon the borders of their country, and make him their watchman. One man may be of public service to a whole country. 2. It is supposed to be a public trust that is lodged in the watchman and that he is accountable to the public for the discharge of it. If he do his part, if he betimes give warning, he has discharged his trust, and not only delivered his soul, but earned his wages. If the people do not take warning it is their own fault; the blame is not to be laid upon the watchman. If the watchman did not do his duty, and blew not the trumpet to warn the people, so that some are surprised and cut off in their iniquity (v. 6), he shall be found guilty because he did not give warning. But if the watchman do his part, and the people do theirs, all is well.

II. The application of this to the prophet, v. 7, 9.

1. He is a watchman to the house of Israel. He had occasionally given warning to the nations about, but to the house of Israel he was a watchman by office. They did not set him for a watchman, but God did it for them; he appointed them a watchman.

2. His business as a watchman is to give warning to sinners of their danger by reason of sin. This is the word he must hear from God's mouth and speak to them. God has said, The wicked man shall surely die. Unless he repent, he shall be cut off from God. The wrath of God is revealed from heaven, not only against wicked nations, but against wicked persons. It is the will of God that the wicked man should be warned of this: Warn them from me. This intimates that there is a possibility of preventing it, else it were a jest to give warning of it; and that God is desirous it should be prevented. It is the work of ministers to say to the wicked, It shall be ill with thee, Isa. iii. 11. And he must say this, not in passion, to provoke the sinner, but in compassion, to warn the wicked from his way, warn him to turn from it, that he may live.

3. If souls perish through his neglect of his duty, he brings guilt upon himself.

4. If he do his duty, he may take the comfort of it, though he do not see the success of it (v. 9).

Verses 10–20

I. The cavils of the people against God's proceedings with them. God had set life before them, but they plead that he had set it out of their reach. The prophet had said (ch. xxiv. 23), You shall pine away for your iniquities; and this they now upbraided him with, as if it had been spoken to drive them to despair; whereas it was spoken conditionally, to bring them to repentance. They said, The way of the Lord is not equal (ch. xviii. 25), suggesting that God was partial in his proceedings, and that he was more severe against sin and sinners than there was cause.

II. A satisfactory answer given to both these cavils.

1. When they spoke of pining away in their iniquity God sent the prophet to them, with all speed, to tell them that there was yet hope in Israel (v. 11). God has no delight in the ruin of sinners, nor does he desire it. They questioned whether they should live, though they did repent and reform; yea, says God, as sure as I live, true penitents shall live also; for their life is hid with Christ in God. It is certain that, if sinners perish in their impenitency, it is owing to themselves; they die because they will die.

2. The most plausible professors, if they apostatize, shall certainly perish for ever in their apostasy from God; and the most notorious sinners, if they repent, shall certainly be happy for ever in their return to God. These rules of judgment are so plainly just that they need no other confirmation of them than the repetition of them. If those that have made a great profession of religion throw off their profession, the profession they made shall stand them in no stead, v. 12, 13, 18. He that lives regularly shall live. Surely such a man as this cannot but be happy. Righteous men, who have very good hopes of themselves, are yet in danger of turning to iniquity by trusting to their righteousness. Or, he trusts to the strength of his own righteousness, and so by presuming on his own sufficiency he is brought to commit iniquity. If those that have lived a wicked life repent and reform, their sins shall be pardoned, and they shall be justified and saved. Thus even the threatenings of the word are to some, by the grace of God, a savour of life unto life, while even the promises of the word become to others, by their own corruption, a savour of death unto death. There is many a wicked man hastening to destruction who yet is wrought upon by the grace of God to return and repent. He turns from his sin (v. 14), and restores the pledge (v. 15) which he had taken uncharitably from the poor, he gives again that which he had robbed and taken unjustly from the rich. Nor does he only cease to do evil, but he learns to do well. And in this good way he perseveres without committing iniquity, though not free from infirmity, yet under the dominion of no iniquity. He shall surely live; he shall not die, v. 15. Again (v. 16), He shall surely live. Again (v. 19), He has done that which is lawful and right, and he shall live thereby. Now that there is a settled separation between him and sin there shall be no longer a separation between him and God. None of the sins that he has committed shall be mentioned unto him (v. 16), either as a clog to his pardon or as any diminution to the glory that is prepared for him. The conclusion of the whole matter is (v. 20): "O you house of Israel, though you are all involved now in the common calamity, yet there shall be a distinction of persons made in the spiritual and eternal state, and I will judge you every one after his ways."

Verses 21–29

I. The tidings brought to Ezekiel of the burning of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. The city was burnt in the eleventh year of the captivity and the fifth month, Jer. lii. 12, 13. Tidings were brought to the prophet by one that was an eye-witness of the destruction (v. 21), a year and almost five months after the thing was done. This was the first time he had an account of it from a refuge, from one who escaped.

II. The divine influences he was under, to prepare him for those heavy tidings (v. 22): The hand of the Lord was upon me before he came, and had opened my mouth to speak to the house of Israel. He prophesied now with more freedom and boldness. Now the hand of the Lord came upon him, renewed his commission, gave him fresh instructions, and opened his mouth, furnished him with power to speak to the people as he ought to speak.

III. The particular message he was entrusted with, relating to these Jews that yet remained in the land of Israel, and inhabited the wastes of that land, v. 24. Some few that had escaped the sword and captivity still continued there and began to think of re-settling. Though the providence of God concerning them had been very humbling, and still was very threatening, yet they were intolerably haughty. They say,

"The land is given us for inheritance, v. 24. Our partners being gone, it is now all our own; we shall have it all to ourselves." They think they can make out as good a title from God to this land as Abraham could: "If God gave this land to him, who was but one worshipper of him, as a reward of his service, much more will he give it to us, who are many worshippers of him, as the reward of our service." Since God's providences did neither humble them nor terrify them, he sends them a message sufficient to do both. He tells them of the wickedness they still persisted in, which rendered them utterly unworthy to possess this land. "You make no conscience of forbidden fruit, forbidden food: You eat with the blood," Gen. ix. 4. "Idolatry is still the sin that most easily besets you. You are as fierce, and cruel, and barbarous as ever: You shed blood, innocent blood. You confide in your own strength, You stand upon your sword (v. 26); you think to carry all before you by force of arms. You are guilty of all manner of abominations, and, particularly, you defile everyone his neighbour's wife, and shall you possess the land?" To terrify them, he tells them of the further judgments God had in store for them. These that are in the cities, here called the wastes, shall fall by the sword, either by the sword of the Chaldeans, or by one another's swords. Those that are in the open field shall be devoured by wild beasts. Those that are in the forts and in the caves, that think themselves safe in artificial or natural fastnesses, shall die of the pestilence.

Verses 30–33

Those are reproved who were now in captivity in Babylon, under divine rebukes, and yet were not reformed by them. They made some show of religion and devotion; but their hearts were not right with God. The thing they are here accused of is mocking the messengers of the Lord. Two ways they mocked the prophet Ezekiel:

I. By invidious ill-natured reflections upon him, privately among themselves. The prophet did not know it. But God comes and tells him, The children of thy people are still talking against thee (v. 30). Those have arrived at a great pitch of profaneness who can make the preaching and hearing of the word of God a matter of sport and ridicule, though it be done in private conversation among themselves.

II. By dissembling with him in their attendance upon his ministry. Hypocrites mock God and mock his prophets.

1. The plausible profession which these people made. They are like those (Matt. xv. 8) who draw nigh to God with their mouths and honour him with their lips, but their hearts are far from him. They were diligent and constant in their attendance upon the means of grace: They come unto thee as the people come. In Babylon they had no temple or synagogue, but they went to the prophet's house (ch. viii. 1). Now these hypocrites came, according to the coming of the people, as duly and as early as any of the prophet's hearers. They behaved themselves very decently and reverently in the public assembly. They were very attentive to the word preached. They pretended to have a great kindness and respect for the prophet. Though, behind his back, they could not give him a good word, yet, to his face, they showed much love to him and his doctrine. They took a great deal of pleasure in the word. Ezekiel was to them as one that had a pleasant voice and could sing well, or play well on an instrument. Men may have their fancies pleased by the word, and yet not have their consciences touched nor their hearts changed, the itching ear gratified and yet not the corrupt nature sanctified.

2. The hypocrisy of these professions and pretensions. While they show much love it is only with the mouth, from the teeth outward, but their heart goes after their covetousness; they are as much set upon the world as ever. They hear thy words, but it is only a hearing that they give thee, for they will not do them, v. 31.

3. The end hereof: Shall their unbelief and carelessness make the word of God of no effect? God will confirm the prophet's word, though they make light of it, v. 33. When it comes to pass they shall know, shall know to their cost, that a prophet has been among them, though they made no more of him than as one that had a pleasant voice.

CHAP. XXXIV

In this chapter the shepherds of Israel, their rulers both in church and state, are called to account. I. A high charge exhibited against them for their negligence and unfaithfulness in the management of public affairs, ver. 1–6 and again ver. 8. II. Their discharge from their trust, ver. 7–10. III. A gracious promise that God would take care of his flock, though they did not, ver. 11–16. IV. Another charge against those of the flock that were strong, for the injuries they did to those that were weak, ver. 17–22. V. Another promise that God would in the fulness of time send the Messiah, to be the great and good Shepherd of the sheep, who should set everything to rights with the flock, ver. 23–31.

Verses 1–6

The prophecy of this chapter is not dated, nor any of those that follow it, till chap. xl.

I. The prophet is ordered to prophesy against the shepherds of Israel—the princes and magistrates, the priests and Levites, the kings especially, for there were two now captives in Babylon, who, as well as the people, must have their transgressions shown them, that they might repent. Woe to the shepherds of Israel! Though they are shepherds, and shepherds of Israel, yet he must not spare them.

II. Two things they are charged with: 1. That all their care was to advance and enrich themselves and to make themselves great. Should not the shepherds feed the flocks? They betray their trust if they do not. But these shepherds fed themselves, contrived everything to gratify and indulge their own appetite. They made sure of the fleece, and clothed themselves with the wool. 2. That they took no care for the benefit and welfare of those that were committed to their charge: You feed not the flock. The princes and judges took no care to right those that suffered wrong. They took no care of the poor. The priests took no care to instruct the ignorant. The ministers of state took no care to check the growing distempers of the kingdom. They did not do their duty to those of the flock that were driven away by enemies and forced to seek for shelter where they could find a place, or that wandered of choice upon the mountains and hills (v. 6). Thus were they scattered because there was no shepherd, v. 5. Christ complains that his flock were as sheep having no shepherd, when yet the scribes and Pharisees sat in Moses' seat, Matt. ix. 36.

Verses 7–16

I. How much displeased God is at the shepherds. Their crimes are repeated, v. 8. God's flock became a prey to the deceivers that drew them to idolatry, and to the destroyers that carried them into captivity; and these shepherds took no care to prevent either the one or the other. God is against them, and they shall know it. They shall be made to account for the manner in which they have discharged their trust: "I will require my flock at their hands, and charge it upon them that so many of them are missing." They shall cease from feeding the flock, that is, from pretending to feed it. "Neither shall the shepherds feed themselves any more."

II. How much concerned God is for the flock; for with him the fatherless finds mercy. Precious promises, made here, were to have their accomplishment in the return of the Jews out of their captivity and their re-establishment in their own land. Let the shepherds hear this word of the Lord, and know that they have no part nor lot in the matter.

1. God will gather his sheep together that were scattered, and bring those back to the fold that had wandered from it. "I will both search my sheep and find them out (v. 11) as a shepherd does (v. 12), and bring them back as he does the stray-sheep, upon his shoulders, from all the places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day." God will both incline their hearts to come by his grace and will by his providence open a door for them and remove every difficulty that lies in the way. I will seek that which was lost and bring again that which was driven away, v. 16. This was done when so many thousand Jews returned triumphantly out of Babylon, under the conduct of Zerubbabel, Ezra, and others.

2. God will bring the returning captives safely to their own land (v. 13), will feed them upon the mountains of Israel, and that is a good pasture, and a fat pasture (v. 14); there shall their feeding be, and there shall be their fold; and it is a good fold. There God will cause them to lie down (v. 15), which denotes rest after their wanderings, and a continuing residence.

3. He will succour those that are hurt, will bind up that which was broken and strengthen that which was sick, will comfort those that mourn in Zion and with Zion.

Verses 17–31

The prophet has now a message to deliver to the flock. God had ordered him to speak tenderly to them, and to assure them of the mercy he had in store for them. But here he is ordered to make a difference between the precious and the vile and then to give them a promise of the Messiah.

I. Conviction spoken to those of the flock that were fat and strong, the rams and the he-goats (v. 17), those that, though they had not power, as shepherds and rulers, yet, being rich and wealthy, made use of the opportunity which this gave them to bear hard upon their poor neighbours. The rams and the he-goats not only kept all the good pasture to themselves, but they would not let the poor of the flock have any enjoyment of the little that was left them; they trod down the residue of the pastures and fouled the residue of the waters, v. 18, 19. They not only robbed the poor, to make them poorer, but were troublesome to the sick and weak of the flock (v. 21).

II. Comfort spoken to those of the flock that are poor and feeble, and that wait for the consolation of Israel (v. 22): "I will save my flock, and they shall no more be spoiled by the beasts of prey, by their own shepherds or by the rams and he-goats among themselves." Upon this occasion, as is usual in the prophets, comes in a prediction of the coming of the Messiah, and the setting up of his kingdom.

1. Concerning the Messiah himself. He shall have his commission from God: I will set him up (v. 23); I will raise him up, v. 29. He shall be the great Shepherd of the sheep, who shall do that for his flock which no one else could do. He is the one Shepherd, under whom Jews and Gentiles should be one fold. He is God's servant to re-establish his kingdom among men. He is David, one after God's own heart, set as his King upon the holy hill of Zion, made the head of the corner, with whom the covenant of royalty is made, and to whom God would give the throne of his father David. He is the plant of renown, because a righteous branch (Jer. xxiii. 5), beautiful and glorious, Isa. iv. 2. Some understand it of the church, the planting of the Lord, Isa. lxi. 3.

2. Concerning the great charter by which the kingdom of the Messiah should be founded (v. 25): I will make with them a covenant of peace. The covenant of grace is a covenant of peace. The tenor of this covenant is: "I the Lord will be their God, a God all-sufficient to them (v. 24)." Those, and those only, that have the Lord Jesus for their prince have the Lord Jehovah for their God.

3. Concerning the privileges of those that are the faithful subjects of this kingdom of the Messiah. These are here set forth figuratively, as the blessings of the flock. But we have a key to it, v. 31. Those that belong to this flock, though they are spoken of as sheep, are really men.

(1) They shall enjoy a holy security under the divine protection. Christ, our good Shepherd, has caused the evil beasts to cease out of the land (v. 25), having vanquished all our spiritual enemies. Sin and Satan, death and hell, are conquered. And then they shall dwell safely, not only in the folds, but in the fields, in the wilderness, in the woods. Through Christ, God delivers his people not only from the things they have reason to fear, but from their fear even of death itself.

(2) They shall enjoy a spiritual plenty of all good things. They shall no more be consumed with hunger in the land, v. 29. Showers of blessings shall come upon them, v. 26, 27. The heavens shall yield their dews; the trees of the field also shall yield their fruit. All that are in the neighbourhood of Zion shall fare the better for it; and the nearer the church the nearer its God. The effect of this plenty is, I will make them a blessing. They shall be blessings to all about them. Those that are the blessed of the Lord must study to make themselves blessings to the world. He that is good, let him do good; he that has received the gift, the grace, let him minister the same.

CHAP. XXXV

This chapter enlarges upon the promise concerning the destruction of the enemies of the church; the next chapter upon the promise, the replenishing of the church with blessings. Mount Seir (that is, Edom) is the enemy prophesied against in this chapter, but fitly put here, as in the prophecy of Obadiah, for all the enemies of the church. I. The sin charged upon the Edomites was their spite and malice to Israel, ver. 5, 10–13. II. God will be against them (ver. 2) and then their country shall be laid waste (ver. 4), and made desolate (ver. 6–9), and left so when other nations that had been wasted should recover themselves, ver. 14, 15.

Verses 1–9

Mount Seir was mentioned as partner with Moab in one of the threatenings we had before (ch. xxv. 8); but here it has woes of its own.

I. God espouses his people's cause, and takes what is done against them as done against himself; and it is upon their account that God now contends with the Edomites. 1. Because of the enmity they had against the people of God. "Thou hast had a perpetual hatred to them, to the very name of an Israelite." The Edomites kept up an hereditary malice against Israel, the same that Esau bore to Jacob. The posterity of Esau would never be reconciled to the seed of Jacob. It is strange how deeply-rooted national antipathies sometimes are, and how long they last. 2. Because of the injuries they had done to the people of God. They did not attack them as fair and open enemies, but laid wait for them, to cut off those of them that had escaped (Obad. 14).

II. What should be the effect and issue of that controversy. If God stretch out his hand against the country of Edom, he will make it most desolate, v. 3. Thou hast not hated blood; it implies, "Thou hast delighted in it and thirsted after it." Some read it, "Unless thou hatest blood" (that is, unless thou dost repent, and put off this bloody disposition) blood shall pursue thee." Those that help forward the desolations of Israel may expect to be themselves made desolate. And that which completes the judgment is that Edom shall be made perpetual desolations (v. 9).

Verses 10–15

I. A further account of the sin of the Edomites, and their bad conduct towards the people of God. We find the church complaining of them for setting on the Babylonians, and irritating them against Jerusalem, saying, Rase it, rase it (Ps. cxxxvii. 7), inflaming a rage that needed no spur. They were glad when the Chaldeans did them a mischief. They pleased themselves with hopes that when the people of Israel were destroyed they should be let into the possession of their country. Those have the spirit of Edomites who desire the death of others, because they hope to get by it, or are pleased with their failing because they expect to come into their business. But in this case of the Edomites' coveting the land of Israel, and gaping for it, there was a particular affront to God. They expected possession upon a vacancy, because Israel was driven out, whereas the Lord was still there, v. 10. That was Immanuel's land (Isa. viii. 8); in that land he was to be born.

II. The notice God took of the barbarous insolence of the Edomites, and the doom passed upon them for it: I have heard all thy blasphemies, v. 12. And again (v. 13), You have multiplied your words against me, and I have heard them. God has heard the Edomites' blasphemy; let them therefore hear their doom, v. 14, 15. It was a national sin and therefore shall be punished with a national desolation. The punishment shall answer to the sin: "As thou didst rejoice in the desolation of the house of Israel, God will give thee enough of desolation; since thou art so fond of it, thou shalt be desolate; I will make thee so." Some read v. 14 so as to complete the resemblance between the sin and the punishment: The whole earth shall rejoice when I make thee desolate, as thou didst rejoice when Israel was made desolate.

CHAP. XXXVI

Two distinct prophecies in this chapter: I. The temporal estate of the Jews, wherein their present deplorable condition is described; but it is promised that their grievances shall be all redressed and that in due time they shall be settled again in their own land, in peace and plenty, ver. 1–15. II. Their spiritual estate, wherein they are reminded of their former sins, ver. 16–20. But it is promised, 1. That God would glorify himself in showing mercy to them, ver. 21–24. 2. That he would sanctify them, by giving them his grace and fitting them for his service in answer to their prayers, ver. 25–38.

Verses 1–15

Now God is returning in mercy the prophet must speak good words and comfortable words, v. 1 and again v. 4. You mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Lord; and what he says to them he says to the hills, to the rivers, to the valleys, to the desolate wastes in the country, and to the cities that are forsaken, v. 4. and again v. 6. The people were gone, but the places, the mountains and valleys; these the Chaldeans could not carry away with them. Now, to show the mercy God had in reserve for the people, he is to speak of him as having a dormant kindness for the place.

I. The compassionate notice God takes of the present deplorable condition of the land of Israel. It has become both a prey and a derision to the heathen that are round about, v. 4. 1. They are all enriched with the blunder of it. No one thought it any crime to strip an Israelite. It is the common cry, when a man is down, Down with him. 2. It has become a derision to them. The enemy said, "Aha! even the ancient high places are ours in possession," v. 2. God takes notice of it here as an aggravation of the present calamity of Israel: You are taken up in the lips of talkers and are an infamy of the people, v. 3.

II. The expressions of God's just displeasure against those who triumphed in the desolations of the land of Israel, and Idumea particularly. 1. They carved out large possessions to themselves out of God's land; for so indeed it was: "They have appointed my land into their possession (v. 5), and so not only invaded their neighbour's property, but intrenched upon God's prerogative." Those that had not an opportunity of making a prey of God's people made a reproach of them; so that they were the shame of the heathen, v. 6. 2. God has determined to reckon with them for it, and this in the fire of his jealousy, both for his own honour and for the honour of his people, v. 5. They spoke in their malice against God's people, and God will speak in his jealousy and in his fury, v. 6. Surely the heathen that are about you, they shall bear their shame, v. 7.

III. The promises of God's favour to his Israel and assurances given of great mercy in store for them. The prophet must say to the mountains of Israel, now desolate and despised, that God is for them and will turn to them, v. 9. Their rightful owners should return to the possession of them: My people Israel are at hand to come, v. 8. Though they are dispersed in many countries, yet they shall come again to their own border, Jer. xxxi. 17. The time is at hand for their return. The mountains of Israel are now desolate; but God will cause men to walk upon them again, even his people Israel, not as travellers, but as inhabitants. It was a type of the heavenly Canaan, to which all God's children are heirs. When the land had enjoyed her sabbaths for so many years, it should be so much the more fruitful. You shall be tilled and sown (v. 9) and shall yield your fruit to my people Israel, v. 8. The people of Israel should have a comfortable settlement, in their own land: The cities shall be inhabited; the wastes shall be builded, v. 10. And I will settle you after your old estates, v. 11. I will do better unto you now than at your beginnings. God will bring back to it all the house of Israel, even all of it (observe what an emphasis is laid upon that, v. 10), all whose spirits God stirred up to return. God's kingdom in the world is a growing kingdom; and his church, though for a time it may be diminished, shall recover itself and be again replenished. The reproach long since cast upon the land of Israel by the evil spies, and of late revived, that it was a land that ate up the inhabitants of it by famine, sickness, and the sword, should be quite rolled away. Thou shalt no more bereave them of men (v. 12), shalt devour men no more, v. 14. When the nation is made to flourish in peace (v. 15), especially when it is reformed; when sin is taken away, then they hear no more the reproach of the people.

Verses 16–24

I. How God's name had suffered both by the sins and by the miseries of Israel. 1. God's glory had been injured by the sin of Israel when they were in their own land, v. 17. It was a good land, a land that had the eye of God upon it. But they defiled it by their own way. What was unclean might not be made use of. By the abuse of the gifts of God's bounty to us we forfeit the use of them; and, the mind and conscience being defiled with guilt, no comfort is allowed us, nothing is pure to us. They shed blood and worshipped idols (v. 18) and with those sins defiled the land. God was righteous for he judged them according to their way and according to their doings, v. 19. 2. When they entered into the land of the heathen God had no glory by them there; but, on the contrary, his holy name was profaned, v. 20. The enemies of God took occasion to reproach God, as unable to protect his own worshippers and to make good his own grants.

II. How God would retrieve his honour by working a great reformation upon them and then working a great salvation for them. "I will gather you out of all countries and bring you into your own land, v. 24.

Not for your sake, for you are most unworthy, but for my holy name's sake (v. 22), that I may sanctify my great name," v. 23.

Verses 25–38

The people of God might be discouraged in their hopes of a restoration by the sense of their unfitness, and that is answered in these verses, with a promise that God would by his grace prepare them for the mercy and then bestow it. And this was in part fulfilled in that wonderful effect which the captivity in Babylon had upon the Jews there, that it effectually cured them of their inclination to idolatry.

I. God here promises that he will work a good work in them, v. 25–27. 1. That God would cleanse them from the pollutions of sin (v. 25): I will sprinkle clean water upon you, which signifies both the blood of Christ sprinkled upon the conscience to purify that and to take away the sense of guilt, and the grace of the Spirit sprinkled on the whole soul to purify it from all corrupt inclinations, as Naaman was cleansed from his leprosy by dipping in Jordan. And (v. 29) I will save you from all your uncleannesses. 2. That God would give them a new heart, a disposition of mind vastly different from what it was before. 3. That, instead of a heart of stone, insensible and unapt to receive divine impressions and to return devout affections, God would give a heart of flesh, a soft and tender heart, that has spiritual senses exercised, complying in everything with the will of God. 4. That since, besides our inclination to sin, we complain of an inability to do our duty, God will cause them to walk in his statutes and thoroughly furnish them with wisdom and will, and active powers, for every good work.

II. God here promises that he will take them into covenant with himself. The sum of the covenant of grace we have, v. 28.

III. When they are thus prepared for mercy they shall return to their possessions and be settled again in them (v. 28): You shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers. This shall follow upon the blessed reformation God would work among them (v. 33): "In the day that I shall have cleansed you from all your iniquities, and so shall have made you meet for the inheritance, I will cause you to dwell in the cities, and so put you in possession of the inheritance." This is God's method of mercy indeed, first to part men from their sins, and then to restore them to their comforts. Then they shall enjoy a plenty of all good things. I will call for the corn and will increase it, v. 29. The land that had long lain desolate in the sight of all that passed by, who looked upon it, some with contempt and some with compassion, shall again be tilled (v. 34). And such a blessing will God command on the hand of the diligent that all who pass by shall take notice of it, with wonder, v. 35. Crowds are a lovely sight in God's temple.

IV. He shows what shall be the happy effects of this blessed change. It shall bring them to an ingenuous repentance for their sins (v. 31): Then shall you remember your own evil ways and shall loathe yourselves. It shall have a happy effect upon their neighbours, for it shall bring them to a more clear knowledge of God (v. 36).

V. He proposes these things to them, not as the recompence of their merits, but as the return of their prayers. They must own that the mercies they receive from God are not only not merited, but that they are a thousand times forfeited; they must be so far from boasting of their good works that they must be ashamed of their evil ways, and then they are best prepared for mercy. He requires that his people should seek unto him, when he is coming towards them in ways of mercy. They must pray for it, for by prayer God is sought.

CHAP. XXXVII

The promises of restoration and deliverance, which we have here in the latter part of the book, are for the encouraging of a humble faith. God had assured them that he would gather the house of Israel, even all of it, and return them to their own land; but there were two things that rendered this very unlikely: I. That they were so dispersed among their enemies, and so dispirited likewise in their own minds; they are here, in vision, compared to a valley full of the dry bones of dead men, which should be brought together and raised to life. The vision of this we have (ver. 1–10) and the explication of it, with its application to the present case, ver. 11–14. II. That they were so divided among themselves, too much of the old enmity between Judah and Ephraim remaining even in their captivity. But by a sign of two sticks made one in the hand of the prophet is foreshown the happy coalition that should be, at their return, between the two nations of Israel and Judah, ver. 15–22. In this there was a type of the uniting of Jews and Gentiles, Jews and Samaritans, in Christ and his church. And so the prophet slides into a prediction of the kingdom of Christ, ver. 23–28 .

Verses 1–14

I. The vision of a resurrection from death to life.

1. It is without doubt a most lively representation of a threefold resurrection. (1) The resurrection of souls from the death of sin to the life of righteousness, to a holy, heavenly, spiritual, and divine life, by the power of divine grace going along with the word of Christ, John v. 24, 25. (2) The resurrection of the gospel church, from an afflicted persecuted state, to liberty and peace. (3) The resurrection of the body at the great day, especially the bodies of believers that shall rise to life eternal.

2. The particulars of this vision.

(1) The deplorable condition of these dead bones. The prophet was in vision, carried out and set in the midst of a valley, probably that plain spoken of ch. iii. 22, where God then talked with him; and it was full of bones, of dead men's bones, scattered upon the face of the ground, as if some bloody battle had been fought there, and the slain left unburied, and nothing left but the bones, and those disjointed from one another and dispersed. Lo, they were very dry, having been long exposed to the sun and wind. The Jews in Babylon were like those dead and dry bones, unlikely ever to come together, less likely to be formed into a body, and least of all to be a living body. He was made to own their case deplorable, and not to be helped by any power less than that of God himself (v. 3): "Son of man, can these bones live? Can thy philosophy reach to put life into dry bones, or thy politics to restore a captive nation?" "Lord, thou knowest whether they can and whether they shall; if thou dost not put life into them, it is certain that they cannot live."

(2) The means used for the bringing of these dispersed bones together and these dead and dry bones to life. Ezekiel is ordered to prophesy upon these bones (v. 4 and again v. 9) to prophesy to the wind. So he prophesied as he was commanded, v. 7, 10. He must preach, and he did so; and the dead bones lived by a power that went along with the word of God which he preached. He must pray, and he did so; and the dead bones were made to live in answer to prayer; for a spirit of life entered into them. See the efficacy of the word and prayer, and the necessity of both, for the raising of dead souls. But we call in vain, still they are dead: still they are very dry; we must therefore be earnest with God in prayer for the working of the Spirit with the word: Come, O breath! and breathe upon them. God's grace can save souls without our preaching, but our preaching cannot save them without God's grace, and that grace must be sought by prayer.

(3) The wonderful effect of these means. Those that do as they are commanded, in the face of the greatest discouragements, need not doubt of success. Ezekiel looked down and prophesied upon the bones in the valley, and they became human bodies. First,

That which he had to say to them was that God would infallibly raise them to life, v. 5 and again v. 6. Secondly, That which was immediately done for them was that they were moulded anew into shape. Even dead and dry bones begin to move when they are called to hear the word of the Lord. This was fulfilled, when, upon Cyrus's proclamation of liberty, those whose spirits God had stirred up began to think of making use of that liberty, and getting ready to be gone. But this was not all: The bones came together bone to his bone, under a divine direction; and, though there is in man a multitude of bones, yet of all the bones of those numerous slain not one was missing, not one missed its way, not one missed its place, but each knew and found its fellow. The dispersed bones came together and the displaced bones were knit together. Thus it was in the return of the Jews; those that were scattered in several parts of the province of Babylon came to their respective families. By degrees sinews and flesh came upon these bones, and the skin covered them, v. 8. This was fulfilled when the captives got their effects about them, and the men of their place helped them with silver, and gold, and whatever they needed for their remove, Ezra i. 4. But still there was no breath in them; they wanted spirit and courage for such a difficult and hazardous enterprise as this was of returning to their own land. Ezekiel then looked up and prophesied to the wind, or breath, or spirit, and said, Come, O breath! and breathe upon these slain. In answer to this request, the breath immediately came into them, v. 10. The spirit of life is from God; he at first in the creation breathed into man the breath of life, and so he will at last in the resurrection. The dispirited captives were animated with resolution to break through all the discouragements that lay in the way of their return. And then they stood upon their feet, an exceedingly great army; not only living men, but effective men, fit for service and formidable.

II. The application of this vision to the present calamitous condition of the Jews in captivity: These bones are the whole house of Israel, both the ten tribes and the two.

1. The depth of despair to which they are now reduced, v. 11. When troubles continue long, hopes have been often frustrated, nothing but an active faith in the power, promise, and providence of God will keep them from quite dying away. "Therefore, because things have come thus to the last extremity, prophesy to them, and tell them, now is God's time to appear for them. Jehovah-jireh—in the mount of the Lord it shall be seen," v. 12–14.

Verses 15–28

Precious promises made of the happy state of the Jews after their return to their own land; but they have a further reference to the kingdom of the Messiah and the glories of gospel-times.

I. It is here promised that Ephraim and Judah shall be happily united. Ever since the desertion of the ten tribes from the house of David under Jeroboam, there had been continual feuds and animosities between the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah, even in the land of their captivity. Now there should be a coalition between them. This is here illustrated by a sign. The prophet was to take two sticks, and write upon one, For Judah (including Benjamin, those of the children of Israel that were his companions), upon the other, For Joseph, including the rest of the tribes, v. 16. These two sticks must be so framed as to fall into one in his hand, v. 17. The meaning was that Judah and Israel should become one in the hand of God, v. 19. 1. They shall be one, one nation, v. 22. They shall have no separate interests, and, consequently, no divided affections. They had been two sticks crossing and thwarting one another, beating and bruising one another; but now they shall become one, supporting and strengthening one another. 2. They shall be one in God's hand; by his power they shall be united. They shall be one in his hand, for his glory shall be the centre of their unity and his grace the cement of it. 3. They shall be one in their return out of captivity (v. 21). Their having been joint-sufferers will contribute to this blessed comprehension. Put many pieces of metal together into the furnace, and, when they are melted, they will run all together. God's loving them all was a good reason why they should love one another. 4. They shall all be the subjects of one king, and so they shall become one. The Jews, after their return, were under one government, and not divided as formerly. But this certainly looks further, to the kingdom of Christ; he is that one King in allegiance to whom all God's spiritual Israel shall cheerfully unite.

II. It is here promised that the Jews shall by their captivity be cured of their inclination to idolatry (v. 23). Two ways God will take to cure them of their idolatry: 1. By bringing them out of the way of temptation to it. 2. By changing the disposition of their mind: I will cleanse them (v. 23).

III. It is here promised that they shall be the people of God, and the subjects and sheep of Christ their King and Shepherd. These promises are here repeated (v. 23, 24) for the encouragement of the faith of Israel. David, my servant, shall be king over them. Christ is this David, Israel's King of old.

IV. It is here promised that they shall dwell comfortably, v. 25, 26. They shall dwell in the land of Israel. They shall have it by covenant; they shall come in again upon their old title, by virtue of the grant made unto Jacob, God's servant. They shall come to it by prescription. It was the inheritance of their ancestors, and therefore shall be theirs. They are beloved for their fathers' sakes. They shall dwell therein all their time, and shall leave it for an inheritance to their children and their children's children for ever. They shall live under a good government.

V. It is here promised that God will dwell among them: I will set my sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore; my tabernacle also shall be with them, v. 26, 27. They shall have opportunity of keeping up communion with him, which will be the comfort of their lives. They shall have the means of grace. By the oracles of God in his tabernacle they shall be made wiser and better, and all their children shall be taught of the Lord. Thus their covenant relation to God shall be improved and the bond of it strengthened.

VI. Both God and Israel shall have the honour of this among the heathen, v. 26. "The very heathen shall be made to know that the Lord sanctifies Israel, because his sanctuary is, and shall be, in the midst of them."

CHAP. XXXVIII

This chapter, and that which follows it, are concerning Gog and Magog, a powerful enemy to the people of Israel, that should make a descent upon them, but their army should be routed and their design defeated; and this prophecy, it is most probable, had its accomplishment after the return of the people of Israel in the struggles they had with the kings of Syria, especially Antiochus Epiphanes, or in some other way. God had by the prophet assured his people of happy times after their return to their own land; but he here tells them, as Christ told his disciples, that in the world they shall have tribulation, but they may be of good cheer, for they shall be victorious at last. But the old Testament prophecies had their accomplishment in the Jewish church as the New Testament prophecies shall have when the time comes in the Christian church. I. The attempt that God and Magog should make upon the land of Israel, the vast army they should bring into the field, and their vast preparations (ver. 4–7), their project and design in it (ver. 8–13), God's hand in it, ver. 4. II. The great terror that this should strike upon the land of Israel, ver. 15, 16, 18–20. III. The divine protection that Israel should be under, ver. 2–4, and again ver. 14. IV. The defeat that should be given to those enemies by the immediate hand of God (ver. 21–23).

Verses 1–13

The critical expositors have enough to do here to enquire about Gog and Magog. Some think they find them afar off, in Scythia, Tartary, and Russia. Others think they find them nearer the land of Israel, in Syria, and Asia the Less. Ezekiel is appointed to prophesy against Gog, and to tell him that God is against him, v. 2, 3.

I. The confusion which God designed to put this enemy to. It is remarkable that this is put first in the prophecy; before it is foretold that God will bring him forth against Israel it is foretold that God will put hooks into his jaws and turn him back (v. 4).

II. The undertaking which he designed to engage him in, in order to this defeat. 1. The nations that shall be confederate in this enterprise against Israel are many, and great, and mighty (v. 5, 6), Persia, Ethiopia, &c. Antiochus had an army made up of all the nations here named. 2. They are well furnished with arms—horses and horsemen (v. 4) bravely equipped with all sorts of armour, bucklers and shields for defence, and all handling swords for offence. "Be thou prepared, and do thou prepare" (v. 7). This call to prepare seems to be ironical—Do thy worst, but I will turn thee back; like that Isa. viii. 9. 3. Their design is against the mountains of Israel (v. 8), against the land that is brought back from the sword. It is not long since it was harassed with the sword of war, and it has scarcely recovered any strength since it was brought down by war. It is a people that dwell safely, all of them, in unwalled villages, very secure, and having neither bars nor gates, v. 11. They intend no mischief to their neighbours, for they fear no mischief from them. 4. That which the enemy has in view, in forming this project, is to enrich himself and to make himself master, not of the country, but of the wealth of it. It came into Antiochus's mind what a singular people these religious Jews were, and how their worship condemned the idolatries of their neighbours, and therefore, in enmity to their religion, he would plague them. It came into his mind what a wealthy people they were, that they had gotten cattle and goods in the midst of the land (v. 12). He came to this resolve (v. 11, 12): "I will go up to the land of unwalled villages; yea, that I will; it will cost me nothing to make them all my own." These were the thoughts that came into the mind of this wicked prince, and God knew them. 5. According to the project thus formed he pours in all his forces upon the land of Israel, and finds those that are ready to come in to his assistance with the same prospects (v. 9).

Verses 14–23

This latter part of the chapter is a repetition of the former.

I. It is again foretold that this spiteful enemy should make a formidable descent upon the land of Israel (v. 15). Thou shalt soon find that there is no enchantment against Jacob, that no weapon formed against them shall prosper; thou shalt know to thy cost, shalt know to thy shame, that though they have no walls, nor bars, nor gates, they have God himself, a wall of fire, round about them, and that he who touches them touches the apple of his eye; whosoever meddles with them meddles to his own hurt. But God said: I will bring thee against my land. This is strange news, that God will not only permit his enemies to come against his own children, but will himself bring them. It is "that the heathen may know me to be the only living and true God when I shall be sanctified in thee, O Gog! that is, in thy defeat and destruction before their eyes, that all the nations may see, and say, There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun, that rides on the heavens for the help of his people."

II. Reference is herein had to the predictions of the former prophets (v. 17). Moses spoke in his prophecy of the latter days, Deut. xxxii. 43, and David, Ps. ix. 15, and often elsewhere in the Psalms. This is the leviathan of whom Isaiah spoke (Isa. xxvii. 1), that congress of the nations of which Joel spoke, Joel iii. 1.

III. It is here foretold that this furious formidable enemy should be utterly cut off in this attempt upon Israel. This is supposed by many to have its accomplishment in the many defeats given by the Maccabees to the forces of Antiochus. When he comes up in pride and anger against the land of Israel, then God's fury shall come up in his face, which is an allusion to men, whose colour rises in their faces when some high affront is offered them, v. 18. His forces shall be put into the greatest confusion and consternation imaginable (v. 19): There shall be a great shaking of them in the land of Israel (v. 20), such as shall affect the fishes and fowls, the beasts and creeping things, and much more the men that are upon the face of the earth. He shall be routed and utterly ruined; both earth and heaven shall be armed against him. The great men of Syria shall undermine and overthrow one another. The artillery of heaven shall also be drawn out against them: I will rain upon him an overflowing rain, v. 22. He comes like a storm upon Israel, v. 9. But God will come like a storm upon him.

CHAP. XXXIX

This chapter concludes the prophecy against Gog and Magog, in whose destruction God crowns his favour to his people Israel. I. An express prediction of the utter destruction of Gog and Magog, ver. 1–7. II. The vastness of that destruction: the burning of their weapons (ver. 8–10), the burying of their slain (ver. 11–16), and the feasting of the fowls with the dead bodies of those that were unburied, ver. 17–22. III. A declaration of God's gracious purposes concerning his people Israel, ver. 23–29.

Verses 1–7

This prophecy begins as that before (ch. xxxviii. 3, 4, I am against thee, and I will turn thee back). 1. His soldiers shall be disarmed and so disabled to carry on their enterprise, v. 3. 2. He and the greatest part of his army shall be slain in the field of battle (v. 4). Thou shalt fall upon the open field (v. 5). Even upon the mountains he shall not find a pass that he shall be able to maintain, and upon the open field he shall not find a road for his escape. Never was army so totally routed as this. And, for its greater infamy and reproach, their bodies shall be a feast to the birds of prey, v. 4. 3. His country also shall be made desolate: I will send a fire on Magog (v. 6) and among those that dwell carelessly, or confidently, in the isles, that is, the nations of the Gentiles. His people Israel shall hereby know more of God's name, of his power and goodness, his care of them, his faithfulness to them. And this is God's method of dealing with men, first to enlighten their understandings, and by that means to influence the whole man; he first makes us to know his holy name, and so keeps us from polluting it and engages us to honour it. The heathen those that never knew it, or would not own it, shall know that I am the Lord, the Holy One in Israel.

Verses 8–22

Though this prophecy was to have its accomplishment in the latter days, yet it is here spoken of as if it were already accomplished, because it is certain (v. 8). To represent the routing of the army of Gog as very great, here are three things specified as the consequences of it. It was God himself that gave the defeat; we do not find that the people of Israel drew a sword or struck a stroke: but,

I. They shall burn their weapons, their bows and arrows, which fell out of their hands (v. 3), everything that is combustible. They should have no occasion to take wood out of the field or forests for seven years together (v. 10), such vast quantities of weapons shall there be left upon the open field where the enemy fell.

II. They shall bury their dead. The slain lie dispersed on the mountains of Israel, and it is left to the house of Israel to bury them. A place shall be appointed for the burying of them, the valley of the passengers, on the east of the sea, either the salt sea or the sea of Tiberias. And it shall be called, The valley of Hamon-gog, that is, of the multitude of Gog. Acts of humanity add much to the renown of God's Israel; and a good work it is to bury the dead, though they be strangers and enemies to the commonwealth of Israel.

Verses 23–29

This has reference not only to the predictions concerning Gog and Magog, but to all the prophecies of this book concerning the captivity of the house of Israel, and their restoration and return out of their captivity.

I. God will let the heathen know the meaning of his people's troubles. Upon their reformation and return to him, he turned again their captivity, and brought them back to their own land, and wrought great salvations for them. Then it would be made to appear, even to the heathen, that there was no ground at all for their reflection, that Israel went into captivity because God could not protect them, but because they had by sin forfeited his favour and thrown themselves out of his protection (v. 23, 24). That was the true reason why God hid his face from them and gave them into the hand of their enemies. 1. God punishes sin even in his own people, because he hates it most in those that are nearest and dearest to him, Amos iii. 2. 2. When God gives up his people for a prey, it is to correct them and reform them, not to gratify their enemies, Isa. x. 7; xlii. 24. 3. No sooner do God's people humble themselves under the rod than he returns in mercy to them.

II. God will give his own people to know what favour he has in store for them (v. 25, 26).

1. Now God will have mercy upon the whole house of Israel, because they repent of their sins. God has justly brought them into a land of trouble, where everyone makes them afraid, because they had trespassed against him in a land of peace, where none made them afraid. And, when they thus humble themselves under humbling providences, God will bring again their captivity.

2. As God was reproached in the reproach they were under during their captivity, so he will be sanctified in their reformation and the making of them a holy people again, and will be glorified in their restoration and the making of them a happy glorious people again, v. 27. Then they shall have the benefit of it (v. 28): They shall know that I am the Lord their God.

CHAP. XL

The waters of the sanctuary which this prophet saw in vision (ch. xlvii. 1) are a proper representation of this prophecy. Here is one continued vision, beginning at this chapter, to the end of the book, which is justly looked upon to be one of the most difficult portions of scripture. Many commentators, both ancient and modern, have owned themselves at a loss. But because it is hard to be understood we must humbly search it, get as far as we can into it and as much as we can out of it, and, when we despair of satisfaction in every difficulty, bless God that our salvation does not depend upon it, but that things necessary are plain enough. Here is the vision of a glorious temple (in this chapter and ch. xli and xlii), of God's taking possession of it (ch. xliii), orders concerning the priests that are to minister in this temple (ch. xliv), the division of the land, what portion should be allotted for the sanctuary, what for the city, and what for the prince (ch. xlv), and further instructions for him and the people, ch. xlvi. After the vision of the holy waters we have the borders of the holy land, and the portions assigned to the tribes, and the dimensions and gates of the holy city, ch. xlvii, xlviii. Some make this to represent what had been during the flourishing state of the Jewish church, how glorious Solomon's temple was in its best days, that the captives might see what they had lost by sin. But that seems not probable. The general scope of it I take to be, 1. To assure the captives that they should not only return to their own land, and be settled there, but that they should be encouraged to build another temple, which God would own, and where he would meet them and bless them, that the ordinances of worship should be revived, and the sacred priesthood should there attend. 2. To direct them to look further than all this, and to expect the coming of the Messiah, who had before been prophesied of under the name of David. The dimensions of these visionary buildings being so large, plainly intimates, as Dr. Lightfoot observes, that these things cannot be literally, but must be spiritually, understood. And the gospel-temple, erected by Christ and his apostles, was so closely connected with the second material temple, was erected just at the time when that fell into decay, that it was proper enough that they should both be referred to in one and the same vision. Under the type and figure of a temple and altar, priests and sacrifices, is foreshown the spiritual worship that should be performed in gospel times, and perfected at last in the kingdom of glory, in which perhaps these visions will have their full accomplishment, and some think in some happy and glorious state of the gospel-church on this side heaven, in the latter days.

In this chapter we have, I. A general account of this vision of the temple and city, ver. 1–4. II. A particular account of it, and a description given, 1. Of the outside wall, ver. 5. 2. Of the east gate, ver. 6–19. 3. Of the north gate, ver. 20–23. 4. Of the south gate (ver. 24–31) and the chambers and other appurtenances be onging to these gates. 5. Of the inner court, both towards the east and towards the south, ver. 32–38. 6. Of the tables, ver. 39–43. 7. Of the lodgings for the singers and the priests, ver. 44–47 8. Of the porch of the house, ver. 48, 49.

Verses 1–4

1. The date of this vision. It was in the twenty-fifth year of Ezekiel's captivity (v. 1), which some compute to be the thirty-third year of the first captivity, and is here said to be the fourteenth year after the city was smitten. "Then the hand of the Lord was upon me and brought me thither to Jerusalem, now that it was in ruins, desolate and deserted"—a pitiable sight to the prophet. 2. The prophet was brought, in the visions of God, to the land of Israel, v. 2. Here he is carried thither to have a pleasing prospect of it in its glory. He was set upon a very high mountain, as Moses upon the top of Pisgah, to view this land, which was now a second time a land of promise. From the top of this mountain he saw this city was a temple as large as a city. It is a city for men to dwell in; it is a temple for God to dwell in; for in the church on earth God dwells with men, in that in heaven men dwell with God. 3. The particular discoveries of this city were made to him by a man whose appearance was like the appearance of brass (v. 3), Jesus Christ. It is through Christ that we have both acquaintance with and access to the benefits and privileges of God's house. His appearing like brass intimates both his brightness and his strength. 4. The dimensions of this city or temple were taken with a line of flax and a measuring reed, or rod (v. 3). 5. Directions are here given to the prophet to receive this revelation from the Lord and transmit it pure and entire to the church, v. 4.

Verses 5–26

The measuring-reed which was in the hand of the surveyor-general was mentioned before, v. 3. Here we are told (v. 5) what was the exact length of it. It was six cubits long, not the common cubit, but the cubit of the sanctuary, and that was a hand-breadth (that is, four inches) longer than the common cubit: the common cubit was eighteen inches, this twenty-two, see ch. xliii. 13. Some critics contend that this measuring-reed was but six common cubits in length, and one hand-breadth added to the whole. The former seems more probable. Here is an account,

I. Of the outer wall of the house, which encompassed it round, which denotes the separation between the church and the world.

II. Of the several gates with the chambers adjoining to them.

1. He begins with the east gate, because that was the usual way of entering into the lower end of the temple, the holy of holies being at the west end. Now, in the account of this gate, observe, (1) That he went up to it by stairs (v. 6), for when we go to worship God we must ascend; so is the call, Rev. iv. 1. (2) That the chambers adjoining to the gates were but little chambers, about ten feet square, v. 7. These were for those to lodge in who attended the service of the house. (3) The chambers, as they were each of them four-square, so they were all of one measure, that there might be an equality among the attendants. (4) The chambers were very many; for in our Father's house there are many mansions (John xiv. 2), in his house above, and in that here on earth. Some make these chambers to represent the particular congregations of believers, which are parts of the great temple, the universal church. (5) It is said (v. 14), He made also the posts. (6) Here are posts of sixty cubits, which, some think, was literally fulfilled when Cyrus, in his edict for rebuilding the temple at Jerusalem, ordered that the height thereof should be sixty cubits, that is, thirty yards and more, Ezra vi. 3. (7) Here were windows to the little chambers, and windows to the posts and arches (that is, to the cloisters below), and windows round about (v. 16), to signify the light from heaven with which the church is illuminated. There were lights to the little chambers; even the least. But they are narrow windows. The discoveries made to the church on earth are but narrow compared with what shall be in the future state. (8) Divers courts are here spoken of, an outermost of all, then an outer court, then an inner, and then the innermost of all, into which the priests only entered. These courts had porches, or piazzas, round them, for the shelter of those that attended in them from wind and weather. (9) On the posts were palm-trees engraven (v. 16), to signify that the righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree in the courts of God's house, Ps. xcii. 12. The more they are depressed with the burden of affliction the more strongly do they grow, as they say of the palm-trees. (10) Notice is taken of the pavement of the court, v. 17, 18. The word intimates that the pavement was made of porphyry-stone, which was of the colour of burning coals; for the brightest glories of this world should be put under our feet when we draw near to God.

2. The gates that looked towards the north (v. 20) and towards the south (v. 24), are much the same with that towards the east, after the measure of the first gate, v. 21. This temple had not only a gate towards the east, to let into it the children of the east, that were famous for their wealth and wisdom, but it had a gate to the north, and another to the south, for the admission of the poorer and less civilised nations. The new Jerusalem has twelve gates, three towards each quarter of the world (Rev. xxi. 13); for many shall come from all parts to sit down there, Matt. viii. 11.

Verses 27–38

A delineation of the inner court. The survey of the inner court begins with the south side (v. 27), proceeds to the east (v. 32), and so to the north (v. 35). 1. These gates into the inner court were exactly uniform with those into the outer court. The work of grace is the same, for substance, in grown Christians that they are in young beginners. 2. The ascent into the outer court at each gate was by seven steps, but the ascent into the inner court at each gate was by eight steps. This is expressly taken notice of (v. 31, 34, 37), to signify that the nearer we approach to God the more we should rise above this world and the things of it. The people, who worshipped in the outer court, must rise seven steps above other people, but the priests, who attended in the inner court, must rise eight steps above them.

Verses 39–49

An account,

I. Of the tables that were in the porch of the gates of the inner court. Here were eight tables provided, whereon to slay the sacrifices, v. 41. They are to intimate the multitude of spiritual sacrifices that should be brought to God's house in gospel-times. Here were the shambles for the altar (v. 43), and there also they washed the burnt-offerings (v. 38), to intimate that before we draw near to God's altar we must wash our hands, our hearts, those spiritual sacrifices.

II. Of the use of the chambers. 1. Some were for the singers, v. 44. The singing of psalms should still continue a gospel-ordinance. Christians should be singers. 2. Others of them were for the priests, both those that kept the charge of the house, to cleanse it, and to keep it in good repair (v. 45), and those that kept the charge of the altar (v. 46).

III. Of the inner court, the court of the priests, which was fifty yards square, v. 47. The altar that was before the house was placed in the midst of this court. Christ is both our altar and our sacrifice, to whom we must look with faith in all our approaches to God.

IV. Of the porch of the house. There was a porch, to teach us not to rush hastily and inconsiderately into the presence of God, but gravely, and with solemnity, passing first through the outer court, then the inner, then the porch, ere we enter into the house.

CHAP. XLI

The temple itself, the description of which creates much difficulty to the critical expositors. It shall suffice us to observe, I. The dimensions, the posts (ver. 1), the door (ver. 2), the wall and the side-chambers (ver. 5, 6), the foundations and wall of the chambers, their doors (ver. 8–11), and the house itself, ver. 13. II. The dimensions of the most holy place, ver. 3, 4. III. An account of another building against the separate place, ver. 12–15. IV. The manner of the building of the house, ver. 7, 16, 17. V. The ornaments, ver. 18–20. VI. The altar of incense and the table, ver. 22. VII. The doors between the temple and the oracle, ver. 23–26. There is so much difference in the terms of architecture between one age and another, one place and another, that it ought not to be any stumbling-block that there is so much hard to be understood. To a common carpenter or mason among the Jews at that time we may suppose that all this, in the literal sense of it, was easy enough.

Verses 1–11

1. After the prophet had observed the courts he was at length brought to the temple, v. 1. If we diligently attend to the instructions given us in the plainer parts of religion, and profit by them, we shall be led further into an acquaintance with the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven. Those that are willing to dwell in God's courts shall at length be brought into his temple. 2. When our Lord Jesus spoke of the destroying of this temple, which his hearers understood of this second temple of Jerusalem, he spoke of the temple of his body (John ii. 19, 21); Ezekiel's vision had respect to them both, including also his mystical body the church, called the house of God (1 Tim. iii. 15), and all the members of that body, living temples, in which the Spirit dwells. 3. The very posts of this temple, the door-posts, were far one from the other, and consequently the door was wide. In comparison with what had been under the law we may say, Wide is the gate which leads into the church, the ceremonial law, that wall of partition which had so much straitened the gate, being taken down. 4. The most holy place was an exact square, v. 4. The new Jerusalem is exactly square (Rev. xxi. 16), denoting its stability. 5. The upper stories were larger than the lower, v. 7. Care was taken that the timber might have fast hold (though God builds high, he builds firmly). The higher we build up ourselves in our most holy faith the more should our hearts, those living temples, be enlarged.

Verses 12–26

1. An account of a building that was before the separate place (that is, before the temple), at the end towards the west (v. 12). This stood in a court by itself. Perhaps, in this vision, it signified the setting up of a church among the Gentiles not inferior to the Jewish temple, but of quite another nature. 2. A description of the ornaments of the temple, and the other building. The walls on the inside from top to bottom were adorned with cherubim and palm-trees, placed alternately. Each cherub is said to have two faces, the face of a man and the face of a young lion, v. 19. These seem to represent the angels, who have more than the wisdom of a man and the courage of a lion; the palms of victory are set before them. 3. A description of the posts of the doors both of the temple and of the sanctuary; they were squared (v. 21). In the tabernacle, and in Solomon's temple, the door of the sanctuary was narrower than that of the temple, but here it was as broad; for in gospel-times the way into the holiest of all is made more manifest than it was under the Old Testament (Heb. ix. 8). These doors are described, v. 23, 24. 4. The altar of incense, here said to be an altar of wood, v. 22. It would not bear the fire with which the incense was to be burned, unless it intimates that the incense to be offered in the gospel-temple shall be purely spiritual, and the fire spiritual. This altar is called a table. The great sacrifice being now offered, that which we have to do is to feast upon the sacrifice at the Lord's table.

CHAP. XLII

This chapter concludes the describing and measuring of this mystical temple. I. A description of the chambers that were about the courts (ver. 1–13), and the uses for which they were designed, ver. 13–14. II. A survey of the whole, and the courts belonging to it, ver. 15–20.

Verses 1–14

The prophet has taken a very exact view of the temple and is now brought again into the outer court.

I. A description of chambers which seems to us very intricate. We shall only observe, in general, 1. That about the temple, which was the place of public worship, there were private chambers. We must not only worship in the courts of God's house, but must, both before and after our attendance there, enter into our chambers, and read and meditate, and pray to our Father in secret. 2. That these chambers were many; there were three stories of them, v. 5, 6. There were many for such devout people as Anna the prophetess, who departed not from the temple night or day, Luke ii. 37. 3. That these chambers, though they were private, yet were near the temple, to prepare us for the exercises of devotion in public. 4. That before these chambers there were walks of five yards broad (v. 4), in which those that had lodgings in these chambers might meet and talk together, and share their experiences. Man is made for society, and Christians for the communion of saints.

II. The use of these chambers appointed, v. 13, 14. 1. They were for the priests that approach unto the Lord. Therefore they are called holy chambers, because they were for use of those that ministered in holy things during their ministration. 2. There the priests were to deposit the most holy things, those parts of the offerings which fell to their share. 3. There they were to lay their vestments, which God had appointed them to wear when they ministered at the altar. We read of the providing of priests garments after their return out of captivity, Neh. vii. 70, 72. When they had ended their service at the altar they must lay by those garments, but they must put on other garments, such as other people wear, when they approached to those things which were for the people, that is, to teach them the law and to answer their enquiries.

Verses 15–20

The measuring of this mystical temple to see how far the holy ground on which we tread extends. 1. It extended each way 500 reeds (v. 16–19), each reed above three yards and a half, so that it reached every way about an English measured mile. Thus large were the suburbs of this mystical temple, signifying the great extent of the church in gospel-times. Room should be made in God's courts for the numerous Gentiles, Isa. xlix. 18; lx. 4. 2. The dimensions were thus large to make a separation, by putting a distance between the sanctuary and the profane place. A difference is to be put between common and sacred things, between God's name and other names, between his day and other days, his book and other books.

CHAP. XLIII

The prophet, having given us a view of the mystical temple, the gospel-church, as he received it from the Lord, comes to describe the worship that should be performed in it, but under the type of the Old Testament services. I. Possession taken of this temple, by the glory of God filling it, ver. 1–6. II. A promise given of the continuance of God's presence with his people upon condition of their return to the instituted way of worship, and their abandoning idolatry, ver. 7–12. III. A description of the altar of burnt-offerings, ver. 13–17. IV. Directions given for the consecration of that altar, ver. 18–27. Ezekiel seems there to stand between God and Israel, as Moses the servant of the Lord did when the sanctuary was first set up.

Verses 1–6

After Ezekiel has patiently surveyed the temple of God, the greatest glory of this earth, he is honoured with a sight of the glories of the upper world; Come up hither. He has seen the temple, spacious and splendid; but, till the glory of God comes into it, it is but like the dead bodies he had seen in vision (ch. xxxvii), that had no breath till the Spirit of life entered into them. Here therefore he sees the house filled with God's glory.

I. A vision of the glory of God (v. 2), the glory of the God of Israel, who is in covenant with Israel. The idols of the heathen have no glory but what they owe to the goldsmith or the painter. This glory came from the way of the east. Christ's star was seen in the east. For he is the morning star, he is the sun of righteousness. Two things in this appearance of the glory of God: 1. The power of his word which he heard: His voice was like a noise of many waters. Christ's gospel, in the glory of which he shines, was to be proclaimed aloud, the report of it to be heard far. 2. The brightness of his appearance which he saw: The earth shone with his glory; for God is light, and none can bear the lustre of his light, none has seen nor can see it. That glory of God which shines in the church shines on the world.

II. A vision of the entrance of this glory into the temple. When he saw this glory he fell upon his face (v. 3), in humble and reverent adoration. But the Spirit took him up (v. 5) when the glory of the Lord had come into the house (v. 4), that he might see how the house was filled with it. This was to have its accomplishment in that glory of the divine grace which shines so brightly in the gospel church, and fills it. Here is no mention of a cloud filling the house as formerly, for we now with open face behold the glory of the Lord, in the face of Christ, and not as of old through the cloud of types.

III. He receives instructions more immediately from the glory of the Lord, as Moses did when God had taken possession of the tabernacle (Lev. i. 1): I heard him speaking to me out of the house, v. 6.

Verses 7–12

God does here, in effect, renew his covenant with his people Israel, upon his retaking possession of the house.

I. God, by the prophet, puts them in mind of their former provocations. This is spoken to make way for the comforts designed them. They had formerly defiled God's holy name, v. 7. They and their kings had brought contempt on the religion they professed by setting up altars to their idols even in the courts of the temple, than which a more impudent affront could not be put upon the divine Majesty. Thus they set up a separation wall between him and them, which stopped the current of his favours to them. If often proves too true, The nearer the church the further from God.

II. He calls upon them to repent (v. 9): "Now let them put away their whoredom; and now that God is returning in mercy to them and setting up his sanctuary again in the midst of them, let them cast away their idols, those loathsome carcases of their kings." The prophet had the model or pattern of the temple to set before them. 1. If they see that pattern, they will surely be ashamed of their sins (v. 10). The goodness of God to us should lead us to repentance. Let them measure the pattern themselves, and see how much it exceeds the former pattern, and guess by that what great things God has in store for them. 2. If they be ashamed of their sins, they shall surely see more of the pattern, v. 11. "Show them the form of the house; and show them the ordinances and laws of it." With the privileges of God's house we must acquaint ourselves with the rules of it. Show them these ordinances, that they may keep them and do them.

III. He promises that they should be such as they should be, and then he will be to them such as they would have him to be, v. 7. Then I will dwell in the midst of them for ever; again v. 9.

IV. The general law of God's house is laid down (v. 12), That, whereas formerly only the chancel, or sanctuary, was most holy, now the whole mountain of the house shall be so. In gospel-times, 1. The whole church shall have the privilege of the holy of holies, that of a near access to God. All believers have now, under the gospel, boldness to enter into the holiest (Heb. x. 19), whereas the high priest entered in the virtue of the blood of bulls and goats, we enter in the virtue of the blood of Jesus, and, wherever we are, we have through him access to the Father.

Verses 13–27

This relates to the altar in this mystical temple, and that is mystical too; for Christ is our altar. The Jews, after their return out of captivity, had an altar long before they had a temple, Ezra iii. 3. But this was an altar in the temple.

I. The measures of the altar, v. 13. It was six yards square at the top and seven yards square at the bottom; it was four yards and a half high; it had a lower bench or shelf, here called a settle, a yard from the ground, on which some of the priests stood to minister, and another two yards above that, on which others of them stood. What was to be burnt on the altar was given up to those on the lower bench, and handed by them to those on the higher, and they laid it on the altar.

II. The ordinances of the altar. 1. Seven days were to be spent in the dedication of it, and every day sacrifices were to be offered (v. 25). Neither our persons nor our performances can be acceptable to God unless sin be taken away, and that cannot be taken away but by the blood of Christ, which both sanctifies the altar, and the gift upon the altar. The dedication of the altar is here called the cleansing and purging of it, v. 20, 26. All the sacrifices must be seasoned with salt (v. 24). Grace is the salt with which all our religious performances must be seasoned, Col. iv. 6. 2. Concerning the constant use that should be made of the temple when it was dedicated (v. 27). It was sanctified, that it might sanctify the gift that was offered upon it. (1) Who were to serve at the altar: The priests of the seed of Zadok, v. 19. His name signifies righteous, for they are the righteous seed that are priests to God, through Christ the Lord our righteousness. (2) How they should prepare for this service (v. 26). Before we minister to the Lord in holy things we must consecrate ourselves.

CHAP. XLIV

I. The appropriating of the east gate of the temple to the prince, ver. 1–3. II. A reproof sent to the house of Israel for their former profanations of God's sanctuary, ver. 4–9. III. The degrading of those Levites that had formerly been guilty of idolatry and the establishing of the priesthood in the family of Zadok, which had kept their integrity, ver. 10–16. IV. Divers laws and ordinances concerning the priests, ver. 17–31.

Verses 1–3

The prophet is brought a third time to the east gate, and finds it shut, which intimates that the rest of the gates were open at all times to the worshippers. But such an account is given of this gate's being shut as puts honour, 1. Upon the God of Israel. It is for the honour of him that the gate of the inner court, at which his glory entered when he took possession of the house, was ever after kept shut, v. 2. 2. Upon the prince of Israel, v. 3. (1) He shall sit in this gate to eat his share of the peace-offerings before the Lord. (2) He shall enter by the way of the porch of that gate, by some little door or wicket. Some by the prince here understand the high priest, and that he only was allowed to enter by this gate, for he was God's representative. Christ is the high priest of our profession, who entered himself into the holy place, and opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers.

Verses 4–9

The prophet must look again upon what he had before seen, and must be told again what he had before heard. Here, as before, he sees the house filled with the glory of the Lord, which strikes an awe upon him: I fell upon my face, v. 4.

I. God charges the prophet to take notice of all he saw, and all that was said to him (v. 5). 1. "Behold with thy eyes what is shown thee, particularly the entering in of the house and every going forth of it, all the inlets and all the outlets of the sanctuary." 2. Hear with thy ears all that I say unto thee about the laws and ordinances of the house, to instruct the people.

II. He sends him upon an errand to the people, to the rebellious, even to the house of Israel, v. 6.

1. He must show the house of Jacob their sins. They had admitted those to the privileges of the sanctuary that were not entitled to them (v. 7). Yet if these strangers had been devout, though they were not circumcised, the crime would not have been so great; but they were uncircumcised in heart too, strangers indeed to God and all goodness. They had employed those in the service of the sanctuary who were not fit for it. "You have set keepers of my charge in my sanctuary for yourselves, such as you had some favour or affection for; thus you have not kept the charge of my holy things."

2. He must tell them their duty (v. 9): "No stranger shall enter into my sanctuary till he has first submitted to the laws of it."

Verses 10–16

The Master of the house, being about to set up house again, takes account of his servants the priests, and sees who are fit to be kept.

I. Those who have been treacherous are degraded and put lower. Those Levites—or priests who were carried down the stream of the apostasy of Israel formerly (v. 10), who had complied with the idolatrous kings of Israel or Judah, who ministered to them before their idols (v. 12)—were justly put under the mark of God's displeasure. They are sentenced to be deprived in part, of their office, and from the dignity of priests are put down into the condition of ordinary Levites. Yet there is a mixture of mercy in this sentence. God mitigates the sentence, v. 11, 14. They shall help to slay the sacrifice, not at the altar, but at the tables, ch. xl. 39. They shall be porters at the gates of the house.

II. Those who have been faithful are honoured and established, v. 15, 16. "But the sons of Zadok, who kept their integrity in a time of general apostasy, who went not astray when others did, they shall come near to me, shall come near to my table."

Verses 17–31

God's priests must be regulars, not seculars; and therefore here are rules laid down for them.

I. Concerning their clothes; they must wear linen garments when they went in to minister, and nothing that was woollen, because it would cause sweat, v. 17, 18. When they had finished their service they must change their clothes again, and lay up their linen garments in the chambers appointed for that purpose, v. 19, as before, ch. xlii. 14.

II. Concerning their hair; in that they must avoid extremes on both hands (v. 20); They must not shave their heads, in imitation of the Gentile priests; nor, on the other hand, must they suffer their locks to grow long, that they might be thought Nazarites, when really they were not; but they must be grave and modest, must poll their heads and keep their hair short.

III. Concerning their diet; they must be sure to drink no wine when they went in to minister, lest they should drink to excess, should drink and forget the law, v. 21.

IV. Concerning their marriages, v. 22. Here they must consult the credit of their office, and not marry one that had been divorced, that was under the suspicion of immodesty, nor a widow, unless she were a priest's widow, accustomed to the usages of the priests' families.

V. Concerning their preaching and church-government. It was part of their business to teach the people; and herein they must approve themselves both skilful and faithful (v. 23). It was part of their business to judge upon appeals made to them (Deut. xvii. 8, 9), and in controversy they shall stand in judgment, v. 24. They shall have the honesty to stand up for what is right, and, when they have passed a right judgment, shall have the courage to stand by it. Another part of their work, as church governors, is to hallow God's sabbaths, and to see that God's people also sanctify that day and do nothing to pollute it.

VI. Concerning their mourning for dead relations; the rule here agrees with the law of Moses, Lev. xxi. 1, 11. A priest shall not come near any dead body (for they must be purified from dead works) except of his next relations, v. 25.

VII. Concerning their maintenance; they must live upon the altar at which they served (v. 28). Some land was allowed them (ch. xlviii. 10), but their principal subsistence was by their office.

1. What the priests were to have from the people, for their maintenance and encouragement. They must have the flesh of many of the offerings. They must have every dedicated thing in Israel, which was in many cases to be turned into money and given to the priest. This is explained, v. 30. They were to have the first of the dough when it was going to the oven, as well as the first of their fruits when they were going to the barn. The priests being so well provided for, it would be inexcusable in them if they should eat that which is torn or which died of itself, v. 31.

2. What the people might expect from the priest for their recompence. Those that are kind to a prophet, to a priest, shall have a prophet's, a priest's reward (v. 30). It was part of the priest's work to bless the people in the name of the Lord, not only their congregations, but their families.

CHAP. XLV

In this chapter is further represented to the prophet, in vision, I. The division of the holy land, so much for the temple, and the priests that attended the service of it (ver. 1–4), so much for the Levites (ver. 5), so much for the city (ver. 6), so much for the prince, and the residue of the people, ver. 7, 8. II. The ordinances of justice that were given both to prince and people, ver. 9–12. III. The oblations they were to offer, ver. 13–17. Particularly in the beginning of the year (ver. 18–20) and in the passover, and the feast of tabernacles, ver. 21–25.

Verses 1–8

Directions are here given for the dividing of the land after their return to it. 1. Here is the portion of land assigned to the sanctuary, in the midst of which the temple was to be built (v. 1), an oblation to the Lord; for what is given for the maintenance of the worship of God and the advancement of religion, God accepts as given to him. This holy portion of the land was to be measured, and the borders of it fixed. The priests and Levites that were to come near to minister were to have their dwellings in this portion of the land that was round about the sanctuary. 2. Next to the lands of the sanctuary the city-lands are assigned, in which the holy city was to be built, and with the issues and profits of which the citizens were to be maintained (v. 6). 3. The next allotment after the church-lands and the city-lands is of the crown-lands, v. 7, 8. They are said to lie on the one side and on the other side of the church-lands and city-lands, to intimate that the prince with his wealth and power was to be a protection to both. My princes shall no more oppress my people; for God will make the officers peace and the exactors righteousness. Nehemiah was one that did not do as the former governors, Neh. v. 15, 18. 4. The rest of the lands were to be distributed to the people according to their tribes.

Verses 9–12

Some general rules of justice laid down both for prince and people. 1. That princes do not oppress their subjects, but duly and faithfully administer justice among them (v. 9). Let them take away their exactions, ease their subjects of those taxes which they find lie heavily upon them, and let them execute judgment and justice according to law. 2. That one neighbour do not cheat another in commerce (v. 10): You shall have just balances. It concerns God's Israel to be honest and just in all their dealings, punctual and exact in rendering to all their due, because otherwise they spoil the acceptableness of their profession with God and the reputation of it before men.

Verses 13–25

Having laid down the rules of righteousness towards men, he comes next to give some directions for their religion towards God.

I. It is required that they offer an oblation to the Lord (v. 13): All the people of the land must give an oblation, v. 16. They had offered an oblation out of their real estates (v. 1), a holy portion of their land; now they are directed to offer an oblation out of their goods and chattels.

II. The proportion of this oblation is here determined, which was not done by the law of Moses. 1. Out of their corn they were to offer a sixtieth part, v. 13. 2. Out of their oil they were to offer a hundredth part, v. 14. 3. Out of their flocks they were to give one lamb out of 200, v. 15. But it must be out of the fat pastures of Israel. They must offer to God the fattest and best they had, for burnt-offerings and peace-offerings. These sacrifices were to make reconciliations for them. Christ is our sacrifice of atonement, by whom reconciliation is made.

III. This oblation must be given for the prince in Israel, v. 16. Some read it to the prince, and understand it of Christ, to whom we must offer our oblations, to be presented to the Father. Or, They shall give it with the prince (v. 17). The people were to bring their oblations to him, and he was to bring them to the sanctuary, and to make up what fell short out of his own.

IV. Some particular solemnities are here appointed. 1. In the beginning of the year is the annual solemnity of cleansing the sanctuary. (1) On the first day of the first month they were to offer a sacrifice for the cleansing of the sanctuary (v. 18), and to implore grace for the better performance of the service of the sanctuary the ensuing year. By it atonement was intended to be made for the sins of all the servants that attended that house, priests, Levites, and people, even the sins that were found in all their services. They were here appointed to cleanse the sanctuary upon the first day of the month, because on the fourteenth day of the month they were to eat the passover, an ordinance which, of all Old Testament institutions, had most in it of Christ and gospel grace. (2) This sacrifice was to be repeated on the seventh day of the first month, v. 20. And then it was intended to make atonement for everyone that errs, and for him that is simple. It is spoken of those sins which are committed through ignorance, mistake, or inadvertency.

2. The passover was to be religiously observed at the time appointed, v. 21. Christ is our passover, that is sacrificed for us. We celebrate the memorial of that sacrifice in the Lord's supper, which is our passover-feast.

3. The feast of tabernacles; that is spoken of next (v. 25), and there is no mention of the feast of pentecost, which came between that of the passover and that of tabernacles. See the deficiency of the legal sacrifices for sin; they were therefore often repeated, not only every year, but every feast, every day of the feast. See the necessity of our frequently repeating the same religious exercises. Though the sacrifice of atonement is offered once for all, yet the sacrifices of acknowledgment, that of a broken heart, that of a thankful heart, those spiritual sacrifices which are acceptable to God through Christ Jesus, must be every day offered.

CHAP. XLVI

I. Some further rules given both to the priests and to the people, relating to their worship, ver 1–15. II. A law concerning the prince's disposal of his inheritance, ver. 16–18. III. A description of the places provided for the boiling of the sacrifices and the baking of the meat-offerings, ver. 19–24.

Verses 1–15

We do not find in the history of that latter part of the Jewish church that they governed themselves by these ordinances, but only by the law of Moses, looking upon this then in the next age after as mystical, and not literal.

I. The place of worship was fixed, and rules given to prince and people.

1. The east gate, kept shut at other times, was to be opened on the sabbath days, on the new moons (v. 1), and whenever the prince offered a voluntary offering, v. 12. Some think he went in with the priests and Levites into the inner court, and they observe that magistrates and ministers should go hand in hand, in promoting the service of God. But it should rather seem that he went by the way of the porch of the gate, stood at the post of the gate, and worshipped at the threshold of the gate (v. 2), where he had a full view of the priests' performances at the altar, and the people stood behind him at the door of that gate, v. 3.

2. As to the north gate and south gate, by which they entered into the court of the people—whoever came in at the north gate should go out at the south gate, and whoever came in at the south gate should go out at the north gate, v. 9. Some think this was to prevent jostling.

3. The people shall worship at the door of the east gate, where the prince does, both on the sabbath and on the new moons (v. 3).

II. The ordinances of worship were fixed. 1. Every morning they must offer a lamb for a burnt-offering, v. 13. 2. On the sabbath days, whereas by the law of Moses two lambs were to be offered (Num. xxviii. 9) there shall be six lambs offered. 3. On the new moons, in the beginning of their months, there was the additional offering of a young bullock, v. 6. 4. All the sacrifices were to be without blemish; so Christ, the great sacrifice, was (1 Pet. i. 19), and so Christians, who present themselves to God as living sacrifices, should be—blameless, and harmless, and without rebuke. 5. All the sacrifices were to have their meat-offerings annexed to them, to show that we ought to honour him with the fruit of our ground as well as with the fruit of our cattle, Deut. xxviii. 4. The meat-offerings here are much larger in proportion than they were by the law of Moses, which intimates that under the gospel, the great atoning sacrifice having been offered, these unbloody sacrifices shall be more.

Verses 16–18

A law for the limiting of the power of the prince in disposing of the crown-lands. 1. If he have a son that has merited well, he may, in recompence for his services, settle some parts of his lands upon him (v. 16). 2. Yet, if he have a servant that is a favourite, he may not settle lands upon him, v. 17. But he may give him lands to the year of jubilee, and then they must return to the family again, v. 17. 3. What estates he gives his children must be of his own (v. 18): He shall not take of the people's inheritance. It is the interest of princes to rule in the hearts of their subjects. It is better to gain their affections by protecting their rights than to gain their estates by invading them.

Verses 19–24

Places in which to boil the flesh of the offerings, v. 20. There were some at the entry into the inner court (v. 19) and others in the four corners of the outer court, v. 21–23. In those places they were to boil the trespass-offering and the sin-offering, those parts of them which were allotted to the priests. There also they were to bake the meat-offering, v. 20.

CHAP. XLVII

I. The vision of the holy waters, their rise, extent, depth, and healing virtue, the fish in them, and an account of the trees growing on the banks, ver. 1–12. II. An appointment of the borders of the land of Canaan, which was to be divided by lot to the tribes of Israel and the strangers that sojourned among them, ver. 13–23.

Verses 1–12

This part of Ezekiel's vision must necessarily have a mystical and spiritual meaning. The prophecy, Zech. xiv. 8, may explain it, of living waters that shall go out from Jerusalem, half of them towards the former sea and half of them towards the hinder sea. And there is plainly a reference to this in St. John's vision of a pure river of water of life, Rev. xxii. 1. That seems to represent the glory and joy which are grace perfected. This seems to represent the grace and joy which are glory begun. Most interpreters agree that these waters signify the gospel of Christ, which went forth from Jerusalem, and spread itself into the countries about, and the gifts and powers of the Holy Ghost which accompanied it, by virtue of which it spread far and produced blessed effects.

I. The rise of these waters (v. 1). Waters issued out from the threshold of the house eastward, and from under the right side of the house, that is, the south side of the altar. And again (v. 2), There ran out waters on the right side, signifying that from Zion should go forth the law and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem, Isa. ii. 3. There it was that the Spirit was poured out upon the apostles, and endued them with the gift of tongues, that they might carry these waters to all nations. In the temple first they were to stand and preach the words of this life, Acts v. 20. They must preach the gospel to all nations, but must begin at Jerusalem, Luke xxiv. 47. Christ is the temple; he is the door; from him those living waters flow, out of his pierced side. It is by believing in him that we receive from him rivers of living water; and this spoke he of the Spirit, John vii. 38, 39. The original of these waters was not above-ground, but they sprang up from under the threshold; for the fountain of a believer's life is a mystery; it is hid with Christ in God, Col. iii. 3.

II. The progress and increase of these waters: They went forth eastward (v. 3), towards the east country (v. 8). The prophet and his guide followed the stream as it ran down from the holy mountains, and when they had followed it about a thousand cubits they went across, to try the depth, and it was to the ankles, v. 3. Then they walked along on the bank of the river on the other side, a thousand cubits more, and then, to try the depth, they waded through it the second time, and it was up to their knees, v. 4. They walked along by it a thousand cubits more, and then forded it the third time, and then it was up to their middle—the waters were to the loins. They then walked a thousand cubits further, and attempted to repass it the fourth time, but found it impracticable: The waters had risen, so that they were waters to swim in, a river that could not be passed over, v. 5. Note, 1. The waters of the sanctuary are running waters, as those of a river, not standing waters, as those of a pond. Grace in the soul is still pressing forward; onward still, till it comes to perfection. 2. They are increasing waters. This river runs constantly, the further it goes the fuller it grows. The gospel-church was very small in its beginnings, like a little purling brook; but by degrees it came to the ankles, to the knees: many were added to it daily. The gifts of the Spirit increase by being exercised, and grace is growing, like the light of the morning, which shines more and more to the perfect day. 3. It is good for us to follow these waters. Observe the progress of the gospel in the world; observe the process of the work of grace in the heart; attend the motions of the blessed Spirit, as Ezekiel here did. If we search into the things of God, we shall find some very plain and easy to be understood, as the waters that were but to the ankles, others more difficult, as the water to the knees, and some quite beyond our reach, which we cannot penetrate, but, despairing to find the bottom, must, as St. Paul, sit down at the brink, and adore the depth, Rom. xi. 33.

III. The extent of this river: It issues towards the east country, but goes down into the desert, and so goes into the sea, either into the dead sea, which lay south-east, or the sea of Tiberias, which lay north-east, or the great sea, which lay west, v. 8. This was accomplished when the gospel was preached throughout all the regions of Judæa and Samaria (Acts viii. 1), and afterwards the nations about, and even in the isles of the sea, were enlightened.
